Mr. WILSON. I would inquire of the gentleman from Vermont what information the Committee of Ways and Means have upon which they formed the belief that it will be necessary to appropriate $40,000 more for next year than was required for this year.

Mr. MORRILL. It is found in the superior activity of the Army and Navy for the last year.

Mr. WILSON. That certainly seems to me to be no answer to my question. I ask for definite information. I want to know what information the committee have which leads them to believe that this increased amount will be needed.

Mr. MORRILL. We had the Superintendent before us, and examined him very thoroughly upon that point as well as others. The expenses are much greater now than they have been, owing to the increased cost of materials and the price of labor.

Mr. WILSON. I desire to ask further what information the Committee of Ways and Means had which induced them to believe that during the year 1866, for which this appropriation is made, there would be a greater demand for money for this purpose than during the year 1865, when we all expect, judging from the present condition of our national affairs, that our military operations may be reduced within that time?

Mr. MORRILL. The gentleman should be aware that we have already made a very large appropriation for a deficiency for 1865, which will make the amount appropriated for this purpose for that year equal to the amount now appropriated.

Mr. WILSON. Then I desire to know if the gentleman has reason to believe that there will be a deficiency to be provided for for 1866?

Mr. MORRILL. We think so.

Mr. WILSON. How much?

Mr. MORRILL. That I cannot say.

Mr. WILSON. The fiscal year has not yet elapsed for which this former appropriation was made. Again, this appropriation is for lithographing and engraving for the Senate and House of Representatives and not for the War Department.

Mr. MORRILL. The gentleman must understand that the appropriations made for 1865 for the printing department have already been exhausted, and that we have at this session made additional appropriations in order to enable that department to carry on its business.

Mr. WILSON. I am informed that the engraving and lithographing for the War Department are paid out of the military appropriations.

Mr. MORRILL. Not for documents printed by order of this House or the Senate.

Mr. WILSON. Why, sir, the gentleman certainly does not mean to be understood that the War Department has this lithographing and engraving done for documents, and that then the House and the Senate have those lithographs and engravings duplicated for the purpose of putting them in the documents that we order?

Mr. MORRILL. They furnish them for reports printed by order of this House.

Mr. WILSON. I insist on my amendment to reduce the sum to $50,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I move to strike out the following item:

For payment of judgments to be rendered by Court of Claims, $1,000,000.

It will be time enough to make the appropriation after the judgments have been rendered.

Mr. HOLMAN. Before that motion is put, I hope some gentleman will explain this matter. I have not been able to lay my hand upon any document which throws the slightest light upon this appropriation. I have sought to ascertain what have been the judgments heretofore rendered, and what amount has been applied to their payment; but no such information can be obtained so far as I have been able to ascertain. I trust that this entire appropriation will be stricken out, and that hereafter we shall know what judgments have been rendered before we make any appropriations.

Mr. WILSON. I find in the appropriation bill of last year that the amount appropriated for this purpose was $300,000, and now it is proposed to appropriate $1,000,000.

I should be glad to know what information the Committee of Ways and Means had in relation to the judgments which may yet be rendered in that court, which induced them to report an appropriation of $700,000 more than last year.

Mr. MORRILL. The information before the committee was to this extent, that all over the country there are numerous claims, and some of them for very large amounts, for which the United States is liable, growing out of this war.

Mr. WILSON. Congress, at its last session, passed an act taking away the jurisdiction of the Court of Claims in relation to claims growing out of the Army and Navy.

Mr. MORRILL. So far as the information before the Committee of Ways and Means upon this head is concerned, we understand from the docket of business before the Court of Claims that this will be at least as small an amount as will be necessary to discharge the judgments of the court. We have already provided that the judgments of this court shall be final in certain cases, and if that law is to have any effect we should make this appropriation.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. So far as I recollect the law to which the gentleman refers, it is not contemplated that Congress shall make the appropriation until after the judgments are rendered. Congress has in that respect retained the jurisdiction in its hands. My objection to this provision is radical. I am not for appropriating one dollar till the Court of Claims shall have rendered its judgments, and till I know what the judgments are. I propose to reserve some sort of control to Congress over this matter if we have the power to do so.

Mr. MORRILL. I voted with the gentleman from Illinois when that law was before the House; but, as he is aware, it was carried against our votes. I think our duty is to conform to the law as we find it. If the gentleman has any radical objection to the law let him introduce a bill to repeal it.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. My objection is founded on the law. What I mean to say is that there is nothing in the law which compels us to make appropriations for judgments to be rendered.

Mr. MORRILL. I ask the gentleman whether it is possible to reach those cases by having a revision of them before the House.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Yes, sir; reach them by refusing to make appropriations for them; which amounts, in fact, to a repeal of the law so far as that is concerned.

The question was taken on Mr. WASHBURNE's amendment, and it was adopted.

Mr. WILSON. I desire to be informed in regard to this paragraph:

Treasury Department:
For compensation of the Secretary of the Treasury, two Assistant Secretaries of the Treasury, chief clerk, supervising architect and assistant architect, clerks, messengers, assistant messenger, and laborers, $118,920.

I find that the sum appropriated for the same purpose last session was only $116,340. I desire to know the cause of the increase.

Mr. MORRILL. If the gentleman will look at the book of estimates he will find a reference to the law by which we increased the pay of clerks.

Mr. WILSON. I desire information in regard to this paragraph:

In the office of the Secretary of the Treasury:
For copying, labor, binding, sealing ships' registers, translating foreign languages, advertising, and extra clerk hire for preparing and collecting information to be laid before Congress, and for miscellaneous items, $50,000.

I find that the appropriation at last session was only $30,000. Now we are asked to appropriate $50,000.

Mr. MORRILL. On calling on the Treasury Department in regard to that, we were informed that the increase is owing to the vast increase in the business of the Department, which rendered the increased appropriation absolutely indispensable. There are a great many more clerks employed there than were employed a year ago.

Mr. WILSON. I desire to know what is meant by the words "and extra clerk hire."

Mr. MORRILL. It is for paying clerks who are required to work extra hours.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I desire information in reference to the proviso in the following item:

For compensation of temporary clerks in the Treasury Department: Provided, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized, in his discretion, to classify the clerks authorized according to the character of their services, $250,000.

The object of that proviso is undoubtedly to raise the salaries of clerks in an indirect way. I am willing to meet that question when it comes up fairly, but I am not willing to have it come up in this way. It is independent legislation in an appropriation bill.

Mr. MORRILL. If the gentleman from Illinois will wait, I propose to offer an amendment in regard to this item.

Mr. WILSON. The words "extra clerk hire" the gentleman from Vermont has explained to mean compensation for extra labor performed. I find that the gentleman is mistaken, for in the second paragraph on the 14th page of the bill I find the following:

For compensation of additional clerks who may be employed by the Secretary, according to the exigencies of the public service, and additional compensation for extra labor of clerks in his office, $25,000.

I therefore, sir, raise the point of order upon the provision of the section that we are considering, that it is independent legislation and should not be embraced in an appropriation bill, and that therefore the term "extra clerk hire," in lines three hundred and three and three hundred and four, should be stricken out.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that the Clerk had proceeded to line three hundred and seven.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I will waive my point of order until the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. Wilson] can make his point of order on the preceding paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of opinion that the gentleman cannot go back to that paragraph of the bill.

Mr. WILSON. Permit me to explain. I was misled by the explanation given by the gentleman representing the Committee of Ways and Means. He told me that a certain appropriation was for a particular purpose. That purpose is embraced in another branch of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The remark of the gentleman from Iowa shows that the committee had already passed the item.

The Chair overrules the point of order raised by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURNE] under the last clause of the 120th rule, which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read, as follows:

"No appropriation shall be reported in such general appropriation bills, or be in order as an amendment thereto, for any expenditure not previously authorized by law, unless in continuation of appropriations for such public works and objects as are already in progress, and for the contingencies for carrying on the several departments of the Government."

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Do I understand the Chair to overrule the point of order that this is independent legislation, and cannot be put into an appropriation bill?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of opinion that it comes under this clause, "for the contingencies for carrying on the several departments of the Government."

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I am aware that the present Chairman is deciding in accordance with the decision of our honorable Speaker in all similar cases, which decision I think contrary to all previous decisions upon the subject.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois take an appeal?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I propose to take an appeal in order to settle the matter. I think it very important that this rule of the House should be strictly adhered to, because departure from it may involve expenditures of millions upon millions to the Government.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the committee?

The decision of the Chair was sustained; there being, on a division—ayes fifty-six, noes not counted.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I move to amend by striking out all from line three hundred and seven to line three hundred and eleven, inclusive, reading as follows:

For compensation of temporary clerks in the Treasury Department: Provided, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized, in his discretion, to classify the clerks authorized according to the character of their services, $250,000.

Mr. MORRILL. I move to amend the amendment by inserting, in lieu of the words proposed to be stricken out, the following:

For compensation to temporary clerks in the Treasury Department, and for additional compensation to clerks in same Department: Provided, That the temporary clerks herein provided for may be classified according to the character of their services: And provided further, That the Secretary of the Treasury may award such additional compensation to clerks as in his judgment may be deemed just, and may be required by the public service, $250,000.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I am certainly opposed to that amendment, more opposed to it than to the clause as it stands.

Mr. HOLMAN. I raise the point of order that, so far as the amendment proposes to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to pay additional compensation, it is without any precedent in appropriation bills. It does not propose to carry out any provision of existing law, nor does it properly come under the head of "contingencies for carrying on the several departments of the Government."

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. MORRILL. I send to the Clerk a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, and ask that it be read.

The Clerk read, as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, January 10, 1865.

SIR: I have the honor to request that you will cause the item, on page 23 of the printed estimates, which reads as follows: "For temporary clerks in the Treasury Department: Provided, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized, in his discretion, to classify the clerks authorized according to the character of their services," to be changed in its phraseology, so that it will read: "For compensation to temporary clerks in the Treasury Department, and for additional compensation to clerks in the same Department: Provided, That the temporary clerks herein provided for may be classified according to the character of their services: And provided further, That the Secretary of the Treasury may award such additional compensation to clerks as in his judgment may be deemed just, and may be required by the public service, $250,000."

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

W. P. FESSENDEN,
Secretary of the Treasury.

Hon. T. STEVENS, Chairman of Committee Ways and Means, House of Representatives.

Mr. MORRILL. This is rather an important question, and I want a fuller House than we have at present to consider it. I therefore move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. DAWES reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had the Union generally under consideration, and particularly the Military Academy appropriation bill, and had directed him to report the same back to the House with an amendment; and further, that it had under consideration House bill No. 649, making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1866, and had come to no resolution thereon.

MILITARY ACADEMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. DAWES demanded the previous question on the Military Academy appropriation bill.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the amendment of the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union was concurred in.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. MORRILL moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message was received from the Senate, by Mr. HICKEY, its Chief Clerk notifying the House that that body had passed House bill No. 203, for the relief of Jacob Weber, without amendment, and House bill No. 186, to incorporate the Baltimore and Washington Depot and Potomac Ferry Railway Company, with amendments; in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House.

EXTRA TREASURY CLERKS.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, moved that the amendment pending in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union in reference to extra clerks in the Treasury Department be printed for the use of members.

The motion was agreed to.

And then, on motion of Mr. MORRILL, (at ten minutes past four o'clock, p. m.) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, January 18, 1865.

Prayer by Rev. B. H. NADAL, D. D., of Washington, District of Columbia.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. COWAN presented the memorial of the Board of Trade of Philadelphia, praying the postponement of any action on the bankrupt bill now pending until opportunity is afforded northern creditors to enforce their claims on the restoration of the authority of the Government in the rebellious States; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. MORGAN presented a petition of medical storekeepers in the service of the United States, praying to be allowed the pay and emoluments of surgeons in the Army of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

Mr. DIXON presented a petition of persons engaged in the millinery and cloak-making business in the city of Hartford, Connecticut, praying for an amendment to the internal revenue law approved June 30, 1864, so as to impose on each of said classes of work a specific tax beyond a certain exempted amount of each; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a petition of citizens of Connecticut and members of the Cigar Makers' Union of Windsor, praying for the repeal of the law taxing cigars, and that the tax may be placed on the raw material; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. HARRIS presented the petition of the local board of steamboat inspectors of Buffalo, New York, praying for an increase of salary; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented additional papers in support of the claim of Joshua B. Todd, a lieutenant in the Navy, praying to be allowed the difference of pay between master and passed midshipman during the time he was acting master; which were referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. TRUMBULL presented the petition of the local board of steamboat inspectors for the eighth district, praying for an increase of compensation; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. CHANDLER presented a resolution of the Board of Trade of Detroit, Michigan, recommending the construction of a ship canal around the falls of Niagara on the American side; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

COMMITTEE SERVICE.

Mr. WADE. I hold in my hand a letter from the Senator from Oregon, who is a member of the committee on the conduct of the war. I send it to the desk to be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there be no objection, the letter will be read.

The Secretary read, as follows:

January 17, 1865.

SIR: Because of ill health I am unable to attend the meetings of the committee, as I would like to do, and therefore hope that this, my resignation as a member of the committee, may be accepted.

Will you do me the favor to present this to the Senate, and ask that I be excused from further service in that capacity?

I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

B. F. HARDING.

Hon. B. F. WADE,

Chairman of Committee on Conduct of the War.

Mr. WADE. I make the motion that Mr. HARDING be excused at his request from further service upon the committee.

The motion was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Postmaster General transmitting, in compliance with the resolution of the Senate of the 12th instant, a statement furnished by the Auditor for the Post Office Department of the amount allowed and paid for attorneys and counsel fees of every kind and description, exclusive of the regular salaries paid to district attorneys, from the 1st of July, 1863, to the 31st of December, 1864, as shown by the records of his office; which, on motion of Mr. FOSTER, was ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. CHANDLER, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred a resolution of inquiry as to the propriety of consolidating the three great districts, &c., reported adversely thereon, and the report was agreed to.

Mr. HOWARD. The Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, to whom was referred a resolution presented by the Senator from Minnesota, [Mr. WILKINSON,] in relation to the treatment of Union prisoners and the course to be pursued by the Government in reference thereto; and also a joint resolution (S. R. No. 95) presented by the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. WADE,] regulating the treatment of confederate prisoners in custody of the authorities of the United States; and also a petition of citizens of Indiana, praying for the passage of a law to place all rebel prisoners now in our hands under the control of those officers and men who have been in rebel hands, have directed me to report these papers back to the Senate, accompanied by a joint resolution on the subject.

The joint resolution (S. R. No. 97) advising retaliation for the cruel treatment of prisoners by the insurgents, was read and passed to the second reading.

Mr. ANTHONY, from the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred a resolution to print three thousand copies of the Navy Register for 1864, reported in favor of it, and the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. CLARK, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. R. No. 80) for the adjustment of the claim of J. & O. P. Cobb & Co., of Indiana, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. GRIMES, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 382) to provide for the better organization of the pay department of the Navy, reported it with amendments.

Mr. BROWN, from the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 359) to reimburse the State of Missouri for moneys expended for the United States, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report; which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, who were instructed by a resolution of the Senate to inquire into the subject, reported a bill (S. No. 402) to repeal an act entitled "An act to remove the United States arsenal from the city of St. Louis, and to provide for the sale of the land on which the same is located;" which was read, and passed to a second reading.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. No. 621) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the year ending 30th of June, 1866.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills, which thereupon received the signature of the Vice President:

A bill (H. R. No. 623) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for carrying the mails from the United States to foreign ports, and for other purposes," approved March 25, 1864; and

A bill (H. R. No. 203) for the relief of Jacob Weber.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 621) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the year ending the 30th of June, 1866, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

CONDUCT OF GENERAL PAINE AT PADUCAH.

Mr. POWELL. I offered a resolution in the early part of the session directing the Secretary of War to transmit to the Senate the report made by a commission appointed to investigate the conduct of General Paine in and about Paducah. That resolution was referred some weeks since to the Committee on Military Affairs. I wish now to make an inquiry of that committee as to the disposition they have made of that resolution. If it is not their purpose to report it, I wish to move the Senate that they be discharged, and let the resolution come before the Senate for action.

Mr. WILSON. In reply to the inquiry of the Senator from Kentucky, I have to say that the Committee on Military Affairs have not yet taken up and considered the resolution referred to them on that subject. We shall probably be able to do so in a day or two. We have been busily employed and have not yet reached it.

Mr. POWELL. I now move that the Committee on Military Affairs be discharged from the further consideration of the resolution, and be directed to report it back instantly to the Senate. Since I introduced the resolution I have received the report of the commission, but not the accompanying documents. I find that the report I was in quest of was transmitted by the Governor of Kentucky to the Legislature as a document accompanying his message; but the affidavits and proofs, one hundred and eighty I understand, that accompanied the report are not published with the Governor's message. The report discloses a degree of barbarity, cruelty, and pillage, that I venture to say cannot be equalled in the annals of any Christian people. I desire the resolution to come back to the Senate, and I desire the Senate to pass it, so that we may see the proof referred to in this report, and take action touching and concerning this man Paine. I have already introduced a resolution, which now lies upon the table of the Senate, requesting the President to have this guilty man tried upon the charges made against him in this report, in order that he and those engaged with him may, if convicted, be punished. I do not think we should delay for a moment having prompt action in this matter. This report, allow me to say, was made by two gentlemen of high character, both of whom voted for the President at the last election. The report was made by General Fry and Colonel Brown. I will read one single paragraph of the report only:

"The tenor of Brigadier General Paine's conduct has been briefly alluded to. The particulars are to be found in the numerous affidavits which we submit herewith. Your committee will not disguise the feelings of indignation and disgust which their investigation of the conduct of affairs in western Kentucky has inspired within them. The administration of Verres and Warren Hastings may be safely challenged to show a parallel to the fifty-one days of terror and rapine that measured the duration of General Paine's authority.

"Well may we blush for the tarnish attached to the national uniform when debased to such ignoble uses by an officer whose only glory seems to have been the oppression of non-combatants and a loud-mouthed denunciation of his superior officers as 'cowards and scoundrels.' Such were the epithets repeatedly attached to Major General Halleck's name by General Paine. In healthy contrast, your committee beg leave to allude to the firm, judicious, and effectual administration of Brigadier General S. Meredith."

I hope, sir, that the Senate will direct my resolution to be reported back at once, in order that we may call upon the Secretary of War to transmit to us this report, with the accompanying documents, showing the guilt of this man, his cruelties, his plunder, his rapine, his barbarity; and that then we may take such proceedings as will, if possible, cause him to be tried and punished for his crimes. I hope there will no longer be any dilly-dallying or delay upon such a matter. I feel that I have been already negligent of my duty as a representative of the people of Kentucky, in not urging in the Senate action upon this matter before. I verily believe, not only from a perusal of that report, but from conversations with citizens of the highest respectability in that region of country, that when the facts shall be known it will be found that in all the dark and bloody annals of tyrants and men who overthrow the rights of the citizen, there never has been, in any Christian age, such acts of barbarity, cruelty, and plunder as have been inflicted on that people by this man Paine and his confederates. I wish them brought to trial, and, if found guilty, to be punished by death; for if one tithe of the statements in these papers are true that is the lightest punishment they deserve.

I hope, sir, that the Senate will no longer delay, but will order back this resolution and put it on its passage. Let us have the facts that are referred to in this report, so that we may see whether or not the resolution which lies on your table requesting that General Paine be tried, and if found guilty punished, should pass.

Mr. TRUMBULL. As the resolution called for by the Senator from Kentucky was on my motion referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, it may be proper that I should say a word in regard to the motion that is now made.

At the time the resolution was under consideration before I had not seen General Paine, and had no information from him in regard to the report; but my reason for making the motion was that I thought it unjust to an officer to publish a report affecting his character, which I understood was ex parte, and made by a commission before whom he did not appear. Since then I have seen General Paine and had a conversation with him, and I learned from him that the report was of the character I had supposed. I learned from him further, that he, after hearing that a commission was proceeding to inquire into his conduct, before which he did not appear at all, filed a reply or answer to their report, and also that the report made by this commission was reviewed by the Judge Advocate General; and he informed me that he had no sort of objection to having the report of the commission published, provided his answer to it and the review of the report by the Judge Advocate General should be published also. I for one am willing, therefore, that the Senator's resolution should be passed if it should be amended so as to call for all the papers. It will then appear, as I am informed, that so far from General Paine being the blood-thirsty and guilty man that the Senator from Kentucky has pronounced him without a trial, he has but done his duty.

I was a little surprised at the language of the Senator from Kentucky when he rose in his place in the Senate and demanded that this "guilty man" should be tried, thus condemning him before his trial. Why call him guilty? Every man is entitled to a trial, and presumed to be innocent until his guilt is established. But the Senator from Kentucky in his zeal would forestall the case of General Paine. He pronounces him a guilty man here in the Senate, and yet has introduced a resolution to put him upon trial! Why, sir, a person who would give utterance to such an expression as has fallen from the Senator from Kentucky would be disqualified to act as a juror in any court in Christendom, because he has expressed his opinion before hearing the evidence, and pronounced him guilty.

I will not undertake to say that General Paine is guilty or innocent. I do say that since this resolution was introduced I have seen him, and he tells me he has no objection to the report of this ex parte commission being published, if his reply setting forth the real facts and the report of the Judge Advocate General can also be published with it. If they are all published together they will do no harm. I presume the Senator from Kentucky does not want a portion of the papers only published, unless he is to proceed upon the hypothesis announced in his speech, that a man is to be declared guilty before he is put upon his trial.

Mr. POWELL. The Senator from Illinois seems to object to my speaking of this officer as guilty without his being tried. I do not wish General Paine to be punished unless he should be properly tried and found guilty. When I used the word "guilty," I did it as enunciating what had been found by this commission. They say that those parties are guilty of the offenses that I have indicated. The Senator says that the proceeding was an ex parte one. These gentlemen in their report say that the very evening they got to Paducah, General Paine left, and took away all the papers and his officers about him. It was his fault that he was not there. I have no personal knowledge as to whether General Paine is guilty or innocent; but I do know that this report stamps him with the most damning guilt. I want him to be tried before a proper tribunal with power to investigate, and to punish him if he shall be found guilty. I hope for the credit and honor of the flag of my country that General Paine may prove to be innocent of the charges made against him, but I have not the most remote idea that he will.

If the resolution shall be brought back from the committee, I shall be willing to accept the proposition of the Senator from Illinois as an amendment to it. I want no ex parte statement. If General Paine can benefit himself by the report made by the Judge Advocate General, let it come. If he has any statements that he wishes to make, let them come. I want to have the whole facts; and then when they come, I want another and a different commission, one that has power to punish, to sit upon this man's case. I repeat, that this commission found General Paine and others guilty of the crimes that I have indicated, and it was because such was the finding of the commission that I pronounced him guilty. If the Senate will order the resolution back from the committee, I will accept the proposition of the Senator from Illinois, and let all these papers come before us. I would not do General Paine or any other man intentional injustice. I shall be rejoiced if he can prove himself innocent of these charges. If they are true, (and of the truth of the evidence before me I have no doubt,) he is guilty of crimes shocking to human nature—crimes such as I venture to say no military commander in any Christian country has been guilty of for the last five hundred years.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The Senator will persist that he has no doubt of the truth of the report of this ex parte commission. It shows to me, I had almost said, a perversity on his part and a determination to hold General Paine guilty. He says that General Paine absented himself. I know nothing about the facts, except as I have heard them from General Paine, who tells me that he waited ten days for this commission to enter upon the discharge of its duties, and they would not move a step until he had left Kentucky and gone away, and then they instituted their proceedings to inquire into his character, and when he heard of it he made an answer refuting the whole proceeding.

Mr. POWELL. If the Senator will allow me, I wish to read a paragraph or two from the report of the commission:

"Your committee would report that they had much difficulty in procuring information from official sources, as Brigadier General Paine and his assistant adjutant general left Paducah on the evening of our arrival, taking with them, or having sent away, every clerk who was familiar with the office business of headquarters.

"The records of the assistant adjutant general's office were submitted to our inspection by Brigadier General Meredith, the successor to General Paine, but were so incomplete and irregularly kept that they proved of little service in the investigation. Many orders, proved to have been issued by Brigadier General Paine, have no entry on his books."

They say he left there the evening they arrived, and the officers most familiar with the business about his headquarters went with him.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Is that statement at all inconsistent with what I have been informed? My information is that this commission kept away and would not enter upon the discharge of their duties, and that General Paine waited ten days for them to institute their proceedings. When they found he had gone, they came to Paducah to enter upon the examination. The whole thing was an ex parte proceeding; and I have not only information from General Paine, but I have had more than one letter from gentlemen high in position in the State of Kentucky, since this matter was called up before, stating that General Paine was the only officer ever in command of that portion of Kentucky, with a single exception, who protected Union men and treated traitors as they deserved.

I have no objection to the whole of these papers being published, if the Senator wants to see them, and the Secretary of War deems them proper papers to be communicated. At any rate, in behalf of General Paine, I am authorized to say that he is quite willing and anxious that every paper on this subject shall be published.

Mr. POWELL. The Senator from Illinois, on behalf of General Paine, says that the members forming this commission kept away from Paducah on purpose so long as General Paine remained there. Both of the gentlemen who made that report are known to me. They are highly honorable gentlemen; and let me tell the Senator from Illinois, notwithstanding what General Paine may say, they would scorn such conduct. I will venture the assertion that they never kept away one minute in order to allow General Paine to be absent or to go away. They are gentlemen of the very highest honor and respectability.

The Senator says that he has received letters from men high in position in Kentucky saying that this man Paine was the only one who protected Union men and punished rebels in that region of country. If the Senator will give the names of those parties, I think it will be found that they were men in Kentucky who were sharing in the plunder and robbery of General Paine. I would like to know the names of those Kentuckians in that region of country who dare to say that this man Paine was the only man who protected Union citizens; and I will venture the assertion that when the names are given, and the whole facts shall be proved, it will be found that they were the guilty accomplices of that wicked man. I, too, have received letters from that section of the country; I have talked with numerous citizens from that section of country; and let me tell the Senator, from what those most highly respectable citizens in that region of the State tell me, this report does not give one tenth of the enormities of this man. Men of the most elevated character, men who have been Union men from the very beginning, many of whom have borne arms in defense of the Union during this strife, tell me with one unanimous voice that the treatment of the people there was most atrocious.

I know there are civilians there who by possibility may say General Paine was the right man in the right place, because this record unfolds the fact that some of the civil officials there were acting with General Paine and dividing the spoil and plunder that he was wringing from those injured and downtrodden people. I should be obliged to the Senator if his correspondents would allow him to give us their names, that we might know who they were that vindicated the monstrous, outrageous, wicked, corrupt, plundering, murderous conduct of that man about Paducah.

Sir, I use harsh language, but I have the proof to substantiate it. Arraign that man, and I will see that the proof is forthcoming. Publish this document, and you will have it; and there is proof outside of that; for while that commission carried out their investigation faithfully and honestly, yet, for want of time and owing to other circumstances, they have not embodied in their report one tenth of the enormities committed upon the people there. Let all the vindication that General Paine has come; let the report come; and then I wish to take up and have passed my resolution demanding that he be tried.

Mr. CONNESS. Mr. President, I will not vote to order this resolution back from the Committee on Military Affairs and discharge them from its consideration upon the request or motion of the Senator from Kentucky, after the statement made by the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs. If it were not an ordinary circumstance for the honorable Senator from Kentucky to launch his denunciations against the officers of the Government, and they alone, in this Chamber, I would feel more inclined, for one, to vote with him on many occasions when he offers resolutions similar to the one now under discussion. But, sir, it is a singular fact that the only atrocities, the only crimes, the only plunderings, the only murders that he finds eloquent language to denounce in this body are those alleged to be committed by Union officers. This has been done by the Senator over and over again in the Senate since I have had the honor of a seat here, and it has gone out to the country frequently unchallenged, uncontradicted here. Senators have sat and borne it again and again while these ex parte statements have gone out implicating officers of this Government in the commission of crimes the most horrible and unnatural that can be imagined.

For one, sir, I confess that I am tired of listening in silence to it; and I wish to put in my protest here, and to invite the honorable Senator from Kentucky occasionally to divide his vengeance with the cruel and barbarous wretches who, as the honorable Senator from Indiana [Mr. LANE] recently described, have persecuted, starved, and murdered our brave men in the field who have been taken prisoners. It becomes us, Mr. President, here in our independent position of Senators to resist denunciations upon criminals who wear the insignia of our country; but it does not become us, nor any of us, nor the Senator from Kentucky, to visit his denunciations alone upon and direct them against those men.

Why, sir, the public mind has become demoralized almost, and its courage has absolutely been sunk and put below its proper status, by the common and the ordinary commission of crimes committed against our people by the rebels. The Senator represents a State here that has suffered most grievously at their hands. He represents a State bordered by States and territory populated by Americans who have been robbed and plundered, ruined by the ferocity of the men engaged in the rebellion. But if, perchance, or whether or no, Union officers in the performance of their duty step beyond the point of propriety, then the thunders of the Senator from Kentucky are heard, being launched against them and them only.

Mr. President, as I have said, I tire of listening to these ex parte statements, these ex parte denunciations, this pretense (I will undertake to say) of denouncing officers of our Government in vindication of the flag. The flag may need vindication; but, thank God, it is being vindicated. It would become the honorable Senator more to engage in that denunciation by joining his fellow Senators here in ferreting out and pursuing those base criminals not only against our countrymen, but against civilization and humanity and liberty everywhere, than to confine his efforts alone against Union officers.

I have nothing to say about the case of General Paine; I leave that to the honorable Senator who has undertaken, not his defense, but a word of justice in his behalf. I am willing to vote with any Senator for the development of proper charges against any officer of this Government. I repeat again for the third time that I tire, I tire, I tire of this tirade against Union officers in this Chamber.

Mr. BROWN. I do not desire to participate in this debate further than to say that while members of the Senate protest their anxiety to take care of the credit and honor of the officers of this Government, I trust they will recollect that this is a matter in which a question is involved between different officers. The men who make this report are also officers of this Government, and are entitled to just as much respect in any discussions that may arise concerning this action as the person who is implicated here. I say this in behalf of those who have made this report implicating General Paine, and preferring charges of a very grave nature not only against him but against others, who are accused of speculation and of plunder.

I shall not support the motion of the Senator from Kentucky, to take this matter from the hands of the Military Committee, because I believe there is just exactly the place it should be, and that that committee, whenever they see fit to make any report concerning this matter, should also accompany it with the evidence upon which this report has been predicated. I trust, therefore, that the matter will be left where it is until the committee shall have time and opportunity to make the necessary examination.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Mr. President, I understood the Senator from Illinois to say that General Paine was the only general stationed at Paducah, with one exception, who had given the proper treatment to the Union loyal citizens of that section of country.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Indiana will pardon the Chair: it is now one o'clock, and it becomes the duty of the Chair to call up the special order, which is the unfinished business of yesterday.

Mr. POWELL. I ask that the special order may be passed over informally until this subject has been disposed of.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there be no objection, that course will be taken. The Chair hears none. The Senator from Indiana will proceed.

Mr. HENDRICKS. General Meredith, a citizen of the State of Indiana, has been in command of that point since the removal of General Paine. I wish to ask the Senator from Illinois whether General Meredith is the exception which he makes from the general denunciation which he says is made by his correspondents against the commanders at that point.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I do not recognize the authority of the Senator from Indiana to interrogate me as to who the exception made is. He has not stated precisely, I think, the language which I used. I intended to say, and believe I did say, that I had been informed that General Paine, with a single exception, was the only person who had properly protected Union men and punished traitors—putting both together—who had dealt properly, particularly with traitors. Whether that information be correct or not, of course I do not vouch. There may have been other persons there who may have treated traitors rightly as well as Union men, but the information I had from my correspondents was that with a single exception he had been the only officer who had satisfied the Union men there.

Mr. HENDRICKS. The Senator questions my right to ask the question which I have asked. Perhaps he is right, sir; but if he is right in that, I have the right to question the propriety on his part of introducing testimony which can raise a suspicion against a gallant man from the State of Indiana. General Meredith has seen service in the field; he has done gallant service in battle, and as I understand has never made a dollar wrongfully in this war. His conduct at Paducah is commended by the officers of the Army in an official report; and inasmuch as his fair fame and good name as an officer was at least placed in question by the statement of the Senator, I thought it my duty to vindicate him from the suspicion that might arise from what the Senator said.

I am not going into the discussion of the character and conduct of General Paine, except to say that if rumors which came over from the State of Kentucky to the State of Indiana are at all to be relied upon, he ought to be put upon trial. He ought to be put upon trial for the good of the public service, for the honor of the Army, if any portion almost of the reports that came to our State from Kentucky be true. What is this ex parte examination that is now before the Senate? Is it not an examination known to the usages of the Army? Are courts of inquiry not frequent? For what purpose? Much for the same purpose that investigations are had before a grand jury. The party is not heard before a grand jury in our courts; the investigation is ex parte; but when the grand jury returns an indictment into court, although their investigations were in secret and the party accused had no hearing there, still he must go upon his trial. Here is a proceeding in the Army very analogous to that, known to the usages of the Army, which convicts this man of high crimes; and is it not right, then, that he should go upon his trial?

But, sir, I did not intend to continue the argument. I wished to suggest to the Senator from Kentucky that as the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs promised the Senate an early report, perhaps it would be as well to wait a very short time until that report is received. I understand from the chairman of the committee that a very short time will elapse before the report is made.

Mr. WILSON. I think the committee can be prepared to report on Monday next without doubt.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Then I suggest to the Senator from Kentucky to give the committee that time. It is a committee that has very heavy business upon its hands, and I cannot see that the committee has willfully neglected an investigation of the subject or designs to prevent the Senate having an opportunity to act upon it. So much business is before that committee that I think some further time may very appropriately be given it by the Senate.

Mr. POWELL. Mr. President, I have not charged the Committee on Military Affairs with negligence. I supposed their inattention to this resolution arose from the great press of business before them, and I desired to relieve them by having this resolution brought back to the Senate.

The Senator from Illinois says correspondents of his in Kentucky declare that there has been but one officer in command at Paducah, other than General Paine, who has punished rebels and protected Union men. I should be obliged to him if he would give us the name of that other individual. There have been many post commanders at Paducah. The present Lieutenant General Grant, when a brigadier general, was there at one time. I hope it was not General Grant who failed to give protection to Union citizens and to punish rebels. There was that true-hearted, that noble, that gallant soldier, General Charles F. Smith, who was for a long time in command of the post at Paducah, whose daring, whose skill, whose gallantry, and whose military achievements we regard as part of our cherished history. Was it General Smith that failed to protect Union men and punish rebels? General Wallace, of Indiana, I believe was in command there at one time. Was it General Wallace? There have been various commanders there. So far as regards General Meredith, a constituent of my friend from Indiana, it affords me very great pleasure to say that I hear on all hands that he is a gentleman and a soldier, and discharges his duty fully and faithfully. The commission who make this report on the conduct of General Paine bear high testimony to the soldierly qualities and the honest dealing of General Meredith with the people of his department.

But, Mr. President, I have no doubt that the correspondents of the Senator from Illinois will tell him a great many things in favor of General Paine, for I verily and conscientiously believe that if the gentleman would give us the names of those correspondents, which I will not ask unless he is authorized to give them, it would be found that they were the confederates of this man in plunder. I have heard such a volume of testimony from this people on the subject that I do not believe there is an honest man in all Kentucky who would dare to vindicate this man Paine.

But, sir, one word to the Senator from California. He seems to think that he is a kind of censor morum of the Senate, and says he is tired, tired, tired of hearing my denunciations of Union officers. Sir, I dare say the Senator will grow much more tired than he is already. I am not responsible for the Senator's being wearied when he hears criminals, robbers, and thieves denounced. If it wearies that Senator to hear corrupt and guilty men denounced, I would not care if he should faint under his weariness from sheer exhaustion. I have never denounced a soldier who did his duty. I honor the brave, the gallant, the true-hearted Christian gentleman and soldier who carries the flag of his country amid the storm of battle. The profession of arms is a noble one, and that brave and true-hearted Christian warrior who bears the banner of his country with courage, with skill, with bravery, and wins victories never indulges in the persecution of non-combatants and the pillaging of the people. All honor to the brave soldiers who fight and do not steal; disgrace, infamy eternal, to pillagers and plunderers. Upon what battle-field did General Paine win honors? And of all the men who are charged with peculation and who have been denounced by me, I would ask the Senator to point to a single battle-field where they carried the stars and stripes to victory. Men who go about punishing women and children and plundering the people are miscreants and cowards; they disgrace your arms when you intrust them with commands. I have denounced none except those who I believed were guilty of crime, of peculation, robbery and plunder; and all I desire in regard to such persons is that they should be tried, and, if found guilty, punished.

The Senator says he could endure my denunciations no longer. I regret that the honorable Senator cannot have a little more patience, because at the proper time I expect to denounce rogues, public plunderers, and robbers, more fully than I have done heretofore. The Senator says he could not allow this occasion to pass without saying a few words. I do not think many questions have passed here of any moment or consideration, or indeed any question, however insignificant and trifling, that has not elicited "a few brief remarks," or, as my friend from Indiana who sits near me [Mr. LANE] would say, "a few desultory remarks" from the Senator from California. I believe the Senator from California thinks nothing can be done here as it ought to be unless he gives us the benefit of his wisdom, his sage counsel, his large experience and statesmanship. The Senator's speech might lead one to suppose it was the first time he had spoken in the Senate, and that he had sat still until his very patience was threadbare. I will venture to assert that on the very next question which comes up the Senator will be in the same condition; he will think the Senate cannot properly pass upon it until he has been heard. I have never grown so weary and tired of the Senator's remarks. He had a right to make them; and if he thought his wisdom was necessary to give measures proper shape it was his duty to make them. I make no complaint of that; but a Senator who so universally gives us his counsel ought not to grow so weary of one who in comparison with himself so seldom trespasses on the time of the Senate.

The Senator thinks I should denounce other people. When I know of any officers in the military or any other department of the Government who do not discharge their duties, they will receive my censure; and all who discharge them faithfully, and with capacity and integrity, will receive my praise. He wonders why I did not unite with the Senator from Indiana [Mr. LANE] in denouncing the treatment by the rebels of certain prisoners in their hands. I differ in one respect from the honorable Senator from California. I think there are Senators here who discuss a question in such a manner as to exhaust it, and that it does not require my aid or assistance to add force to what they say. I am unlike the Senator in that respect; he thinks that no argument is complete, that no question is fully elaborated and discussed, until we have had the light of his wisdom upon it. I could add nothing to the statement of the destitution of those prisoners made by the Senator from Indiana and the Senator from Ohio. Allow me to say to the Senator from California that I think any persons who would treat prisoners cruelly act exceedingly wrong, and they have my denunciation, whether they be rebels or loyal men; they have no favor from me. I am not advised as to how they treat their prisoners; but if some of the accounts that we get in the newspapers are correct, our prisoners are badly treated in some respects; and whenever they are badly treated it is very wrong, and meets with my hearty condemnation. I hold that those who will treat prisoners badly, who will treat cruelly an unarmed man who surrenders, is anything else than a true-hearted and brave soldier.

But the Senator seems to labor under a kind of hallucination; I think he has a sort of monomania on that subject, if he will allow me to use the word; he seems to think no person ought to speak on any subject without denouncing rebels and their cruelties. It strikes me that a Senator might be permitted to discuss some questions without so far departing from the subject under debate as to step out to give the rebellion a kick. The Senator must be most extraordinary in his demands against these poor rebels, for I had supposed that such was his high opinion of his own powers that when his denunciation was exhausted upon them it would be idle and futile for anybody else to come in to kick the poor dead corpse; but he seems to wish everybody to do just as he does. I regret that I cannot coincide in opinion with that honorable Senator on that subject. I have great regard for him. He is a most pleasant, amiable gentleman. I believe, however, that he has quite as good an opinion of himself as his fellow Senators have of him; but vanity is a very amiable weakness; it hurts nobody, and I have no doubt it does the Senator good in its enjoyment. I would rather congratulate him that he has such unbounded sources of pleasure. I am sure I have no disposition to interpose when he caters to his own consequence and sharpens the appetite upon which his vanity feeds. And even though he should make my humble self the subject of his criticism, if by that means he can exalt his own self-importance, I am so amiable as to feel gratified that I have been the poor instrument of enabling him to show off a little to the gaping crowd in the galleries.

But allow me, with great kindness, to say one word to the Senator. I think I know something about my duties here, and I think I know how I ought to present questions to the Senate; and, in my judgment, it is not becoming in that Senator to tell me what character of speeches I should make; nor, when I am talking about the misconduct of an officer of my own Government, does it become him to demand of me that I go outside and abuse rebels and rebellion. If rebels and rebellion were the subject at issue before the Senate, the Senator might twit me if, in speaking upon that subject, I did not stick to rebels and rebellion. But the Senator has certain idiosyncracies to which I have already alluded. I hope he may enjoy all his own self-consequence, and that his vanity may continue forever to be in full bloom; and I hope, for his own sake, that he may cause other people to think as highly of him as he thinks of himself, and if he does I have no doubt he will be President very soon.

Now, sir, at the suggestion of my friend from Indiana [Mr. HENDRICKS] and other Senators, I withdraw my motion; and I hope that the chairman of the committee will report the resolution at an early day.

Mr. CONNESS. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Kentucky proposes to withdraw his motion. His motion will be considered as withdrawn unless objection be made.

Mr. CONNESS. I object, at present.

Mr. POWELL. I withdraw the withdrawal of my motion if the Senator wishes to speak.

Mr. CONNESS. I shall not detain the Senate an instant, and am entirely willing that the Senator shall withdraw his motion. I shall not disgust the Senate nor violate the proprieties of this place by engaging in a vulgar tirade with the Senator from Kentucky. The Senator has descended, I think, in the opinion of the Senate, and I shall not follow him. I did say that I was tired of the speeches of the Senator from Kentucky. I now say to that Senator that I think his constituents have tired of them, too. I leave it simply to the readers of the Congressional Globe to determine between that Senator and myself as to all he has said. I never had the appreciation shown me yet when I rose in this body of being left to empty benches as an audience. If the Senator had been sensitive he would have often closed his addresses in this body and made them more brief than he has done. But, sir, I do not intend to follow him. Whenever that Senator in discussions here shall, as I believe, fall within the scope of my comment, I give him notice that he shall always receive it; and when he receives it he shall receive it in such a manner as I shall see fit to impart it. The Senator shall never be a criterion for determining how I shall speak while I have a seat in this body and while he has. I will not repeat myself, as the Senator so often does in this Chamber, nor delay the Senate longer on a subject that has been certainly sufficiently discussed.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Before this matter passes from the consideration of the Senate, as the Senator from Kentucky has been so persistent in his statements in regard to the cruelties and thefts and robberies of General Paine, I feel it due to state that his information is entirely at variance with such as I have received. When this matter was called up I did not have before me the letters which have been written to me from the State of Kentucky, and I have not got them now, with the exception of two that I happen to find from gentlemen of very high character, and whom, I am sure, if the Senator from Kentucky knew, he would not denounce as participants in embezzlement or robbery. One of these gentlemen says in his letter to me:

"We feel that the effort now being made to stigmatize the name of General Paine is but a blow at the Union men of western Kentucky, and if there is any protection due to Union men anywhere the Union men of this region are entitled to it. In the beginning of the rebellion our best Union men were insulted on the streets and ordered to leave the city; they were hunted up in their workshops and driven from their labor to places of security; they were made to leave their homes with the punishment of death if they returned. This is the character of people over which General Paine was sent to rule. He drew a line between the friends and the enemies of this Government which no one could fail to see. He was well acquainted with this people before he came here to take command; he knew with whom he had to deal, having been stationed here in an early day."

"All the stories of his having killed so many innocent men is no more nor less than bosh; he had five guerrillas killed here, and only five. As to his ever receiving any money or being engaged in any swindling transactions is simply absurd, and is believed by no one here. If the man can be found who will swear that General Paine was ever engaged in swindling or embezzling while in command in this district the people would like to see him."

"The Union men here court an investigation of General Paine's administration while in command of western Kentucky. We are satisfied that no charge of a disgraceful character can be sustained against him. The Union men here sustain General Paine as our man, and as said above, if we ever have an opportunity we will do so. We ask no favors, only such as are due to the loyal men of the country."

"That is from one gentleman."

Mr. POWELL. Will the Senator give me his name?

Mr. TRUMBULL. No, sir.

Mr. POWELL. Is the Senator at liberty to do so?

Mr. TRUMBULL. No, sir.

Mr. POWELL. I do not ask it.

Mr. TRUMBULL. As a matter of course, the Senator from Kentucky, when he asks these questions, knows that it would be improper for me to give the names.

Mr. POWELL. I know that sometimes correspondents write and give permission to use their names. I only wished to know if the Senator had permission to give the names in this instance.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I have not permission to use the names of the persons who write to me. Another gentleman writing to me says of General Paine:

"He has served in this region a good while, and is pretty well known here. My own acquaintance with him is quite limited, and with his administration very slight. This, however, I know: he was the terror of rebels and their friends, and the refuge of Union men. One man like him is worth an army of such as some who have been here in authority. Quite possibly he may have erred and done some indefensible things. It would be strange if he had not. The usual rebel policy against our officers is, if possible, to corrupt them by presents, dinners, and attentions; or, if this cannot be done, to seize upon some act of indiscretion, mistake, oversight, or short-coming, and clamor them into disgrace. General Paine's case comes within the latter category."

"I am much inclined to suspect a great error was committed in relieving him from Paducah."

"Perhaps I shall be excused for adding that I have no interest whatever in the matter, except a desire that no injustice be done to an officer who, I believe, has endeavored to do his duty while commanding in one of the worst localities in Kentucky."

This is the character of the information I have received; and now I insist that it is very unjust to a public officer, about whom there is evidently this disagreement of opinion, to rise here in the Senate and in advance proclaim him to be a guilty man and a thief and a murderer. Sir, I would protect no such man; I would protect no man who is guilty of any such transactions; I would say nothing in his favor. But I know personally one of the gentlemen who writes me one of these letters; I know him to be a gentleman of high character, and the Senator from Kentucky knows him well; and I only refer to these letters as an answer to this ex parte report which the Senator from Kentucky keeps thrusting before the Senate and the country, as I think to the unjust prejudice of a man who has had no trial. If these papers are to come forth, let them all come—his defense and the report which has been made to the Judge Advocate General upon this investigation had by an ex parte proceeding.

Mr. SUMNER. I now move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House joint resolution No. 91, which was reported yesterday from the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is a motion still pending before the Senate.

Mr. POWELL. I rise to withdraw my motion.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there be no objection, the Senator will be allowed to withdraw his motion.

Mr. POWELL. Before withdrawing the motion I wish to say a single word; I am not going to make a speech. The Senator from Illinois lays great stress upon my charging this person with being guilty. I stated in reply to that Senator at first that I was only stating what this commission charged him with, and they made their report upon proof. I do not know whether he is guilty or not; I hope he may prove to be innocent; but this commission charges him with all the offenses I have indicated, and say that they accompany the charges with the sworn proofs; and the commission was open, and all General Paine's friends were invited to come and testify. I now withdraw my motion.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair hears no objection to the withdrawal of the motion. It is withdrawn.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The special order is House bill No. 583, which is the unfinished business of yesterday.

Mr. SUMNER. What is that bill?

The SECRETARY. A bill to amend the twenty-first section of an act entitled "An act to define the pay and emoluments of certain officers of the Army, and for other purposes," approved July 17, 1862.

Mr. SUMNER. My colleague who has charge of that bill is not now in his place, and therefore I move that for the present it be passed over.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have an amendment pending to that bill. I do not think it will take more than a few moments to pass it.

Mr. SUMNER. I am inclined to think there may be some discussion on it.

Mr. SHERMAN. As far as I know there will be none.

Mr. SUMNER. I think I had better persevere in my motion.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator's colleague is now present. The bill has been before the Senate two or three times.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question before the Senate is an amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio, which will be read.

Mr. SHERMAN. I propose to modify the amendment—

Mr. SUMNER. I understand from my colleague that there is no particular haste in regard to this bill.

Mr. WILSON. I understand that my colleague is desirous of pressing this joint resolution now. If there be need of it, I will give way with this bill, and let it go over until to-morrow.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield the floor?

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator from Massachusetts has charge of the bill, and if he desires to lay it aside I have no objection. It has been before the Senate three times, but I shall not interfere with his management of the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SUMNER] to postpone the further consideration of the bill in order to proceed to the consideration of the joint resolution indicated by him. The motion was agreed to.

NAVAL FORCES ON THE LAKES.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, accordingly proceeded to consider the joint resolution (H. R. No. 91) in relation to the treaty of 1817. As the resolution was passed by the House of Representatives, it recited that the treaty of 1817, as to the naval force upon the lakes, was designed as a temporary arrangement only, and, although equal and just at the time it was made, has become greatly unequal through the construction by Great Britain of sundry ship canals; that the vast interests of commerce upon the north-western lakes, and the security of cities and towns situated on their American borders, manifestly require the establishment of one or more navy-yards wherein ships may be fitted and prepared for naval warfare; and that the United States Government, unlike that of Great Britain, is destitute of ship canals for the transmission of gunboats from the Atlantic ocean to the western lakes, and therefore proposed to direct the President of the United States to give notice to the Government of Great Britain that it is the wish and intention of the Government of the United States to terminate the arrangement of 1817, in respect to the naval force upon the lakes, at the end of six months from and after the giving of the notice.

The Committee on Foreign Relations reported an amendment, to strike out all of the preamble and resolution, and to insert as a substitute the following:

Whereas the United States of the one part and the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland of the other part, by a treaty bearing date April, 1817, have regulated the naval force upon the lakes, and it was further provided that "if either party should hereafter be desirous of annulling this stipulation, and should give notice to that effect to the other party, it shall cease to be binding after the expiration of six months from the date of such notice;" and whereas the peace of our frontier is now endangered by hostile expeditions against the commerce of the lakes, and by other acts of lawless persons, which the naval force of the two countries, allowed by the existing treaty, may be insufficient to prevent; and whereas, further, the President of the United States has proceeded to give the notice required for the termination of the treaty by a communication which took effect on the 23d November, 1864: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the notice given by the President of the United States to the Government of Great Britain and Ireland to terminate the treaty of 1817, regulating the naval force upon the lakes, is hereby adopted and ratified as if the same had been authorized by Congress.

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, I do not concur in this resolution as it is reported, and I will merely state my objection to it. I am in favor of notice being given for the termination of that treaty or arrangement to which the resolution refers. My objection to the resolution is simply this: I hold that the notice to terminate the treaty or the arrangement can be given only by the Congress of the United States; that the Executive has no power rightfully to give the notice; the Executive has given the notice, and the action which the committee recommends for the adoption of the Senate is that we shall adopt and ratify the action of the President and give validity to the notice from the time the President directed it to be given. I object to that proceeding for the reason that it is a function of the legislative branch of the Government to give that notice. The President has no more power to give the notice than has the judiciary. The President has interfered with the legislative power of the Government, and in my judgment it is an interference which ought to be condemned, instead of being approved by adopting it.

It may be said that the British Government cannot take any exception to the regularity of the notice, but that it is a matter between our own Government and people. I do not admit that position to be altogether sound and true. For myself I utterly controvert the position that an unauthorized act performed by the Executive can be adopted and receive validity by its being ratified by an act of Congress. I will illustrate my position by an example: Congress has power to declare war. The President might assume to himself the power to declare war; and the time may come when Presidents of the United States will assume that power. Suppose a President of the United States should take upon himself to declare war against Great Britain, or any other Power with whom we are at peace, would an act of Congress, adopting and ratifying his declaration of war, make that declaration of his valid and binding? There is a clause in most of the treaties between the United States and foreign Governments that in the event of a declaration of war on the part of the United States against that Government the citizens or subjects of that Government who are domiciled here shall have six months within which to remove their property from the United States. Suppose the President of the United States should declare war against England, and the property of the subjects of England within the United States at the expiration of six months from the declaration of war by the President should be seized and confiscated by our authorities, the question would then come up whether the right of the subject of England to remove his property from the United States did not date from the declaration of war by Congress, the regular war-making power. Would the liability of the subject of England to have his property forfeited take effect from the declaration of war by the President, or would the act of ratification and adoption of the President's declaration of war by Congress give the effect to the President's declaration to authorize the confiscation of the property of the subject of Great Britain from the date of the declaration of war by the President? I say it would not.

Although the Government of England and the courts of England could not take cognizance of that irregularity in the declaration of war, still the subject of England might make the question, and have the advantage of it in our courts; and if a case was to arise in the courts of the United States in which a subject of England should make that question, I entertain no doubt whatever that the courts of the United States would decide that the presidential declaration of war had no effect, and that there was no regular and valid declaration of war until war was declared by Congress, and that the subject of England had the full six months from the time of the declaration of war by Congress within which to remove his property from the United States, and it would not be subject to confiscation until the full expiration of six months from the time of the declaration of war by Congress.

That is one objection I have to the resolution in the form in which it is reported. Another is that it is a mischievous precedent. It is a precedent the effect of which is to sanction and to give authority to an unauthorized act by the President. It is to give validity to an act which, without the ratification of Congress, would have no validity at all. It is to sanction and to give not only acquiescence but approval to an act of usurpation by one department of the Government upon the constitutional authority of another. It is in that sense an eminently mischievous and wrong precedent, and therefore also I oppose it.

It may be said that unless we do what is now proposed we shall lose the time that has elapsed between the notice, as it has been directed to be given by the President, and the present time. That is a consideration of no importance whatever. The effect of this resolution is to terminate a treaty. That treaty has existed between the two countries since 1817. There is no particular haste for bringing that treaty to an irregular and unauthorized termination by the act of the President. There is no reason for it, in my judgment. I believe that the interests of the country would not suffer by the delay between the time when the notice was given by direction of the Executive and the time when it should be, as it ought to be, regularly communicated by the action of Congress. I have no idea that there is an interest of the country that would suffer; but even if the fact was otherwise, the amount of good that would result to the country from gaining this short time would be altogether inconsiderable, and inadequate, in my judgment, to compensate for the establishment of any such vicious precedent.

I did not rise, sir, to make any elaborate argument in relation to this matter, but simply to state the grounds upon which I object to the form of the resolution. I am in favor of the notice being given, but I insist that it ought to be given so as to propose to have effect, as it can legally and constitutionally and rightfully have effect, only from the time that it is given in obedience to the joint resolution passed by Congress.

Mr. SUMNER. Mr. President, the difference between the Senator from Kentucky and the committee, it would seem, is rather one of form than of substance. The Senator is in favor of giving the notice, but he criticises the way in which it has been done. Now, that the Senate may understand the way in which it has been done, and be prepared to approach the precise question in issue, I ask permission to read from a document which I have in my hand the actual terms of the notice already given. I have in my hand a copy of a dispatch addressed by our minister in London to Earl Russell, bearing date the 23d of November, 1864, drawn up in pursuance of instructions from the Department of State. In this dispatch there is a minute statement of the grievances and the outrages which had recently occurred on our northern frontier, setting forth at great length especially that outrage to which the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] called our attention the other day, on Lake Erie. After proceeding with these details, this communication goes on as follows:

"It must be obvious to your lordship that at the time of the adoption of the arrangement between the two Governments in April, 1817, which limited their naval forces on the lakes, a condition of things like the present could scarcely have been anticipated. The purpose clearly was to prevent either party from keeping up a force which might endanger the other, thus entailing upon both the necessity of maintaining a more or less burdensome armament. It certainly did not contemplate the possible intervention of a third party, ill disposed to both, which should malignantly avail itself of the known provisions of the compact for the purpose of working certain mischief to that which it hated the most, and possible injury even to the other, by provoking strife between the two. Neither could it have foreseen the precise position in which her Majesty's Government has been placed by recognizing as belligerents persons capable of abusing the privileges conceded by that measure to the most malicious purposes. In view of these extraordinary events, against the recurrence of which on the Canadian side, no provision adequate to meet the immediate exigency seems to have been made on the part of her Majesty's Government, it would seem to be the imperative duty of the United States to provide at once some stringent measures. Inroads by marauding ruffians upon the population of the United States on that border cannot be tolerated.

"Among the papers which I have the honor to lay before you, I beg in this connection to call to your notice a letter of the Secretary of the Treasury, directing the outfit of two steam propellers, one upon Lake Erie and the other upon Lake Ontario, with the object of checking, and if possible suppressing, depredations on the trade or attacks upon the population connected with those waters.

"In consequence, however, of the later outrage perpetrated at St. Albans, I am directed to say that the preceding measures are not deemed by any means adequate to answer the desired purpose. The proceedings taken together are regarded as deserving of further and prompt action on the part of her Majesty's Government, in order to avert the dangers of ultimate conflict upon the Canadian borders.

"It gives me great satisfaction to be able to acknowledge to your lordship that the Canadian executive authority has thus far coöperated with my Government in faithful and diligent efforts to bring these disturbers of the public peace to due account. It is a matter of certainty, though not perhaps susceptible of judicial proof, that all movements of this character are set on foot by a notorious person named Jacob Thompson, who, with other disloyal citizens of the United States, is temporarily domiciled in Canada, and furnished with funds by his coadjutors at home for these iniquitous operations through the banking institutions of that province. It is impossible not to feel their presence and their activity in that region to be a constant threat against the safety of the people occupying the entire long line of the border. I am, therefore, with great regret, instructed to give this formal notice to your lordship, that in conformity with the treaty reservation of the right, at the expiration of six months from the date of this note the United States will deem themselves at liberty to increase the naval armament upon the lakes, if, in their judgment, the condition of affairs in that quarter shall then require it.

"In taking this step I am desired to assure your lordship that it is resorted to only as an indispensable measure to the national defense, and so far from being in a spirit of hostility that it springs from a wish no less earnest than heretofore to preserve the most friendly relations with Great Britain. I take pleasure in adding that it is the fixed purpose of my Government in every case to direct its energies to the prevention of all attempts to invade the British territory, whether by way of retaliation or otherwise."

This note, I have already said, bears date November 23, and on it is minuted as follows: "Delivered at the Foreign Office at fifteen minutes past six o'clock, p. m." The Senate will therefore observe that it is from that date that the notice given by this communication may be said to take effect; but here the question is presented which has been raised by the Senator from Kentucky as to the validity of a notice given by the President under such circumstances and in such a way. That question has occupied the attention of the committee, and after careful consideration of it they came to the conclusion which is embodied in the resolution now under consideration. In their opinion, a treaty may be regarded as to a certain extent a part of the law of the land, to be repealed or set aside only as other law is repealed or set aside: that is, by act of Congress. I might illustrate this conclusion by various authorities, judicial and legislative. I content myself with simply reading the words of Mr. Justice Story in his Commentaries on the Constitution of the United States. Speaking of treaties, he says:

"It is, therefore, indispensable that they should have the obligation and force of a law, that they may be executed by the judicial power and be obeyed like other laws. This will not prevent them from being canceled or abrogated by the nation upon grave and suitable occasions; for it will not be disputed that they are subject to the legislative power, and may be repealed, like other laws, at its pleasure."—Story's Commentaries on the Constitution, sec. 1838.

I will quote also the words of Mr. Justice Iredell in giving the opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Ware vs. Hylton, 3 Dallas's Reports, page 260:

"It is a part of the law of nations that if a treaty be violated by one party, it is at the option of the other party, if innocent, to declare in consequence of the breach that the treaty is void. If Congress, therefore, who I conceive alone have such authority under our Government, shall make such a declaration in any case like the present, I shall deem it my duty to regard the treaty as void."

I assume, therefore, that the intervention of Congress is necessary to the termination of this treaty, and the President has already, to the extent of his power, interfered to give the notice which it is now proposed that Congress shall give, which, indeed, the other House, during the last session, actually undertook to give so far as one branch of the Legislature could act. But the Senator from Kentucky tells us that the original defect in the notice as given by the President is of such a character that it cannot be cured, if I may so express myself, by any subsequent ratification, and he proceeds to present what he will excuse me if I call rather imaginary cases—cases which I think could hardly occur, and which are widely different from the case now under consideration. I will not undertake to express any opinion on the cases which he does present; as for instance, if the President, during the recess of Congress, should undertake to involve the country in war. Let that case take care of itself when it arises for judgment. The case now before us is more simple, and is one with regard to which there are no private rights or interests. It is simply a question of a domestic character as between Congress and the President of the United States. He has given the notice. As regards the Government of Great Britain, that notice, I cannot doubt, is perfectly valid. That Government will never call it in question. It is for our own security, and for the conformity of our precedents with just principles, that we now propose by a formal act of Congress to throw over this act of the President the shield of congressional sanction, and the question is, can that be done? Can Congress, by an act of ratification, impart to the original notice given by the President that power and character which, without subsequent ratification, it would not have? On that point I content myself with reading the authoritative words of the Supreme Court of the United States in the decisions known as the Prize Cases, 2 Black's Reports, page 671. There the court express themselves as follows:

"Without admitting that such an act was necessary under the circumstances, it is plain that if the President had in any manner assumed powers which it was necessary should have the authority or sanction of Congress, that on the well-known principle of law, 'omnis ratiobilit retrotrahitur et mandato equiparatur,' this ratification has operated to perfectly cure the defect. In the case of Brown vs. United States, (8 Cranch, 131, 132, 133.) Mr. Justice Story treats of this subject, and cites numerous authorities to which we may refer to prove this position, and concludes, 'I am perfectly satisfied that no subject can commence hostilities or capture property of an enemy, when the sovereign has prohibited it. But suppose he did, I would ask if the sovereign may not ratify his proceedings, and thus, by a retroactive operation, give validity to them?'"

All that is proposed on the present occasion is that Congress shall ratify the notice already given to the British Government, and by a retroactive operation give validity to it.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, a treaty was made between the United States and Great Britain in relation to the armaments to be kept up on the lakes that form a boundary between the British possessions and the United States. There is a provision in that treaty that either party may terminate it by giving the other party six months' notice. My own opinion is that the altered condition of Canada, resulting from the construction of her ship-canal, has rendered it expedient and proper for years past that the United States should terminate that treaty, and I have always been ready since I have been a member of this body to vote for its termination. The honorable chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations is not more in favor of taking that step than I am myself. The only question between him and the committee and myself is as to the regularity of the proceeding that is recommended by the committee for terminating the treaty.

This is not a treaty between the President of the United States and Great Britain. It is a treaty between the United States and Great Britain. One of the stipulations of the treaty is that either party to it may terminate it. Who, then, are the parties that are authorized to terminate it? Who are the parties that are competent respectively to give notice to terminate the treaty? They are Great Britain on the one side, and not the President of the United States, but the United States itself, on the other side. The committee are unanimously of opinion that the act of the President in giving notice to terminate the treaty is an act without any authority, and until it is ratified and confirmed by the action of Congress, as every gentleman acknowledges, it has no effect or operation whatever.

By an express provision of the Constitution treaties are made the supreme law of the land. Treaties may be unmade, and they are unmade in our Government by the action of Congress upon two principles: first, because Congress has power to declare war; and second, because a treaty being in the nature of and having the effect of a law can only be repealed or abrogated by the law-making power. These two principles establish conclusively that it is indispensably incumbent and necessary, in order to secure the termination of this treaty, that it shall be terminated not by the action of the President, but by the action of Congress.

Mr. CLARK. The Senator will pardon me for interrupting him for a moment. Do I understand him to take the ground that we cannot so ratify the act of the President as to give validity to it from this time?

Mr. DAVIS. I am coming to that in a moment. That is the conclusion which I reach. I assume, as seems to be generally conceded, that the action of Congress is necessary to give the notice, and thus to terminate the treaty. On that proposition there is no dissent of opinion, as I understand. Now the question is, as the President has irregularly, and without any effect in the act proprio vigore, given the notice, is it competent for Congress to ratify that act and adopt the notice and give it effect from the time the notice was given? I assume two positions in relation to that question. The first is that, in my judgment, according to the principle and the theory of our Government, it is not competent for Congress to ratify a void and unauthorized act by the President so as to give it vitality, effect, and operation from the time that act was performed. In the next place, I say that if it was competent for Congress to give by its ratification this effect to the act, it would be inexpedient and in the highest degree impolitic to attempt to give it any such effect.

In my judgment a great mistake in relation to the construction of our Constitution and of the powers created by it results from the continual habit of our functionaries, officers, and people, of drawing analogies between our Government and other Governments, when, according to my position, there is no such analogy. There is but one law of our Government, and that is the Constitution of the United States. Whenever the powers of our Government are to be ascertained on any controverted question, how is it to be settled? In my judgment it is to be settled by a resort to, and a correct understanding of, the Constitution, not by drawing analogies from other Governments.

Our Constitution establishes the principle that the powers of Government are divided into departments; the legislative are assigned to Congress, the executive to the President, and the judicial to the courts. Let me ask the honorable Senator from Massachusetts, the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, this question: suppose the President of the United States was to assume a judicial power, and was to render a judgment that appertained, according to the principles of our Constitution, to the judiciary alone, could the judiciary afterward, after he had rendered his judgment, and had endeavored to give it effect and validity, ratify the judgment of the President, and by that ratification give the same effect and consequences to that judgment from the time it was rendered by the President which it would have had if it had been rendered in the first instance by the judiciary itself? He would answer no. I think that it is just as competent for the judiciary to recognize and to give a validity and sanction to a judgment which ought to have been rendered by the courts, but which in fact had been rendered by the President, as it is for Congress to give effect to a legislative act that has been attempted to be performed by the President, and which Congress could alone perform validly and effectively according to our Constitution.

The principle contended for by the honorable Senator would break down the separation of powers among the departments of Government; it would intermingle the executive and legislative powers, and it could as validly and logically intermingle the judicial and executive powers. My position is, that the President has no right to exercise any judicial or legislative powers; and though he may assume to exercise the one or the other, the sanction of the department of the Government to which they properly and constitutionally appertain to his exercise of such powers cannot give it the least effect whatever. But if I am mistaken in that general principle, and I do not believe I am mistaken in it, according to a correct interpretation of the powers of Government, still, on the question of expediency, I hold that where one department of the Government sets the example of trenching upon the powers of another department of the Government, and does an act which it has no power to do, and which, if it attempts to do, has no legal effect whatever, the department to which appertains the right and the prerogative to do the thing, even by sanctioning the unauthorized usurpation of power by the other department of the Government, has no effect to give any validity to the unauthorized act of the department that usurps the power.

The honorable Senator has read from the decision in the prize cases. There was a variety of opinions in relation to the correctness of that decision; but it is the highest adjudication that can take place in our country, and all have to submit to it; but that adjudication establishes a principle only in analogy to such cases as were decided in that particular suit. In relation to this question it established no principle whatever; in relation to this question that decision is coram non iudice; and if this question could come up in a case of meum and tuum, in which private rights would be involved, I have no doubt that the Supreme Court itself would take and hold the position that the case on which the honorable Senator relies applies only to the strict line of cases like it.

But, sir, waiving that question, and conceding that Congress may approve of this void act of the President, this unauthorized act of the President, this act of the President that has no effect whatever until it is ratified and confirmed by Congress, the question then arises, is it not in the highest degree inexpedient and vicious, and may it not be eminently vicious in the future that it should thus ratify his act? Why, sir, what is the effect of a bad precedent? What is the limit to the mischievous consequences of a bad precedent? What is to be the effect and what is to terminate the mischief of power being usurped by one department of our Government that properly pertains to another? It takes the future with all its events, all the varieties of questions that may come up involving the power that has been irregularly and unauthorizedly exercised by the President, and to which we are now seeking to give effect; it takes the indefinite future to measure the mischievous consequences of such a precedent. There is but one safe rule, and that rule is not to give such a precedent any countenance, not to give it any sanction, not to encourage a disposition and tendency upon the part of one branch of the Government to trench on the powers of another by that other department attempting to sustain and to sanction, or to give validity to this usurped power and the act that has been attempted to be performed under the usurped power.

I had not intended to say many words on this subject. I rose simply to state my dissent from the resolution recommended by the committee and the grounds upon which I made that dissent.

Mr. SUMNER. Mr. President, if this were a question of private rights, if, according to the language of the Senator from Kentucky, there was any question of meum and tuum, there would be a certain force, perhaps, in his argument; but there are no private rights involved, there are no private individuals who can be affected one way or the other by this proposed ratification of the notice already given. I therefore put out of view that class of suggestions. It is, then, simply a question of general power on the part of Congress when the exercise of it involves no question of private rights.

I conclude that Congress has this power, and I put my conclusion on two distinct grounds. The first ground is the reason of the case, its common sense; for without this power on the part of Congress I can imagine that sometimes great difficulties or embarrassments might ensue in the administration of Government. I say that the power must exist in Congress of ratifying, if it sees fit, certain executive acts. The second ground on which I put it is the ground of authority; that the Supreme Court of the United States, after careful consideration in recent cases which the whole country knows had the amplest attention and were most fully argued, has affirmed the power on the part of Congress of ratifying an executive act which without that ratification might otherwise have been invalid. But I do not content myself with referring to that single decision, recent and authoritative as it is; I call attention also to that earlier decision which is referred to in the prize cases, the case of Brown vs. The United States, in 8 Cranch, which is well known to all lawyers to have been one of the best reasoned judgments that can be found in our books, and in that case you will find the same power attributed to Congress.

I say, therefore, on grounds of reason and on grounds of authority, that I am not permitted to doubt that Congress may exercise this power.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, the committee I believe were unanimous in thinking that the treaty of 1817 should be terminated. The only doubt which existed in the minds of the committee was whether the preparatory step had been properly taken which was taken by the President on the 23d of last November in giving the notice for the termination of the treaty. Some of the members of the committee were under the impression, and perhaps in that opinion the honorable chairman concurred, that the President had no authority to give that notice. The honorable member from Kentucky, who thought that there was no authority on the part of the President to give the notice, supposed that we could not ratify the notice given by him so as to make it effective as from the day on which the notice was given.

There were two questions, therefore, before us, and there are now two questions before the Senate, although, so far as the resolution is concerned, it is important only to pass upon one of them. The first is whether the President had not the power to give the notice without any antecedent legislation on the part of Congress. I am not prepared to say now—and I have not examined it, because it was immaterial, as I have just suggested, to the consideration of the resolution itself—whether he has not the power. We know that under the Constitution of the United States, the only organ between the United States and foreign Governments is the Executive. They have nothing to do with the Congress of the United States or with the judiciary of the United States. The whole foreign relations of the country, as far as they are to be carried on by negotiation or in any other way, are to be conducted by the President. Foreign nations, therefore, have a right to suppose that what he does in behalf of the United States he does under some proper authority. I have not had time, or at least I have not thought it necessary, as I have just stated, to examine into that question; but my recollection is that the proclamation of neutrality which was issued by General Washington during the war between England and France was justified by Mr. Hamilton in his celebrated letters signed "Pacificus," upon the ground that that was a purely executive act. And he reasoned with the clearness which distinguished all his productions; he reasoned with very great power to show that the President himself, because he was the organ as between the United States and foreign nations, had the power to issue that proclamation of neutrality, he esteeming the issuing of a proclamation of that description as an executive act, and reasoning from the provisions of the Constitution that every act which is not by the terms of the Constitution declared to be legislative or judicial is in its nature executive, and to be performed on the part of the Executive.

But, as I have said, it is unnecessary to inquire whether that notice of itself, because of the power of the President to bind us absolutely by the giving of that notice, answered that purpose or not. I suppose it to be very clear that England, on the 23d of November, when the notice was given by the President, had a right to assume that the President had the power to give that notice. She would have no right to tell the President, "You are acting without authority; you are warring against the provisions of your own Constitution; you are transcending your own limited power; we appeal, therefore, from your decision to Congress, and we shall pay no regard to the notice until Congress shall act." I am sure England never contemplated that she was authorized to make an objection of that description, and I presume that the United States would not be altogether pleased if England had made such an answer to the President's notice of the 23d of November.

Mr. SUMNER. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him there? I understand that, in point of fact, Earl Russell took notice of the action in a formal communication addressed to the Department, which has been received within a few days, and recognized the validity of the notice, and, if I may so express myself, received it in good part.

Mr. JOHNSON. I was just about to refer to that.

Mr. SUMNER. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. JOHNSON. I have said, Mr. President, that the English Government would have no right, as I think, it would have been discourteous in the extreme, it would have been offensive to the United States, to have told the President, when it received the President's notice of the 23d of November, that he was acting without authority; and, instead of pursuing that discourteous course, as the chairman has informed the Senate, the proper organ of the British Government replied—and I was very glad to see that the reply was couched in the terms in which it was written—in very courteous terms; said in substance that there was nothing in the notice of an offensive character; he recognized the authority of the United States to put an end to the treaty, and looked upon it rather as a friendly than as a hostile act; and that is now of record.

Then how do we stand? The President, the only organ between ourselves and England, has assumed the right to give the notice, and has given it. The English Government has accepted the notice as properly given. The English Government might at the very time that notice was given, or the day after, or at any day between that day and the present, have come to the conclusion that, looking to the interest of that Government, it was important to them that the treaty should be terminated, and might have abstained from giving the notice which they were authorized to give, that the treaty was to terminate at the end of six months, upon the assumption that the notice was in fact given by the United States, and that it was therefore unnecessary to give a duplicate notice, because the notice given by the United States and accepted by England was precisely as effective as a notice given by England and accepted by the United States. Then at the end of six months from the 23d of November England may say to us—and I speak it with all deference to my friend from Kentucky, or any other member of the Senate who may entertain the same opinion that he does—"The treaty is at an end, and we will increase our force upon the lakes." Could the United States then say, "You shall do no such thing; the treaty is not at an end; the treaty is still just as effective as it was in 1817, when it was first negotiated, or as it would have remained effective if no notice had been given at all?" I submit, not.

Then if England would have a right at the termination of six months from the 23d of November to consider the treaty as abrogated, it would seem necessarily to follow that we have a right to consider the treaty as abrogated at the termination of six months from the 23d of November. What do we propose to do? There existing some doubt, as between the President and ourselves—not as between the President and foreign Governments—whether the President had a right, without our antecedent authority, to give the notice on the 23d of November, he having, however, given it and bound the United States to England that we will consider the treaty as terminated at the expiration of six months from that date, and that England may consider the treaty as terminated at the expiration of the same period, we say, as between him and ourselves, "You have represented us perhaps beyond the limit of your authority, but you have bound us; we feel that we ought to be bound; now we want to indemnify you; we want to show that you have done nothing of which we complain; we want the treaty put an end to; England has a right to consider it as terminated because of that notice, and we want to say as between ourselves and you that although you may have gone beyond the very letter of your authority, you have only done that which we desire to be considered as legally done, and we will ratify it."

What difference is there between a case of that description and any other case of principal and agent? The President is the agent of the United States. He is the agent of the legislative authority of the United States. If my friend from Kentucky and those who think with him are right, he is only authorized as the agent of the United States in relation to this treaty to give the notice after Congress shall have authorized or directed him to give it. But he has given it before. Cannot we confirm what he has done before? If we would have authorized him to do it at the time that he did it, cannot we say "We will have the benefit of his act, although it might not have been binding upon us as between him and ourselves?" Why not? How is it as between individuals, agents and principals? A man goes into the world under the authority of a limited power of attorney; he transcends it; his principal knows it; his principal acquiesces in it; his principal expressly ratifies it: is not that subsequent ratification equal to original and antecedent authority? Certainly; and all that the Supreme Court of the United States decided in the case, in 8 Cranch, which has been cited, and what the majority of the Court in the prize cases have said was correctly decided, to which the honorable member from Massachusetts has referred, is this: that whatever is done by an agent may be ratified by his principal afterward, so as to make it just as effective an act of agency as if it had been authorized in advance. What was that case?

Mr. DAVIS. Will the honorable Senator permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. JOHNSON. Certainly.

Mr. DAVIS. Suppose the President was to proclaim war against a foreign country—England, for instance—and three months afterward Congress by an act should attempt to ratify his declaration of war by proclamation, would the recognition of the war by Congress make it effective from the time that the President had proclaimed it?

Mr. JOHNSON. I say yes, and that is precisely what the Supreme Court have decided.

Mr. DAVIS. Let me ask this further question. Under a treaty between the two countries, in case of a declaration of war, the subjects of England and the citizens of the United States, in the two countries respectively, have six months within which to withdraw their property. Suppose that within the six months after the proclamation of war by the President, but before the expiration of six months after the ratification of the war by Congress, there was a confiscation of the property of English subjects in this country, would that confiscation of property be valid? Would not the subject of England have the right to claim his property upon the ground that there had been no valid declaration of war?

Mr. JOHNSON. That does not alter the case at all. What is war? It is a prosecution of some supposed right by force; that is all. What is the character of the conflict that is going on in the United States now? It is too late to question that it is war; and what made it war? Not any declaration of war by Congress; for Congress took no action in relation to it until the 13th of July, 1861. Everything antecedent to that time was done by the Executive; and yet the Supreme Court have unanimously decided that long before the passage of the act of July 13, 1861, a state of war existed which gave to each of the parties, the confederate States and the United States, every belligerent right.

Mr. DAVIS. I will ask the Senator, with his permission, if he maintains that the decision of the Supreme Court referred to by the honorable Senator from Massachusetts decides that every belligerent right appertains to both parties before the recognition of a state of war by Congress, or even after the recognition of a state of war by Congress? Was not the effect of the decision simply restricted to the question of the right of prize upon the ocean?

Mr. JOHNSON. No, sir.

Mr. DAVIS. That is my understanding of it.

Mr. JOHNSON. The particular cases before the Court were cases which involved the question whether the prize law was applicable to the hostilities existing between the United States and the confederate States. The objection taken by the minority of the Court, consisting of the Chief Justice and three of the associates, to considering the war as existing even with reference to the application of the prize law was that to consider it as existing was incidentally to make them all enemies; but if the honorable member will read the dissenting opinion given in behalf of the dissenting judges by Mr. Justice Nelson, he will find that it was upon the very ground that it would involve all the rights of war that he dissented; but he admitted, and all the Court admitted, that after the act of July 13, 1861, was passed, every belligerent right, every right of war, and all the incidental rights growing out of a state of war existed.

My honorable friend will not forget the Mexican war. How did that war exist until May, 1846? How was it brought about? We said, and Congress said by passing the act of May, 1846, that Mexico had made war upon us, and that the President had the right, or his military officers had a right, to accept the war, to fight the battles upon the Rio Grande.

Mr. FOSTER. "War existed by the act of Mexico."

Mr. JOHNSON. I know; and when we passed the act of May, 1846, the preamble of that act stated that war existed by the act of Mexico, not by any declaration of war by Congress; and nobody doubted that after Congress passed that act, or independent of the passage of that act, a state of war existed which made the people of the United States the enemies of the people of Mexico. That is all that we have done in relation to this war.

But, sir, that is not exactly this case. There is no question as to who shall declare war growing out of the proposition upon your table. The question is, whether we have not the right to ratify an act done by our agent, the President, assuming for the sake of the argument, (and the necessity of the ratification does assume it,) that as between him and us he stands in need of a ratification. He has offended against us, not as against England. England has a right to consider us as bound by his act, and to call us to an account hereafter if we refuse to abide by his act.

Mr. DAVIS. Will the honorable Senator permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. JOHNSON. Certainly.

Mr. DAVIS. I assume, and a great many gentlemen do with me, that the President has performed a great many unauthorized and illegal acts for which he is responsible in our courts of justice to the persons injured. Does the honorable Senator contend that the passage of an act by Congress ratifying all those acts of the President, indemnifying him, and attempting to save him harmless and irresponsible for those acts, would have the effect of making those acts valid and legal?

Mr. JOHNSON. Certainly, but not in the general, sweeping terms the honorable member states. They cannot justify the President in doing what neither President nor Congress together could do; but so far as the President has done acts which Congress could have authorized him in advance to do, then their subsequent legislation confirming what he has done will place such acts precisely upon the footing in which this particular act will be placed if we pass the resolution upon your table.

Mr. DAVIS. Does the honorable Senator assume the position that private rights may be forfeited in that way; that the President may make an encroachment upon private rights against law, and for which he would be responsible in our courts, and for which he would be responsible even if there was an act of Congress authorizing him at the time to perform those acts? Does he assume the position that where the President does those acts without any authority of law, and becomes a trespasser and a wrong-doer, he may be indemnified and rendered harmless by Congress afterward passing laws to ratify those acts? Do I understand the honorable Senator to assume that position?

Mr. JOHNSON. I do not wish to be misunderstood; and I am sure the honorable member does not desire to misunderstand me, and still less to misrepresent me.

Mr. DAVIS. Most certainly not.

Mr. JOHNSON. What I mean to say is this: that everything which the President of the United States could do, as Commander-in-Chief of the Army, being such because he is President, in the execution and carrying on of this war, if Congress by legislation had authorized him to do it in advance, he is to be considered as having properly done it if Congress afterward by legislation sanctions it. If the honorable member will consult the opinions of the Supreme Court since the war commenced he will find that there is hardly a judge upon the tribunal who has not gone to that extent—not one. Whether a particular act was right or not will be decided hereafter when the question arises. There are some acts which the President may have perpetrated—I do not know that there are any such—which will not be protected by any legislation in the nature of indemnity which Congress may subsequently have adopted; but they are only such acts as Congress themselves could not have authorized.

The honorable member says that the President has no right to create a state of war. Suppose England invades the United States and the President meets her at the threshold, calls around him all the military force that he can have, and fights battles: will the honorable member say that the President had no right to do so, that all his acts were void; that he has committed murder, because there could be no war legitimately existing in the United States, and no authority in him to carry on a war or to kill upon the battle-field, without an antecedent act of Congress declaring that a state of war existed? I am sure he would not; and yet construe the Constitution by its words and you would suppose that a state of war cannot exist as between the United States and any foreign Government until Congress shall declare it. Those words are to be taken with a qualification. War is an existing fact. Does it exist, or does it not exist? England has the same right to make war that we have; and if England, either when Congress is in session or in the recess, thinks proper to commit an act of hostility against the United States, it is not only the President's right, but his duty to meet it, and the conflict becomes war, not by virtue of any declaration of war on the part of Congress, but by virtue of the fact; and if my friend will read the decision of the majority of the court in the prize cases, he will find that that doctrine is recognized throughout. The court say that they cannot shut their eyes to the actual condition of the country before Congress passed its act of the 13th of July, 1861; they cannot close their eyes to the fact that eight or ten or more States had claimed the power of going out of the Union, had organized a separate government, and were arraying within their own borders large armies and meeting the armies of the United States upon the battle-field. That creates war, whether Congress says that war exists or whether Congress should say that war did not exist. That is what the Supreme Court have said.

But it has nothing, perhaps, to do with the particular question before the Senate now. The question is, whether the Executive, who is the sole representative of the United States as between the United States and foreign Governments, having given a notice which he had no right to give under the Constitution of the United States, but which we are willing to take advantage of, may not, as between him and ourselves, be set right by our passing this resolution which says that that notice is to be just as effective and operative, and considered as having been given under precisely the same authority that it would have if, instead of passing the resolution now, we had passed it before the 23d of November, and authorized him to give the notice.

Mr. WILSON. When the President gave this notice the condition of the country was such that I have no doubt he felt it to be a high public duty. As it has been given, it is now proposed to ratify it, and I shall vote to ratify it; but if it were an original question to-day, with the lights I have, I would not vote for it. I see that this resolution talks about the establishment of one or more navy-yards on the lakes.

Mr. SUMNER. Oh, no.

Mr. WILSON. I beg your pardon. I find in the preamble to the resolution these words:

And whereas the vast interests of commerce upon the northwestern waters, and the security of cities and towns situated on their American borders, manifestly require the establishment of one or more navy-yards wherein ships may be fitted and prepared for naval warfare.

That is the House proposition. I expect this resolution to pass, and I suppose we are to have a call for the establishment of several navy-yards, and then a large number of fortifications, and millions and tens of millions of dollars are to follow the passage of this resolution. I do not believe there is need of any of it.

At the time this notice was given, the condition of affairs on the frontiers of Canada was very bad. The condition of the country to-day, the change in public sentiment there, all satisfy me that there is no need of any of this great expenditure nor this great anxiety. But the President of the United States has given the notice; it has been accepted; it is thought here that we ought to ratify it as far as Congress is concerned; and therefore I shall vote for it. But, sir, I warn Senators against what we are to have hereafter, and that is, a raid on the Treasury of the United States for vast expenditures of money along these inland seas. That I do not believe is necessary. If the time shall come when there is to be a war between us and Canada, I believe our people will flock over the lines everywhere, and that all opposition there will be brushed away in a few hours. Believing that, I must confess I do not see the wisdom of doing what I see is expressed in the House resolution, and what I know is to come, that we are to have calls here for a large number of navy-yards and heavy expenditures on the inland seas of the country.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I shall not vote for this joint resolution, and my action will be founded on this consideration: while we are in our own domestic difficulties, I do not intend to give any vote in this body which may be misconstrued by foreign nations. I am one of those who believe that foreign nations have treated us in our present troubles with great consideration; that they have not been unjust to us. I regretted to see an amendment adopted the other day to the consular and diplomatic appropriation bill inserting the words "republic of" before "Mexico," because I thought I saw that that might lead to disastrous consequences. We know that the Government of Great Britain has been accused by the press of the country with being unkind to us and with dealing harshly by us; we know that the Government of France has also been charged by the public press, and by some American statesmen, with being unkind to us; but give this notice, and how will it be interpreted? It is said that there are persons in this country who desire a foreign war. However much I regret the present deplorable civil war, in my place in the Senate of the United States I cannot give any vote or utter any word that shall be a pretext to any foreign nation of having just quarrel, or supposed just quarrel, with us. For these reasons I shall vote against this joint resolution.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, a state of war is a state of active strife between two nations. There is but one power in the United States that can legitimately change our condition of peace toward other Powers, and that is Congress. Congress is the only power to declare war. What do these gentlemen propose to do? They propose to take up a wholly invalid act of the President, and to give it validity and effect by this ratification. What is that act? It is to terminate a treaty which is to be terminated, not by the President, but by the United States, by the express terms of the treaty itself. I hold that is as much within the power and competence of the President, to change the condition of our country from a state of peace to a state of war with England, as it is for him to terminate a treaty with England, which, by its terms, is to be terminated by the United States, and which necessarily involves the power of the termination of that treaty by the act of the Congress of the United States, both the legislative and the war-making power.

I admit that one nation may make a war upon another; England may make war upon us, and if she does so a state of war exists between the United States and Great Britain; but that is an evasion of the question. The question is this: what authority in the Government of the United States can change our condition of peace with Great Britain or with any Power to a state of war? The President is not the power. The only power that can legitimately change the relation of peace on the part of the United States toward England, so far as the United States is concerned, is Congress.

Now, sir, in relation to this treaty by analogy: the treaty may be terminated by either of the parties. The question arises, how is it to be terminated by the United States? Not by the act of the President. Until my honorable friend from Maryland suggested his doubt on the subject I thought it was conceded universally that the act of the President to terminate this treaty was wholly invalid, that it would have no effect, no operation, whatever, until it was adopted by Congress; it then would become the act of Congress, but, as I maintain, from the time that Congress did the act, and not from the time that the President attempted to perform it. It seems to me it would be just as legitimate and operative for the President to decide a case which ought to be decided by the Supreme Court, and then for the Supreme Court, by its mandate or judgment adopting the decision which the President had given in the case, to endeavor to give validity and effect to that decision from the time the President had so decided it, as it would be to terminate this treaty by attempting to ratify and confirm a void, illegal, unconstitutional, and unauthorized act of the President.

Mr. FARWELL. I agree entirely with the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. Wilson] upon this subject, and I regret exceedingly that the Committee on Foreign Relations, instead of reporting this resolution, did not bring in a resolution asking the President of the United States to invite England to renew this clause of the treaty which it is proposed to terminate. It has not been the policy of this Government to have large naval establishments; and I hold that it is not good policy to introduce or inaugurate measures that shall oblige us to keep up a large naval establishment upon the lakes.

What is our condition upon the lakes? We own almost the entire commerce of the lakes. We have a vast number of steamers which could be fitted almost in a day into effective war vessels. England has but few there. To be sure, it will be argued that England has the Welland canal through which she can bring up her gunboats into the lakes; but with our vast military superiority on the land, and England being obliged to transport her soldiers some three thousand miles across the ocean, except what little force she has in Canada, would Senators fear any gunboats coming through the Welland canal? How long do you think it would be after a cloud of war with England should appear before we should have possession of the Welland canal, before we should be able to block up the Welland canal, and prevent any vessels passing through it from the ocean into the lakes? I should have no fear at all on that score.

I think, as the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. Wilson] has said, that this measure will result in great drafts upon the Treasury to build unnecessary, useless vessels upon the lakes that are more likely to involve us in trouble with Great Britain than to do us any good; but as the notice has been given, I shall vote to ratify that notice, although I doubt very much (and I observed carefully that the honorable Senator from Maryland expressed no opinion on that point, but rather on the other hand expressed a doubt) whether it is necessary to ratify this notice. The Constitution provides that the President shall make treaties, providing two thirds of the Senate concur; and the same clause in the Constitution provides that he shall appoint foreign ministers and other officers. It does not say that he shall not remove them without the consent of the Senate. It requires their consent for their appointment; but the practice always has been, and I believe nobody doubts the right of the President to remove foreign ministers or other officers without consulting the Senate upon the subject. I believe, and if the honorable Senator from Maryland had gone far enough to state an opinion on that subject I think he would say, that the President has the right to terminate any treaty which by the treaty itself may be terminated upon giving notice. However this may be, I propose to vote at this stage for the ratification of the act of the President, and only say that I hope the President will institute proceedings or a commission with Great Britain to renew this article at an early day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. ANTHONY in the chair.) The question is, Shall the amendment be engrossed, and the joint resolution read a third time?

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed, and the joint resolution to be read a third time. It was read the third time, and passed; and its title was amended so as to read: "A joint resolution to terminate the treaty of 1817, regulating the naval force on the lakes."

THANKS FOR THE VICTORY AT FORT FISHER.

Mr. DIXON. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to introduce two joint resolutions, one giving the thanks of Congress to Rear Admiral Porter, and the other to Major General Terry, for the recent brilliant victory at Fort Fisher; and I will observe that although these distinguished officers were jointly engaged in this victory, I have followed the precedents in proposing to give them the thanks of Congress in separate resolutions.

By unanimous consent leave was granted to introduce the joint resolutions; and they were severally read twice by their titles, and referred as indicated below:

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 98) tendering the thanks of Congress to Major General Alfred H. Terry and to the officers and men under his command for their gallantry and good conduct in the recent capture of Fort Fisher—to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 99) tendering the thanks of Congress to Rear Admiral David D. Porter and to the officers, petty officers, seamen, and marines under his command for their gallantry and good conduct in the recent capture of Fort Fisher—to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

MILITARY SERVICE.

Mr. WILSON. I move now to take up the bill that was laid aside on the motion of my colleague this morning.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 583) to amend the twenty-first section of an act entitled "An act to define the pay and emoluments of certain officers of the Army, and for other purposes," approved July 17, 1862.

ISAAC R. DILLER.

Mr. FOSTER. I move that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. DAVIS. Will the honorable Senator from Connecticut allow me to call up a private claim that was laid over yesterday?

Mr. FOSTER. Certainly; I withdraw the motion.

Mr. DAVIS. It is House bill No. 94, for the relief of Isaac R. Diller. I will ask that the report be read. The reading of it was called for yesterday.

Mr. GRIMES. The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. Hale] who called for the reading of the report is not in the Chamber, and I therefore suggest that the bill had better go over until tomorrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kentucky insist on his motion?

Mr. DAVIS. As the Senator from New Hampshire is not in the Chamber I will let it be passed over informally.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

On motion of Mr. FOSTER, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business, and after some time spent therein the doors were reopened, and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, January 18, 1865.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. CHANNING. The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

INDIAN AFFAIRS.

The SPEAKER announced the following select committee on Indian affairs, in compliance with a resolution of the House of yesterday: Messrs. WINDOM, HUBBARD of Iowa, ROSS, HIGBY, and WORTHINGTON.

OVERLAND MAIL.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the Postmaster General, transmitting copies of papers referring to the overland mail route to California; which was ordered to be printed, and referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege. I noticed a few days ago in one of the accompanying documents of the message of the Governor of Kentucky, sent to the Legislature of that State on the 4th instant, that a commission had been appointed by the military commandant of the district of Kentucky to investigate certain alleged wrongs on the part of the commanding general in the first district of Kentucky. Among other charges in that paper is one against my colleague [Mr. ANDERSON] of a serious and damaging character. I feel it, therefore, a duty to myself, to the State, and to him, to have that matter inquired into here. I offer the following resolution:

Whereas in a public document dated Lexington, Kentucky, September, 1864, signed by Brigadier General Speed S. Fry and John Mason Brown, Colonel of the forty-fifth Kentucky volunteer infantry, transmitted to the Kentucky Legislature by Governor Thomas E. Bramlette with the message of January 4, 1865, Hon. Lucien Anderson, a member of this body, is charged with corruption, bribery, and malfeasance in office: Therefore,

Resolved, That a committee of three members of this House be appointed by the Speaker to investigate said charges, with power to send for persons and papers, and report thereon.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I think that the committee should be enlarged to five members.

Mr. SMITH. I have no objection.

The resolution was modified accordingly, and then adopted.

RELIEF OF TEAMSTERS AND OTHERS.

Mr. BROWN, of West Virginia, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill for the relief of certain teamsters and other employes in the armies of the United States; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

COMMON SCHOOLS IN MISSOURI.

Mr. McCLURG, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill for the support of common schools in Missouri; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

AID TO MISSOURI RAILROAD COMPANIES.

Mr. McCLURG also, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill granting aid to certain railroad companies in Missouri; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

MARY A. LYON.

Mr. KASSON. There is on the Speaker's table a House bill granting an eight-dollar pension to a widow. It went to the Senate and was there modified in form and language, but not in substance; and I ask unanimous consent to take it from the Speaker's table for action.

No objection being made, the bill (H. R. No. 390) for the relief of Mary A. Lyon, with Senate amendments thereto, was taken from the Speaker's table for consideration.

The Senate amendment was to strike out all after the enacting clause, and insert a provision directing the Secretary of the Interior to place upon the pension roll the name of Mary A. Lyon, widow of Alfred M. Lyon, late a sutler in the twenty-third regiment of Iowa volunteers, but who volunteered as a private in company A of that regiment, and while serving in that capacity was mortally wounded at the battle of Black river, Mississippi, on the 17th of May, 1863, and died on the field; the pension to be at the rate of eight dollars per month, commencing on the 17th of May, 1863, and to continue during the widowhood of the pensioner.

The amendment was concurred in.

MILITARY IMPRISONMENTS.

Mr. GANSON, by unanimous consent, introduced the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Military Committee be, and they are hereby, directed to ascertain and report to this House as soon as possible the number of persons now confined in the Old Capitol and Carroll prisons; when such persons were respectively arrested and confined, and upon what charges their arrests were made; whether any of such persons are officers of the Army, and have been confined without a trial beyond the time in that respect prescribed by law or by the regulations in the military service; and whether any persons so in prison are confined without any written charges made against them; and whether there are any persons now in said prisons who have not had any trial; if so, to report the names of such persons, the time when they were arrested, and the alleged cause of their arrest respectively; and that the said committee be, and they are hereby, authorized to send for persons and papers.

ENROLLED BILLS.

Mr. COBB, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles, when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (H. R. No. 623) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for carrying the mails from the United States to foreign ports, and for other purposes," approved March 25, 1864; and An act (H. R. No. 203) for the relief of Jacob Weber.

COMMUNICATION WITH THE TERRITORIES.

Mr. RICE, of Maine, by unanimous consent, introduced a joint resolution to facilitate communication with the Territories of New Mexico, Arizona, and Colorado; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Territories.

FORTIFICATION BILL.

Mr. STEVENS, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported a bill making appropriations for the construction, preservation, and repairs of certain fortifications and other works of defense, for the year ending 30th June, 1866; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, made a special order for Friday next and from day to day until disposed of, and ordered to be printed.

ACTING ASSISTANT TREASURERS, ETC.

Mr. STEVENS also, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to provide for acting Assistant Treasurers or depositaries of the United States in certain cases; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. STEVENS. I ask that the bill may be now put upon its passage.

No objection being made, the House proceeded to the consideration of the bill, which provided that in case of the sickness or unavoidable absence of any Assistant Treasurer or depositary of the United States from his office, he may at his discretion authorize the chief clerk, or some other clerk employed therein, to act in his place and discharge the duties required by law of such Assistant Treasurer or depositary; provided the official bond given by the principal of the office shall be held to cover and apply to the clerk appointed by him to act in such cases; and provided further, that such acting officer for the time being shall be subject to all the liabilities and penalties prescribed by law for official misconduct of the Assistant Treasurer or depositary for whom he shall act.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. STEVENS moved that the vote by which the bill was passed be reconsidered; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SALARIES OF COAST SURVEY CLERKS.

Mr. STROUSE, by unanimous consent, introduced the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to inquire into the expediency of increasing the salaries of the clerks and employes of the United States Coast Survey Office in the city of Washington, so as to place said clerks and employes upon an equal footing with clerks of the same rank in the Treasury Department proper.

SORGHUM SYRUP, ETC.

Mr. EDGERTON, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Whereas the Commissioner of Internal Revenue has decided that under the internal revenue act, approved June 30, 1864, the manufactured products in syrup, molasses, or sugar, of sorghum or imphee are subject to a duty of five per cent. ad valorem, and it admits of question whether such construction of said act is in accordance with the intent of Congress: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to inquire into the expediency of so amending said act as that the same shall exempt from duty the said products of sorghum or imphee, and that said committee report by bill or otherwise.

COAL AND PETROLEUM OIL REFINERIES.

Mr. A. MYERS, by unanimous consent, introduced the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be requested to inquire into the expediency of classifying coal and petroleum oil refiners, so that those of small capacity shall pay less, and those of large capacity more licenses, than under existing laws.

COURTS IN NEVADA.

Mr. WILSON. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to report from the Committee on the Judiciary bill of the House No. 640, providing for a district and circuit court of the United States for the District of Nevada, and for other purposes, with an amendment in the nature of a substitute.

No objection was made, and the report was received, and the substitute read.

Mr. GANSON. I would like to ask the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] why he gives a salary of $5,000 to this judge, when, in the old States, they only get $2,500 or $3,000?

Mr. WILSON. I will state that the Committee on the Judiciary, from the representations made by the gentleman from Nevada, [Mr. WORTHINGTON,] and other persons, were induced to believe that, with the present cost of living in Nevada, a judge there could hardly support himself on a less amount than $5,000. Whether a provision ought not to be made by which the salary may be reduced in the future, I am not prepared to say. I believe that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURN] intends to offer an amendment to that effect.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. There may be something in the views which the gentleman from Iowa presents. I suppose that Nevada is the most expensive Territory that we have at present and that the cost of living there is immense. I think, however, that a salary of $5,000 is too much even at present, but I will concede that provided the gentleman from Iowa will consent that after 1867 the salary of this judge shall be $3,500 and no more.

Mr. GANSON. Can the salary be reduced, under the Constitution, during the term of office?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. There can be no objection to fixing it as this bill fixes it. We can fix the salary at $5,000 for the present, and say that it shall be diminished after a certain time. My amendment is to add to section six of the substitute the following proviso:

Provided, That after the 1st day of January, 1867, the annual salary of the said judge shall be $3,500, and no more.

Mr. KERNAN. The object of the provision of the Constitution, I presume, was to make the judges independent of Congress as to their compensation; but if we can say that their compensation shall be so much now but shall be reduced at our pleasure, they will hold their salaries at our pleasure.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. This amendment does not reduce their salaries, it merely fixes them.

Mr. KERNAN. I understand that, but if we can fix the salary of the judge in this constitutional way, we can say that he shall have a compensation of $5,000 until such time as we change his salary and put every judge in the position that we shall have the right in the future either to continue the old salary or to reduce his salary at our pleasure.

The Constitution seems to provide that the judges of the United States shall have a fixed compensation, which shall not be reduced during their continuance in office. As I understand this amendment, it provides that the salary of this judge shall be so much for a time and so much hereafter.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. The amendment only fixes his salary.

Mr. KERNAN. True, but if he makes himself personally popular with Congress, his salary will be continued under the old limitation. I do not say that this proposition is unconstitutional, but I desire to call the attention of the House to the point.

Mr. SPALDING. I am opposed to the adoption of this amendment, as I am also opposed to the passage of the bill in its original form. I wish to state for the information of the House, that most of our district judges in the western States have no more than $2,000 per annum, and I know that they transact ten times the amount of business per annum that this judge could possibly be called upon to perform in the next ten years. I know, also, that those judges are all coming before us for increased salary, and this bill, fixing the salary of this judge at $5,000, is only the entering wedge to an increase of salaries to all our district judges. Now, sir, if the gentleman is willing to modify his bill so as to give this district judge a salary of $3,000 per annum, I shall be content; but in any other shape, I shall object to it and vote against it.

Mr. WORTHINGTON. I regret very much, Mr. Speaker, that gentlemen who are not acquainted with the disadvantages under which all those who reside in Nevada labor, and the difficulties by which we are surrounded, should seek to determine by an improper standard what is reasonable compensation for a judicial officer performing the duties required under this bill. When the act was passed by Congress providing for the organization of the Territory of Nevada, the compensation of these judges was fixed at $1,800 per annum. Upon the organization of the court, the Legislature of that young Territory, seeing the necessity of doing something that would give to those judges a compensation adequate to the duties they were required to perform, increased the compensation $4,200, payable in gold coin, giving them a compensation of $6,000 per annum for the performance of their judicial duties. The judges of the supreme court of Nevada to-day receive $6,000 a year, payable in gold coin; and there is not a district judge in the State of Nevada who receives less than $5,000, payable in gold coin.

It must be borne in mind, Mr. Speaker, that the people of Nevada are necessarily and almost exclusively a mining population. The agricultural resources of that State are comparatively insignificant. Therefore we are entirely dependent upon what we import four hundred miles from California on the one side, and five hundred miles from Salt Lake upon the other. We raise very few vegetables. We are altogether dependent for subsistence upon what we receive from abroad. I will inform gentlemen who are not acquainted with that country, that it requires the exercise of the utmost economy to enable any one to live in that State on less than $5,000 per year. Now, sir, when you propose to give to a judicial officer $3,000 or $3,500, you really cut down his compensation to some $1,750 in the present depreciated condition of the currency of the country. The result will be that you will not get anybody to take the position who will either discharge its duties or reflect credit upon the Government.

A gentleman from the western country [Mr. SPALDING] has suggested that not more than $2,500 is paid to any judicial officer there, and that judges there do much more work than will be required of a judge in the State of Nevada. But it must be recollected that because of the agricultural products of the gentleman's section the judges are enabled to live much more cheaply than can such officers in Nevada. Nor is the gentleman correct when he says that those western judges do ten times more business than will be required of a judge in Nevada. Nearly all the corporations in the State of Nevada are foreign corporations, composed of persons from abroad, who have their capital invested there, and these will seek a Federal court for the determination of their disputed rights. I will venture the assertion that there is no gentleman who has ever lived in that country who does not appreciate the force of what I say.

Now, sir, the district judge of Oregon receives $3,000 a year; yet the people of Oregon, because of its great agricultural as well as mineral resources, are enabled to live upon much less than the people of Nevada, because of the facts I have already stated. The Government to-day does not give sufficient to pay any of the Federal officers in the State of Nevada; and there is not a Federal functionary in the State, and never has been since the organization of the Territory, who has not gone in debt in discharging the duties of his office.

I therefore hope, Mr. Speaker, that this amendment will not prevail, and that members of this House will appreciate the necessity of giving in this case such a compensation as will be adequate, both with reference to the circumstances of the country and the duties to be performed by the judge.

Mr. WILSON. I demand the previous question on the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. WASHBURN.]

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the amendment was rejected.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I move to amend by striking out "$5,000," and inserting "$3,500."

Mr. WORTHINGTON. I demand tellers. Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. WORTHINGTON and KERNAN were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 52, noes 42.

So the amendment was adopted.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I move to reconsider the vote just taken; and also move that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON. I desire to offer an amendment, not as coming from the committee, although I have no doubt that the committee would concur in it. I move to amend by adding to the eighth section the following proviso:

Provided, That the clerk in each of said districts shall be allowed by the Secretary of the Interior to retain of the fees and emoluments received by him as clerk of both courts, over and above the necessary expenses of his offices, and necessary clerk hire included, to be audited and allowed by the proper accounting officers of the Treasury, only such sum per annum as is now allowed by law to the clerk of one of said courts, and shall pay the remainder into the public Treasury under oath, in the manner and under the regulations now prescribed by law.

Mr. COLE, of California. Mr. Speaker, this is a matter affecting the judicial system of the Pacific coast, and affecting it seriously, and it comes up without previous consideration on the part of the House. I therefore move that the further consideration of the subject be postponed till next Tuesday. There are strong reasons for this postponement, but I will not detain the House to-day by stating them.

Mr. WILSON. I hope that the motion will not prevail.

Mr. COLE, of California. The gentleman from Nevada [Mr. WORTHINGTON] will be back by that time.

Mr. WORTHINGTON. Every member has a copy of the printed bill upon his desk, and I hope the House will act on it to-day. I shall be obliged necessarily to be absent from my seat for several days. I want the matter disposed of at once. We have in Nevada a complete State organization, but we have no Federal court, and there is necessity for immediate action so that we may have a Federal court.

Mr. COLE, of California. Mr. Speaker, it is true that the bill has been printed, but not as it has been amended by the Committee on the Judiciary. Alterations have been recommended by that committee which have not been heretofore brought to the attention of the House; and it is for that, among other reasons, that I move the further consideration of the subject be postponed until Tuesday next.

I am willing to take any day that may suit the gentleman from Nevada. The bill does not take effect until April next, and there will be no detriment to the public service by the postponement. I am willing to take any day that may suit the gentleman from Nevada or the House.

Mr. WILSON. This day suits the Committee on the Judiciary. I demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the motion to postpone was disagreed to.

Mr. WILSON. I demand the previous question on the bill and pending amendments.

Mr. COLE, of California. I have an amendment to submit.

Mr. WILSON. I withdraw the demand for the previous question.

Mr. Wilson's amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COLE, of California. I move to insert in section seven, after the word "Oregon," the words "and the southern district of California."

Mr. WILSON. I hope that the amendment will not prevail, and for this reason: by the provisions of the substitute reported from the Committee on the Judiciary the clerk of the circuit court will act also as the clerk of the district court, so that there will be only one clerk for the two courts. The amendment will provide for two clerks, one for the district court and one for the circuit court, consequently it will cost twice as much in the compensation of clerks.

Mr. COLE, of California. The gentleman is mistaken in his statement. It does not relate to the clerk at all, but only to the compensation of the marshal and the district attorney. Certainly there can be no reason for including Oregon, and not the southern district of California, where the parties are less compensated than in Oregon.

Mr. WILSON. I oppose the amendment, and demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

The amendment was disagreed to.

The substitute of the committee was adopted; and then the bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WILSON moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MILITARY IMPRISONMENTS.

Mr. STEVENS. I move to reconsider the vote by which the House this morning adopted the resolution submitted by the gentleman from New York [Mr. GANSON] in reference to military imprisonments. I do it because there was a misunderstanding of its character. I thought that it was a resolution of inquiry, and I now find that it is absolute and directory.

Mr. GANSON. The resolution directs them to investigate and inquire.

The resolution was read.

Mr. STEVENS. If my motion be agreed to I will move to amend by instructing the committee to inquire into the expediency, &c.

Mr. GANSON. I would like the gentleman to state why he wants to do that. If there is any information obtained by this committee which ought not to be disclosed, under the rules we can go into secret session. I do not think any harm can result.

Mr. STEVENS. I do not like secret sessions.

Mr. GANSON. I know the case of one of my constituents, a captain, who has been confined in prison since the 27th of October last without charges being preferred against him, and after he had served three years and a half in the Army. I called upon him on Saturday and was permitted to inquire into his case in the presence of a turnkey, who insisted upon sitting between him and myself and listening to our conversation. I felt it to be a personal indignity, and I am determined that the position of this prisoner shall be investigated if there is any power in this House to have it done.

Mr. STEVENS. I am sorry that the gentleman should have felt a personal indignity, but there is this compensation, that the turnkey, doubtless, felt very much honored, but I think that if it is proper to inquire into this matter the Committee on Military Affairs will inquire into it.

Mr. GANSON. I will state to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that I submitted this resolution to the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, and that it meets with his approval.

Mr. STEVENS. Then there is no objection to the committee inquiring into the expediency.

Mr. GANSON. I am satisfied as to the expediency, and I presume the House is.

Mr. STEVENS. Perhaps the House may be, but I am not quite satisfied.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I ask that the resolution be again read.

The Clerk read the resolution.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, I do not see why that resolution should not stand. I suppose it is the right of the House of Representatives, and more than its right, its duty, to see that the liberty of the citizen is not unlawfully violated. If persons have been confined in these prisons beyond the period allowed by law, we are entitled to know it that we may apply a remedy. If persons are there confined, under the discretionary order of the President, which discretion we have conferred upon him by the law suspending the writ of habeas corpus, that is an adequate and conclusive reply to any investigation. If any officer of the Army has been arrested, not under the discretionary power conferred upon the President, but in the administration of the ordinary laws for the government of the Army, there is a law that entitles him to trial or to his discharge at the expiration of a certain period of time if he be not tried; and I understand the gentleman from New York [Mr. GANSON] to have said that within his knowledge there is one case of that kind.

Mr. GANSON. I know of two such cases.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. The honorable gentleman states that he knows of two such cases. My impression is that it is likely there are other cases of this kind; and one such case justifies and requires the adoption of the resolution.

There is another ground upon which, in my judgment, it ought to stand. The law suspending the writ of habeas corpus in some respects, in my judgment, too much limited the discretion which ought to have been confided to the President when that writ was suspended; yet, being the law of the land, it must be obeyed, and I think—I had almost said with my knowledge—it has not been obeyed.

The reason for the suspension of the writ of habeas corpus was not to enable the President to arrest persons guilty of any crime known to the law and punishable by law, for which adequate evidence existed to carry the case before the courts of the United States, but it was because in times of revolution and public danger there are persons of dangerous influence engaged in plots and preparing insurrections, centers of secret information and communication with the enemy, known but not proved, or so imperfectly developed as not to be, perhaps, the subject of criminal process, yet so dangerous and so pressing as to require swifter and freer measures of prevention than judicial forms afford—discretionary executive power, precautionary, not punitive; executive, and not judicial—and it is this power which the act suspending the habeas corpus has confided to the President. When the safety of the Republic requires it, the right of the citizen to judicial guarantees must be subordinate to the public safety. This is a case of adverse dangers, where a choice of evils alone is possible; and this discretion can be nowhere so safely vested as in the President. But this great discretionary power over the liberty of the citizen is not a substitute for the administration of the criminal law. It is a grave abuse to use it for any such purpose. It is political in its character, merely precautionary, to avert dangers, not to punish crimes; it looks to the future, not to the past; it is in war and on grave political dangers what security to keep the peace is in the daily administration of justice.

When the writ of habeas corpus is suspended, it is suspended in order to deal with cases that cannot, in the nature of things, be dealt with before the ordinary courts of justice; for they deal with acts and the past, while this prevents the accomplishment of purposes and looks to the future.

The law which was passed, while it suspended the writ of habeas corpus, suspended it under limitations which, very possibly, may, nay must, in many cases where the exercise of the discretion is proper, defeat its end by discharging the prisoner before the danger is past. But being a law, it must be obeyed. If it take away or limit a discretion necessary to be vested in the President for the purposes of that act, I am ready here to-day to modify that law. But while it is the law let it be obeyed.

That law requires that any person who has been arrested under the order of the President or of any military officer—events that must, in the course of such a war as this, occur, and legitimately occur, every day—may be held for a certain time in confinement. But when persons are arrested in a State where the courts of the United States are open—where there is a government recognized by the Government of the United States, and there is no rebellion disturbing the ordinary administration of the law—the act provides that the names of all persons arrested shall be reported to the judges of the circuit and district courts of the United States, and after a grand jury shall have once met and adjourned without finding an indictment against them, they shall be discharged, unless they are prisoners of war, or refuse the oath of allegiance, or fail to give security if required by the court.

Now, it will be readily seen that that will apply a remedy in the case of a very great number of arrests—justifiable, it may be, at the time when they are made, but not justifiable in their prolonged imprisonment. It is equally certain that there may be cases in which obedience to that law may seriously impair the authority conferred upon the President for great public purposes. For there may be persons, as in the case of Mr. Vallandigham—I refer to his case simply for the sake of illustration, and without meaning to express any opinion upon his guilt or innocence in any way—there may be persons of great influence, supposed to entertain sinister designs, plotting and conspiring against the Government, yet not within the range of an indictment, not subject to trial before a court, yet the control of whose persons may be vital to the safety of the people. A person of that sort would, under the existing law, if it be obeyed, (and while it is the law it should be obeyed, and this House ought to compel obedience to it,) be discharged after the first meeting of a grand jury, should that grand jury fail to indict him; and it could not indict him for an intent without an act, and an act defined to be a crime and proved by legal testimony.

Now, I am ready to-day to vote to enlarge the liberty which is conferred upon the President in the manner described by me; but I shall vote with the gentleman from New York to stop the abuse of continued, perpetual, and reiterated disobedience to that law, while it is the law upon the statute-book, disobedience not excused by any public necessity, not in cases when the purpose of the act are defined by its provisions. Sir, there are not a few persons in illegal confinement in Maryland, and in many of the northern States, some on no specified charges, some on illegal convictions by military commissions, some illegally held for trial before illegal military commissions, not liable to their jurisdiction, for offenses punishable by the laws of the United States upon indictment before the courts of the United States, and not cognizable by military commissions; and many for acts not criminal under any law of the United States; yet I know of no such list as the law requires ever being furnished to the judge, nor of any one discharged on his order, though more than one grand jury has met and adjourned. I say let this committee go and examine the facts and spread them before the American people; and then let them say, when they know the facts, whether there exists any law upon the statute-book of the United States that authorizes the confinement of any American citizen not in the military service, in a loyal State, upon the judgment of a military commission, at the pleasure of subordinate officers of the Government, or even by the order of the President, contrary to the law conferring and limiting the discretion.

For these purposes, sir, I shall vote against reconsidering the resolution, with great pleasure.

Mr. COX. I would like, Mr. Speaker, to have read for the information of the House the first and second sections of the law to which the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. DAVIS] has just referred; I mean the law which regulates the suspension of the writ of habeas corpus, which lays down expressly the effect of such suspension, and directs that the Secretary of State and the Secretary of War shall report to the judges of the circuit and district courts of the United States the names of prisoners. I should like also to enlarge the scope of this resolution so as to inquire why it is that that law has not been obeyed, and whether there has been any attempt made to carry out the law, by the indictment of the persons whose duty it is under that law to report the names of those who are in prison. I would like to know whether the district attorneys of the United States have done their duty; whether such lists have ever been furnished, or whether the law made by the American Congress is a dead letter; whether the executive department, even the legal portion of the executive department, can set aside our laws when they please for their own purposes.

I do not make these remarks without having cases in my eye—not alone the distinguished case referred to by the gentleman from Maryland, the case of Mr. Vallandigham. There are other cases; cases in which the Secretary of the Treasury, under some peculiar "higher law" unknown to our statutes, has, for purposes connected with the revenue, or to protect the issue of greenbacks or shipplasters against counterfeiting, caused persons to be arrested by the military power. And there are now men in the Capitol prison, almost within the sound of the voice of at least some of the members of this House, who are kept there month after month on the mere order of the Solicitor of the Treasury on the charge of forgery. Applications have been made by their friends again and again to have their persons removed to the proper jurisdictions in the States and districts where the law is unimpeded by the military authority, and no attention has been paid to the request. They still remain there. There is a case from my own district of an old man who has been suspected of counterfeiting. He could be released at any moment by the Solicitor of the Treasury, if he chose. Is there no relief for these abuses? Shall we not be permitted to inquire about them with a view to future legislation?

Mr. Speaker, I should like, in order that the House may fully understand what the law is, how it has been infringed, what penalties are provided for the infraction of it, to have the first and second sections of an act relating to habeas corpus, regulating judicial proceedings in certain cases, read.

The Clerk read, as follows:

"Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That, during the present rebellion, the President of the United States, whenever, in his judgment, the public safety may require it, is authorized to suspend the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus in any case throughout the United States, or any part thereof. And whenever and wherever the said privilege shall be suspended, as aforesaid, no military or other officer shall be compelled, in answer to any writ of habeas corpus, to return the body of any person or persons detained by him by the authority of the President; but upon the certificate, under oath, of the officer having charge of any one so detained that such person is detained by him as a prisoner under the authority of the President, further proceedings under the writ of habeas corpus shall be suspended by the judge or court having issued the said writ so long as said suspension by the President shall remain in force and said rebellion continue.

"Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of State and the Secretary of War be, and they are hereby, directed, as soon as may be practicable, to furnish to the judges of the circuit and district courts of the United States, and of the District of Columbia, a list of the names of all persons, citizens of States in which the administration of the laws has continued unimpaired in the said Federal courts, who are now, or may hereafter be, held as prisoners of the United States, by order or authority of the President of the United States, or either of said Secretaries, in any fort, arsenal, or other place, as State or political prisoners, or otherwise as prisoners of war, the said list to contain the names of all those who reside in the respective jurisdiction of said judges, or who may be deemed by the said Secretaries, or either of them, to have violated any law of the United States in any of said jurisdictions, and also the date of each arrest; the Secretary of State to furnish a list of such persons as are imprisoned by the order or authority of the President, acting through the State Department; and the Secretary of War a list of such as are imprisoned by order or authority of the President, acting through the Department of War. And in all cases where a grand jury, having attended any of said courts having jurisdiction in the premises, after the passage of this act, and after the furnishing of said list, as aforesaid, has terminated its session without finding an indictment, or presentment, or other proceeding against any such person, it shall be the duty of the judge of said court forthwith to make an order that any such prisoner desiring a discharge from said imprisonment be brought before him to be discharged; and every officer of the United States having custody of such prisoner is hereby directed immediately to obey and execute said judge's order; and in case he shall delay or refuse so to do, he shall be subject to indictment for a misdemeanor, and be punished by a fine of not less than $500, and imprisonment in the common jail for a period not less than six months, in the discretion of the court: Provided, however, That no person shall be discharged by virtue of the provisions of this act until after he or she shall have taken an oath of allegiance to the Government of the United States, and to support the Constitution thereof; and that he or she will not hereafter in any way encourage or give aid and comfort to the present rebellion or the supporters thereof: And provided also, That the judge or court before whom such person may be brought, before discharging him or her from imprisonment, shall have power, on examination of the case, and, if the public safety shall require it, shall be required to cause him or her to enter into recognizance, with or without surety, in a sum to be fixed by said judge or court, to keep the peace and be of good behavior toward the United States and its citizens, and from time to time, and at such times as such judge or court may direct, appear before said judge or court, to be further dealt with according to law as the circumstances may require. And it shall be the duty of the district attorneys of the United States to attend to such examination before the judge."

Mr. COFFROTH. Mr. Speaker, I know that Lieutenant Nelson, a brave and gallant officer from my district, has been confined in the Capitol prison for four long months. By permission of the Secretary of War I went on Monday last to see him, and he told me that there had been no charges up to this time preferred against him, and that he did not know why he was imprisoned. He had served in the Army two years; he had been wounded and had a limb amputated, and he was hobbling through that prison on crutches. In cases of this kind, I think it is right for this House to carry out this resolution, and make it compulsory upon the committee to examine into this matter and let the people of the country know why their friends are detained in these prisons.

Mr. COX. The remarks which I have submitted to the House have not been made with any partisan view, nor to find fault unnecessarily with any of the Executive Departments. This law which has been read here was not passed with the concurrence of this side of the House, but it was passed by gentlemen upon the other side. It was their law. They took the liberty of suspending the writ of habeas corpus, but they took care at the same time to qualify the suspension in such a way as to guard against the undue, illegal, irresponsible arrest of persons, so that there might be a remedy at least for improper arrests. I ask gentlemen upon the other side to sustain their own law and let this investigation go on so that we may see where it has been violated. The gentleman from Pennsylvania has first mentioned one case, and other cases have been suggested to me by members upon this side of the House since I rose, where there was adequate punishment for crimes, such as counterfeiting, by the civil tribunals in States where the laws remain unimpeded by military operations. What will you do? Is there to be no law in the free States? Is a man not to be entitled to a fair trial when he is suspected of or arrested for counterfeiting, for instance? Shall he be held, confined in a loathsome prison, at the caprice of any man holding a military commission who chooses to lay his hand upon him? Shall there be no relief, and no information given with a view to such relief? Shall we not carry out the law which you yourselves enacted only two years ago?

Mr. GANSON. I introduced this resolution under a sense of duty. I knew that one of my constituents had been confined in the Capitol prison ever since the 27th of October last, who had faithfully served his country in the Army for three years and a half, and who had held the position of captain. He did not know why he was arrested. No charges were made against him, to his knowledge, and none have been made to this day. I was credibly informed that there were several other cases similar to that, both of civilians and officers and men in the Army. I therefore felt it my duty—and especially as these prisoners were within speaking distance of this Hall—to move to direct some committee, and I know of none who can discharge the duty more faithfully or more properly than the Committee on Military Affairs, to investigate the matter and report to the House whether we require any additional legislation upon the subject. I have no desire to find fault with any Department of the Government, or to criticize the action of the Government in any respect; but I do desire to know whether there are abuses of this kind, and if so, it is our duty, as the Representatives of the people, to rectify them by some positive legislation. I was informed by the chairman of the Military Committee that complaints of this character were so numerous that the committee was on the point of introducing a joint resolution to have a commission go over the entire country to investigate all the prisons in the land. This resolution is confined to the two prisons within speaking distance of this Capitol; and therefore, without any disrespect to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, I must move to lay his motion to reconsider on the table.

Mr. STEVENS. Will the gentleman withdraw that motion for a moment?

Mr. GANSON. Certainly.

Mr. STEVENS. The usual course in such cases is not to assume the facts, but to direct a committee to inquire into and report upon them. I cannot see any reason why the gentleman from New York, [Mr. GANSON,] having the ear of the Military Committee, should object to that same course now.

Mr. DAWES. What are assumed as facts?

Mr. STEVENS. It is assumed as a fact that various people are illegally imprisoned without knowing the charges against them.

Mr. DAWES. I do not know the exact phraseology of it, but I understand its scope to be to inquire whether the facts are so, and to report them to the House.

Mr. STEVENS. The whole resolution, as explained by the various speakers, and the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. DAVIS] especially, is censorious on the War Department. Now, if the Department deserve censure I am willing that it shall have it. But there may be several things that are not expedient to report up, that it may not be expedient at this moment to disclose except it were in secret committee, as the gentleman has said. If the usual form be observed of directing the Military Committee to inquire into the expediency of investigating these matters, I shall have no objection to the inquiry. But no one can deny that the passage of the resolution is a direct censure on the Department. I do not say that it was so intended, but I do say that it has that effect. However, if the gentleman from New York has no objection to letting me look into it more carefully, I will move to postpone the further consideration of the matter.

Mr. GANSON. I have an objection. I insist on the motion to lay on the table.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland, and Mr. KASSON addressed the Chair.

Mr. GANSON. I yield the floor for a moment to the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. KASSON.]

Mr. KASSON. I desire to add my testimony, so far as it may go—and will give my reasons for it, to the propriety of the investigation proposed. It would constitute not the slightest objection with me, resting my opinion on facts within my own knowledge, that it may imply censure on one Department of the Government; for I believe that the time has arrived when it is due to the people of this country that Congress shall examine the extent and manner in which the power of the Secretary of War is exercised. I state it on my responsibility as a member of the House that an order taken from the President to the Secretary of War, for a certain object has been met with the reply "I shall not do it, sir;" and when an explanation has been asked it has been met by the reply, "I do not propose to argue the question; I am responsible to the President, and to him alone, for my conduct." When a Representative of the people is met by a responsible officer of the Government in that way, it constitutes with me no objection to a proposition that it may possibly imply censure on the head of an executive Department.

Now, sir, I urge the adoption of this resolution for the reason that when an officer has it in his mental constitution to shut off from the Representatives of the people every information from his Department, as the Secretary of War has done by general order, except it be given by himself or on his own express order—no matter if the information even be whether some poor woman's only son has been killed in battle—and when, in addition to that, he positively denies his responsibility to the Congress of the United States, and affirms it to be to the President alone, remitting us to our own forum, I think the time has come when Congress should inquire how far that arbitrary habit of mind extends, touching the liberties of citizens throughout this broad land.

For myself I hope that this committee may be raised; and I will be the first to vote for the exculpation of the Secretary of War if he be found innocent of aggression on any persons in the Army or out of the Army. I wish it to be understood by the Army of the United States that although its officers may be compelled to tremble at his power as that of an absolute dictator, the Congress of the United States thinks it right to inquire into the management of his Department where either the liberties of the people are concerned or the rights of gallant men in the Army may be denied to them.

One thing more: if he be the man he is charged with being, who could in June last have exchanged prisoners of war of the United States on terms recognized throughout all civilized nations, yet left ten or twenty thousand of our gallant men to perish in rebel pens during the last summer, again I find a reason why his administration of that Department should be investigated. I do not want the letters to increase on my table urging Congress to investigate some of these facts connected with the exchange of our soldiers in rebel hands. For the satisfaction of my own constituents, at least, I desire to have an investigation wherever the public interests may require it, and wherever the military rights of soldiers or the personal rights of citizens are involved.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I desire, Mr. Speaker, to say a single word by way of explanation in view of the remarks of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS.]

It seems to be considered by some gentlemen that this resolution is necessarily censorious on the President or some of his Secretaries. I do not know, sir, that that is exactly a fair inference.

There may be very many abuses connected with the prosecution of a war of this magnitude which have never been brought to the attention either of a Department or of the President. I think that there is nothing assumed on the face of the resolution excepting what is involved in the distinct statement of the gentleman who moves it, that there are at least two cases which, whatever may be the excuse or the reason standing behind them, are, as they appear to him, in violation of law. If nothing but that appears, that more than justifies the resolution.

But I do not wish to stop them. I do not desire to be understood as saying that the law is violated under one Department of the Government more than under another. Nor must it be assumed that arrests are made only under the order of the President, or of the heads of Departments. Wherever the fault may lie, they are made by every lieutenant and every provost marshal, from one end of the country to the other, at discretion, and almost without complaint. I speak now directly of what I know to be the case in Maryland. These arrests are sometimes justifiable, and sometimes unjustifiable; sometimes made by a person calling himself a provost marshal, not known to the laws of the United States, acting absolutely without knowledge on the part of the Secretary of War that he held authority from him or from anybody else. And such is getting to be the habit of everybody in the country to act at the bidding of any provost marshal or military officer that the very independence of the American character is being broken down under the unchecked license of military arrests. The law, sir, is not so deficient; but the people have been educated within the last three years in the belief that the existence of a state of war justifies anything and everything in the shape of discretionary and arbitrary authority on the part of military officers, high and low, until the very laws of the land intended for the protection of the citizen are not invoked by the people, because they fear that to invoke them will offend the military power and bring its irresponsible vengeance on their heads. When I say that, I say it on my personal knowledge.

Gentlemen have appealed to me to redress, in the un-American mode of soliciting favor, some of the grievances suffered in Maryland by persons who are loyal citizens. I have pointed them to the law on the subject, and asked, "Why do you not indict the wrong-doers? The law for the suspension of the habeas corpus is your adequate protection. Why do you not indict them?" "We are afraid," the reply has been, "to incur the displeasure of the military authorities." I wish it to be understood that there is a power higher than the military authority, whether that authority be lodged in the hands of a lieutenant, or of a provost marshal, or of the President of the United States, and that that power is here. I impeach nobody; I cast reflections upon nobody; I speak of things, not men; of grievances, not of the persons responsible for them; but I say abuses are committed by subordinates, if not by gentlemen in superior authority, that require our intervention, and I shall most cheerfully vote for this resolution. I will not stop to inquire who may suffer by the investigation. I think it will be found that the evil exists as much under one as under another Department. I know the Secretary of War has endeavored to mitigate these abuses by commissions of responsible gentlemen to correct the acts of irresponsible subordinates, and it may be others have done the same. But oppressions are inseparable from all illegal arrest or imprisonment; and it is our duty not so much to inquire into the intentions of acts as their legality, and to remedy every illegal detention.

Mr. GARFIELD addressed the Chair.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Unless the gentleman from New York withdraws the motion to lay on the table, I object to further debate.

Mr. GANSON. I withdraw it, with the understanding that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] will renew it when he shall have concluded his remarks.

Mr. GARFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I will detain the House for a moment only. The resolution which passed the House yesterday I will say is now being executed by the Committee on Military Affairs. I have this moment arrived in the Hall, after a visit of two hours to one of the prisons in this city in obedience to that resolution; I am not now at liberty to disclose the action of that committee, for the investigation is still pending. But I earnestly hope that the House will not reconsider the vote by which that resolution was adopted, and thus put a stop to the investigation.

Mr. STEVENS. The resolution which my motion to reconsider refers to was adopted this morning, and not yesterday.

Mr. GARFIELD. The object of the two resolutions is the same.

Mr. STEVENS. I was not aware that any resolution had been adopted previously looking to the same object.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Do I understand that the committee have commenced the investigation under the resolution?

Mr. GARFIELD. They have.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Then that is a good reason for not interfering with the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The resolution under which the committee is acting was adopted day before yesterday.

Mr. GANSON. I offered my resolution day before yesterday, and asked unanimous consent for its introduction, but a gentleman from Illinois, not now in his seat, objected. I renewed it today, and the resolution was adopted; and it seems that it was so proper that the Committee on Military Affairs at once commenced the investigation.

Mr. GARFIELD. I have not the resolution before me under which the committee is acting, but if I recollect rightly it is quite similar to this; almost in the same words.

Mr. DAWES. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. GARFIELD. Certainly.

Mr. DAWES. The resolution which was passed this morning has been read. I ask that it be again read.

The resolution was again read.

Mr. DAWES. If the gentleman will permit me, this, Mr. Speaker, is a resolution of the largest inquiry, and was adopted on the allegation of a member of this House that he knew, of his own personal knowledge, that men were confined in military prisons without process of law. I have no allegation to make against any Department of the Government; I have within my personal knowledge no case; but if I had such knowledge in reference to one of my constituents, and rose upon this floor, and upon my responsibility as a member stated that fact and asked for an inquiry and a report of the facts to this House, it seems to me that I should be much astonished if any member of the House should object for a moment to such inquiry. I cannot understand upon what ground objection to such an inquiry can be made. It pains me very much that a member of the House should so far have forgotten in these times the rights of the citizen as to object to an inquiry like this.

The SPEAKER. The following is the resolution under which the Committee on Military Affairs is acting:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be, and the same is, directed to inquire and report to the House what legislation or action, if any, is necessary to secure to persons arrested and imprisoned by military authority a prompt examination into the cause of their arrest, and their discharge if there be no adequate cause for their detention, and a speedy trial where there is such cause.

Mr. GARFIELD. The difference between the two resolutions is that the one adopted this morning empowers the committee to send for persons and papers, and the one just read does not so empower the committee. With that difference they are nearly identical.

I wish to make two observations. First of all I agree with what the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. DAWES] has just said; and in illustration of what I desire to say I call attention to a bill that passed the House last session, but did not pass the Senate, and which, in my judgment, is vitally important as a means to preserve the independence of the officers of our armies. Early in the war, it will be remembered, Congress for good reasons gave to the President the power of summary dismissal when he believed the public service would be subserved thereby. At that time the Army was full of traitors, and it was necessary that by a more summary process than court-martial they should be driven out.

But it was thought by the House of Representatives last winter that the danger had so far passed that we might safely repeal the law. Important as that law has been in some respects, and none will doubt its value and necessity at the time of its enactment, I am satisfied that in other respects it has had a very unfortunate influence. It has gone very far toward weakening the manliness and independence of officers in the Army. If, sir, I am in the Army and know that my superior officer can make such representations as will cause me to be dismissed without a hearing and without a trial, how strong is the tendency of that knowledge to make a timid, subservient tool! The whole tendency of it is to take away the personal independence and manliness of the subordinate officer, because he has no guard for his standing and position except the favor of his superior; no right to demand, as the American officer always had in former times, that he should be speedily and fairly tried by a jury of his official peers. For this reason we passed a bill last winter by a very large majority, almost unanimously, I believe, to repeal the law giving this power to the President. That bill is dying a lingering death at the other end of the Capitol. I believe that that bill ought to become a law.

I desire in the second place to call attention to the fact that it is now the law, and has been since the foundation of our Government, that when an officer of the Army is arrested for any supposed crime or misdemeanor he shall be held in arrest—it may be in close confinement and under guard, according to the supposed enormity of the offense—no longer than eight days without being furnished with a copy of the charges against him. The law also allows him a speedy trial.

Now, without trenching upon the business in which the Committee on Military Affairs was engaged this morning, I will say that one officer at least has been in confinement for five months within sight of this Capitol. Both he and his keeper declare that he has not been furnished with a copy of the charges against him. He says that he has again and again demanded in vain to know with what crime he is charged. He is a man who bears upon his person honorable scars received in the service of his country; he is a colonel; and the vengeance of some one fell upon him like a bolt from the clear sky. He declares that he knows no reason for it, and can learn none. An agent of the War Department, an officer unknown to the Constitution and laws of the country, lays his hand upon a man, puts him in prison, where he is kept until said agent or some power above him is pleased to release him. There are plenty of alleged cases where officers and citizens, after being confined for a long period, have been allowed to go out without a word of explanation concerning either the arrest or the discharge.

I ask the House of Representatives whether that kind of practice is to grow up under this Government, and no man is to raise his voice against it or make any inquiry concerning it lest some one should say he is factious, he is unfriendly to the War Department, he is opposing the Administration? Gentlemen, if we are not men in our places here, let us stop our ears to all complaints; let every Department do as it pleases, and with meekness and in silence vote whatever appropriations are asked for. I do not say, for I do not know, that the head of any Department is responsible for these things, or knows them. It may be that they have been done by subordinates. It may be that the heads of the Departments are not cognizant of the facts. I make no accusation; but I do say that it is our business to see that the laws be respected, and that if a man has no powerful friend in court he shall at least find the Congress of the United States his friend. I hope the resolution will not be reconsidered, and I renew the motion to lay on the table the motion to reconsider.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Ohio, called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 136, nays 5, not voting 39; as follows:

LEGISLATIVE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. STEVENS. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

So the rules were suspended; and the House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. DAWES in the chair,) and resumed, as a special order, the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 649) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending 30th of June, 1866; the question being on the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURN] to strike out the following clause:

For compensation of temporary clerks in the Treasury Department: Provided, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized, in his discretion, to classify the clerks authorized according to the character of their services, $250,000.

To which the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] offered the following amendment:

Insert, in lieu of the words proposed to be stricken out, the following:

For compensation to temporary clerks in the Treasury Department and for additional compensation to clerks in same Department: Provided, That the temporary clerks herein provided for may be classified according to the character of their services: And provided further, That the Secretary of the Treasury may award such additional compensation to clerks as in his judgment may be deemed just and may be required by the public service, $250,000.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. Chairman, I modify my amendment by proposing to strike out also the following clause:

For compensation of additional clerks who may be employed by the Secretary according to the exigencies of the public service, and additional compensation for extra labor of clerks in his office, $25,000.

I believe the amount asked for in my amendment will cover all that is included in the two items. I deem it my duty to explain this amendment somewhat in detail. I have no doubt that it will be objected that it is giving too much discretion to the Secretary of the Treasury. At the same time I believe that it is the most economical way in which the money can be voted. Since the commencement of this war the amount of duties thrown on the Treasury Department has been increased perhaps more than tenfold. The Auditors, the Comptrollers of the Treasury, the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, the Comptroller of the Currency, the Commissioner of Customs, and the Register of the Treasury, have all had their duties so much increased that we have had to give them a large additional number of clerks. If we were to classify the clerks and allow the Secretary of the Treasury a class of clerks with a salary larger than any now paid, we should undoubtedly expend a larger sum than if the matter were left entirely to the discretion of the Treasury Department. When the Internal Revenue Department was created, a sum of $500,000 was left entirely at the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury. The organization of the department is nearly completed; and in a bill that is to be reported it will be proposed to limit the discretion still further, and to specify the officers and clerks more particularly than they have been hitherto specified, and to fix their salaries. At the present time it is almost impossible for the Treasurer and the Comptroller of the Currency to keep the best and highest rated clerks for any considerable length of time. The outside demand for similar services is so great that, after the Department has had them in training for a short time, a higher salary is offered for their services elsewhere.

There is no difficulty in relation to the clerks whose salaries are $1,200 and $1,400; but the difficulty is to retain that kind of talent and experience required for the purposes of the Departments in the higher classes of clerkships. Many of the men now in the employ of the Treasury Department could obtain perhaps fifty per cent. more salary elsewhere than they are now receiving; and unless we shall conclude to authorize this amount of discretion to be intrusted in the hands of the Secretary of the Treasury, several of the present heads of departments—among others the Comptroller of the Treasury—declare that it will be impossible for them to conduct the business of their departments.

I know that gentlemen here have their desks piled up with applications for clerkships in the Departments. There is a great amount of mischief resulting from the pressure upon the Departments of applications urged by members of Congress for the appointment of men of inferior experience and capacity for the discharge of their proper duties; and I have no doubt to-day that, if these Departments were all allowed to employ their own clerks throughout, we might appropriate a sum one third less in the aggregate than we now do, and the business would be better and much more economically done.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, when we had this matter under consideration at the last sitting of the committee, I stated my objections to the clause in the bill, as looking indirectly to an increase of the salaries of the clerks generally; and it being, in my view, independent legislation in an appropriation bill, I thought it improperly there under the rules. I therefore appealed from the decision by which the Chair held it to be properly in the bill. I stated that when this question of the increase of salaries should come up squarely I was willing to meet it squarely, but I did not like the provision in this bill looking, as I supposed, to that end.

The gentleman from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] at that time offered a substitute, which the House ordered to be printed, and which he had received from the Secretary of the Treasury. I had occasion this morning to see that officer, and I asked him for an explanation of this legislation which he desired. He stated in substance what had been stated by the gentleman from Vermont, that it will be impossible under the present system for him to carry on his Department; that his best, most experienced, and most valuable clerks are resigning—some days half a dozen per day—on account of the inadequacy of their salaries, and that, while he is opposed to a general increase of salaries and would not recommend it, he knows of no way of overcoming the present difficulty but for Congress to invest him with this authority, in order that he may give additional compensation to certain clerks. I have found fault with the principle, and I yet find fault with it; but under the circumstances I do not know but that it is the very best thing we can do, putting upon this provision a limitation which I will offer as an amendment; a limitation which I think it would be proper for the House to adopt with regard to every increase of salary if it should be determined, as I hope it will not be, to adopt a general increase of salaries under the present pressure. The limitation which I propose is, that the increase shall cease after the 1st day of July, 1866. If the Committee of the Whole should be disposed to adopt the recommendation of the Secretary of the Treasury, I will ask them to adopt this amendment, to add to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Vermont the following:

But the said Secretary shall not have the authority to award any such additional compensation to such clerks after the 1st day of July, 1866.

Mr. MORRILL. I have no particular objection to the amendment; but it will be seen that it is altogether unnecessary, because the appropriation extends only to 1866.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I understand that very well; but the provision of law would exist, and these gentlemen would come here and demand an appropriation in order to carry out an existing law.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment, as amended, was adopted.

Mr. WILSON. The Clerk has just read this item:

In the office of the Second Auditor:

For office furniture, and miscellaneous items, including two of the city newspapers, to be filed and preserved, for the use of the office, $25,000.

At the last session there was appropriated for the purpose specified in this paragraph the sum of $15,000. It is now proposed to appropriate $25,000. I desire to ask the gentleman from Vermont what necessity exists for the increase of this appropriation; and further, what information the committee have in relation to this item of furniture.

Now, sir, I think that there is room for improvement, as that item runs through all of the various Departments. If we go to the Departments we find many of the rooms fitted up in a style of elegance which would not discredit the houses upon Fifth avenue, New York city.

I do not know how much of this $25,000 is to be appropriated for this purpose; but I do think that in this department of the public expenditure there ought to be some economy. I ask therefore that the gentleman from Vermont will state what information the Committee of Ways and Means has in reference to this item of furniture, and for which we are now asked to appropriate this amount. I presume that the item is intended for that purpose. Newspapers, I suppose, do not cost much more than they did last year.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. Chairman, in reply to the gentleman from Iowa I will say that I have no doubt there has been extravagance in fitting up parts of the Treasury building, but this is for fitting up rooms for clerks hitherto confined in the building known as Winder's building. We have largely increased the number of the clerks of the Second Auditor, and I am told by him that he has not yet enough of clerks to adjust promptly the cases which come before him. At the last session of Congress we increased the number of clerks in that Department about ninety, and I believe that the Second Auditor has procured rooms outside of that Department to the extent of about fifty. They will require furniture, of course. They will have to be supplied with desks; but I do not suppose they will be covered with expensive carpets. We increased his Department last year to the extent of about ninety clerks and this year about one hundred and thirty, and I think that the amount is moderate enough for the rooms to be furnished.

Mr. WILSON. I will submit an amendment, in order that my remarks may be in order. I move to strike out "$25,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$15,000."

Mr. Chairman, I have no doubt that the business of that bureau is far behind. I cannot account in any other way for the absence of replies to my own letters sent to the Second Auditor. Some have been resting a year without answer. I presume the bureau does require additional clerical force to bring up the business. But, sir, the Second Auditor has no right to increase the clerical force until we have authorized the employment of additional clerks.

I think, sir, that the vacant rooms in Winder's building, if there be any, can be furnished at a less cost than $25,000, and I have therefore moved to reduce the appropriation to $15,000. I hope the amendment will prevail.

Mr. MORRILL. I do not presume that the gentleman from Iowa proposes that the business of the office shall stop. We certainly did authorize the employment of ninety clerks at the last session of Congress.

Mr. WILSON. At that session did we not make an appropriation to meet that?

Mr. MORRILL. In this very bill are paragraphs, which have escaped the attention of the gentleman from Iowa, already acted on, authorizing the employment of one hundred and thirty more clerks. We had the Second Auditor before us, and he explained to us the magnitude of the business of his office. Many of the paymasters have not been settled with for eighteen months. It is utterly impossible, as he states it to us, to bring up the business of that office without a large increase of the clerical force. He states that twice the number now proposed will be insufficient to do it.

The amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I wish to inquire of the gentleman from Vermont whether it has been usual heretofore to pay for newspapers for each of these offices.

Mr. MORRILL. It has always been customary to take these papers for the purpose of being filed.

The Clerk read, as follows:

For the general purposes of the southeast executive building, including the extension:

For compensation of twelve watchmen and eleven laborers of the southeast executive building, $16,560.

Mr. WILSON. The same number of men are employed as last year, and I ask the gentleman from Vermont why the amount is increased.

Mr. MORRILL. If the gentleman will refer to the act passed June 25, 1864, he will find that we increased their salaries.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Iowa. I move to amend the clause "for compensation of the surveyor general of the Territories of Dakota and Montana, and the clerks in his office, $8,300," by striking out "$8,300" and inserting in lieu thereof "$6,000." The sum I have named is the amount which we appropriated last year for this same purpose, and I know no reason why there should be an increase of the appropriation. There are to be no additional clerks in that office that I am aware of, and I know of no need for any.

Mr. MORRILL. There was an act passed in June, 1864, which makes this increased appropriation necessary.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Iowa. I am not aware that the clerical force in this office has been increased, or that there is any necessity for such increase. They have the same number of clerks, and the same kind of service is to be performed for the coming year that was performed last year.

The amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. KASSON. I am directed by the Committee of Ways and Means to offer an amendment, to be inserted after line four hundred and ninety-two, at the end of these appropriations for surveyors general and their clerks. It includes the same item which was appropriated last year. It is the following:

For pay of the wages of one clerk in the consolidated land offices at Des Moines, Iowa, $1,000.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I think that is not in order.

Mr. KASSON. It is the same appropriation which has been made heretofore. I quote the exact language of the appropriation bill of last session for this identical purpose; and it is for the purpose of carrying on the operations of the land office there.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I would inquire if the office of that clerk has been created by law.

Mr. KASSON. Yes, sir; and he is to be paid according to law.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. If this amendment carries out an existing law it is in order. Is there any necessity for this clerk?

Mr. KASSON. It is necessary, as I know of my own knowledge.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I desire to call the attention of the committee to the very extraordinary item contained in lines six hundred and seventy-seven and six hundred and seventy-eight:

For contingencies, viz: for stationery, purchase of library, laboratory, rent, and miscellaneous items, $11,500.

The appropriation we made last year for the same purpose was $4,500; and here it is increased to $11,500; and it is made up in part of items which are not made specific. This amount is intended to cover, as I understand by the report of the Commissioner of Agriculture, the salaries of certain draughtsmen, chemists, and others, and all sorts of stealings. I therefore move to strike out "$11,500" and insert in lieu thereof "$4,500." I do not think the condition of the Treasury will justify such appropriations as this.

Mr. MORRILL. The appropriation of last year was larger than I then thought necessary, and the House will therefore see that I am in no mood to dispute the point made by the gentleman from Illinois. But I desire to correct him in reference to the amount we appropriated last year. It was $7,500. The increase, therefore, is $4,000 only. Almost all the items required for that Department this year have increased in price above what they were last year.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Then as I was mistaken in the amount I will modify my amendment by making the amount to be inserted "$7,500."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I now move to amend, in lines six hundred and eighty and six hundred and eighty-one, which are, "for collecting agricultural statistics in loyal States, $20,000," by striking out the entire appropriation. I do not believe these statistics are worth the money. I live, I believe, in the best agricultural district in the country, and I am sure my constituents do not get their portion of this amount.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I must correct the gentleman. The fifth district, which I have the honor to represent, is the best agricultural district.

Mr. MORRILL. I suppose I have the right to move an amendment to correct the text before the pending amendment is put. Previous to making the motion, I will say that I believe some amount of expenditure can be profitably employed in collecting and gathering together these statistics, and therefore I should regret to see the entire amount stricken out from the bill. There are other appropriations for this Department in the bill far more extravagant, I think, than this.

I hope the clause will not be stricken out; but I object to its phraseology, and I therefore move to amend by striking out the words "in loyal States." I do not see why we may not collect statistics from all the States.

Mr. HOLMAN. I have been in the habit of following the views of the gentleman from Illinois very generally, and I am certainly not in favor of any extravagant expenditures in the civil departments of the Government; but it seems to me that the gentleman from Illinois is mistaken as to the value of the statistical information gathered together by the Commissioner of Agriculture. That information is published bimonthly and shows the condition of the crops of the country.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I would ask the gentleman from Indiana if he ever read any of these pamphlets which are sent out bimonthly by the Agricultural Department, or has ever known any person who has read them?

Mr. HOLMAN. I not only represent an agricultural interest, but I happen to be myself to some extent engaged in agricultural pursuits, cultivating a small farm. The gentleman from Illinois, representing a mineral region, probably has not the same interest in this subject that I have. I have not only received and carefully read these tables and statistics, but my constituents around me have also done so.

An appropriation of $20,000 for this purpose is not a large appropriation. It must be distributed in small amounts to reach a great many persons, and it seems to me that the agricultural interests of the country have been promoted by the expenditure of this small amount of money in the past. It is but an experiment, and one made with a very small amount of money. It is expended upon a subject of great and general interest—the statistics of the crops throughout the entire country.

While I have never favored appropriations which I thought could be dispensed with at all, I am not now in favor of parsimony on the part of the Government which could prevent the ascertainment of facts affecting a great interest such as the agricultural interest of the United States.

The question was taken on Mr. MORRILL's amendment, and it was agreed to.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I will modify my amendment so as to strike out "twenty" and insert "ten," and add to the clause this proviso, which I think will meet the approbation of the House:

Provided, That hereafter there shall not be published any bimonthly report of the Agricultural Department.

Mr. HOLMAN. I trust that neither of those amendments will be adopted. If we appropriate any amount it ought to be $20,000. That is the smallest amount that can be of any avail for this purpose. To appropriate $10,000 would be simply to throw away that much money, and to appropriate any amount and not provide for the publication of these statistics would be a waste of money. This bimonthly statement goes into every agricultural community; it is carefully examined by the agricultural societies of the country, and is of great value. I do not know, myself, of a single farmer in that section of the State of Indiana in which I reside who does not deem this publication of value to the country.

I trust that neither of the amendments offered by the gentleman from Illinois will be adopted. If either of them be adopted we might as well strike out the entire appropriation. Ten thousand dollars would be of no use whatsoever. I trust that the gentleman from Illinois, in his eagerness for economy, will not forget that we do not appropriate many large sums of money for the benefit of the agricultural interests.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. If the agricultural interests derived any benefit from this appropriation I should not object to it; but they do not derive any.

Mr. SLOAN. I would like to inquire how the money is expended—whether it is paid to the correspondents of the Department for furnishing the information? If I understand the matter, this information is obtained by the Department by simply addressing letters to those engaged in agricultural pursuits, and the answers to those letters contain the information upon which the Commissioner makes up these tables and statistics.

I have always doubted whether the information is sufficiently accurate to be of any real service. I do not understand how any considerable sum of money can be necessary to obtain the information. There is a clerical force already in the Department sufficient, I should suppose, to carry on all the correspondence. I do not understand that those who furnish this information from various parts of the country receive any compensation; and I ask the gentleman from Vermont how the money is to be expended?

Mr. MORRILL. I design to be perfectly fair in this matter. I suppose that the Department is in the habit of paying out money, in some instances, for the information received by it. It is true that, in certain localities, men will perform this labor gratuitously; but in other localities the Department is compelled to pay out money for it. Payment is made, as I understand, for the estimates of crops, and also for meteorological information. Men cannot be procured in all localities to perform that class of service without compensation. Payments are also made for articles in the annual report.

In regard to the publications made by the Department, some of the estimates of crops have been very valuable. I am not sure, however, that the information cannot be communicated to the newspapers. If the information be valuable the newspapers would be very glad to publish it as an item of news or as information of some interest to their readers. I am not sure that the publication of these bimonthly reports, which is a new feature, is of such great service as that it cannot be dispensed with, and the publication provided for in some way that will be equally acceptable and serviceable to the agriculturists of the country.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move to amend by inserting the words "and publishing;" so that it will read:

For collecting and publishing agricultural statistics in loyal States, $20,000.

I hope, Mr. Chairman, that the appropriation will not be stricken out. If any appropriation made by Congress for agricultural purposes has been valuable, so that its value has manifested itself to my mind, it has been the appropriation for publishing these bimonthly reports. I do not know that they are entirely correct and reliable. I do not suppose that so immediately after their commencement they could be entirely reliable; but they are manifestly a close approximation to reliable reports, and they give in a cheap form to every farmer in the United States a history of the progress of the crops. They let him know how the crops are coming on so that he can make his calculations for the next season.

Mr. MORRILL. If the gentleman from Ohio will permit me, I do not think that his amendment is necessary. No part of this appropriation is for the purpose of publishing these reports. The Department has the work done in the public printing office.

Mr. GARFIELD. If it is not necessary, I of course withdraw the amendment. But I will say, before leaving the floor, that I hope most earnestly that the agricultural interests of the country will not be deprived of the valuable documents distributed through this Department. They are not merely important to the agriculturists, but they are important to every merchant, every trader, every man who has an interest in knowing the probable prices of products in the coming season.

Mr. STROUSE. I hope my friend from Ohio will not withdraw his amendment.

Mr. GARFIELD. It is provided for in another place.

Mr. HOLMAN. The effect of inserting the words "and publishing" would simply be to diminish the appropriation for collecting statistics. The whole sum would not pay for the printing.

Mr. STROUSE. If that be so, I have nothing to say on the subject; but I desire to say a word in favor of the appropriation. I do not know of any appropriation for a sub-department of the Government that is more advantageous to the country at large than this comparatively small appropriation for the benefit of the most valuable and greatest interest of all. I trust, Mr. Chairman, that there will be but few votes cast here against any liberal appropriation that may foster, protect, and benefit the great fundamental interest of the Government, agriculture, on which all the other collateral interests must necessarily depend.

I may say here that the Agricultural Department has been well managed, and deserves, as has been suggested, the fostering care of the popular branch of Congress, as well as of the country at large.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. Although I represent a district within the city limits, yet I have during my experience here been enabled to discover that these reports on the subject of agriculture are of immense importance. I hope, therefore, that there will be no interference with the usual appropriations for this object, but that we shall afford to the country every possible means of information within the possession of the Agricultural Department. I hope that no further opposition will be made to the appropriations for this Department.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Mr. Chairman, the district which I represent is one of the finest agricultural districts in the world, and, sir, it seems to me that out of the millions of dollars appropriated by Congress, the agricultural interests should not be neglected. The interests of the farmer, which constitute the solid basis of the wealth of the country, should be thought of and cared for in the appropriations made by this House.

I hope, sir, that the amendment of my colleague from the Galena district [Mr. WASHBURN] will not prevail. Rather than cut down this appropriation, I would be in favor of increasing it. I receive these bimonthly reports from the Agricultural Department and send them to the local newspapers of my district, and into these newspapers is copied such information as is of interest and benefit to the agricultural community. It is read by the farmers, and unquestionably they derive advantage from it. Sir, let us not forget the interest of the farmer.

Mr. GRINNELL. Mr. Chairman, I hope that the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Illinois will not prevail. I am sorry, sir, that dislike toward a certain gentleman or a certain management not here expressed should prejudice the minds of this House against the Agricultural Department. I believe that the publication of these statistics is of immense value to the producing class in this country. I can tell the gentleman the manner in which his constituents learn how to sell their products. He will find that in the various counties of his State there is selected a man of known intelligence and enterprise, enjoying the respect and confidence of the community, whose business it is to collect and forward facts in regard to the productions of the county from month to month. Those facts are summed up in the Agricultural Department, an exhibit is made, and conclusions are drawn, whereby the farmer in the gentleman's district may know how to sell his wheat, his corn, or other products that may be in excess of a good crop or be cut short by a drought or a superabundance of rain.

Let me tell the gentleman further, that if he will go to the Agricultural Department he will find no drones there. When I go into some of the other Departments I find gentlemen with apparently plenty of leisure, reading newspapers (which I cannot get time to do) and smoking cigars which have by common esteem a very fine flavor. But go into the Agricultural Department and you see there activity, life, and a purpose. I repeat it, no drones are visible there.

Now, sir, it is proposed to cut off this information, which I know to be of great benefit to the farmer. I have hundreds more applications for these bimonthly reports and the annual agricultural volume than I can supply. A farmer wishes to know how the crop is in another part of the country in order that he may determine what price to put upon his own products, and whether to sell late or early. This information he receives under the present system; and I am in favor of continuing it. Yet some gentlemen propose to cut down this appropriation of $20,000 to pay for collecting statistics throughout the various States in regard to their agricultural products. I hope that the gentleman from Illinois, who is not a farmer, and has been too much of the time on the front, and has been too much occupied with other matters to give attention to this subject, will not set up his judgment as superior to that of those whose peculiar branch it is.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I propose to stand by my amendment to reduce the amount to $10,000. I am glad to hear the compliment paid by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GRINNELL] to the clerks in this Department. I understand that one of these gentlemen, paid by the Government, occupies a seat in the reporters' gallery. Undoubtedly he has listened to the gentleman, and has made a good report of his Buncombe speech.

Mr. GRINNELL. I wish to inform the gentleman from Illinois that I am not in the habit of consulting gentlemen in the gallery either with my eyes or my ears. I do not propose to go outside to bolster up the few remarks which I may make. I think that it would require several reporters to report all that some gentlemen say on this floor. [Laughter.] But, sir, I will not be personal.

I desire to resist the cutting down of an appropriation which looks to the ascertainment of the products raised throughout the United States, and the giving of this information, not to editors of newspapers, not to members of Congress, but to those whose business requires them to be acquainted with the state of the markets. This is a small, an infinitesimally small sum to quarrel about, when we, without question, vote hundreds of thousands and millions to objects no more meritorious. This appropriation is due, as has been suggested by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. INGERSOLL] to those who are not here to speak for themselves. Let us promote their prosperity. Let us give them as much light as possible on this subject of agriculture.

Mr. SPALDING. Mr. Chairman, I wish simply to say that there is no appropriation, to my knowledge, made by Congress which is more acceptable to my constituents than this one for the Department of Agriculture, and in their behalf I protest against reducing the amount one single dollar. I shall vote for every dollar inserted by the Committee of Ways and Means in this part of the bill, and feel that I can do no act which will better justify me to my constituents.

Mr. MORRILL. For the purpose of closing debate I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. Dawes reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had the Union generally under consideration, and particularly House bill No. 649, making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1866, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. MORRILL. I move that debate be closed in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the paragraphs in reference to the Department of Agriculture in one minute after their consideration shall be resumed.

Mr. HOLMAN. I raise the question of order that that motion is not in order, as it would cut off the five minutes' debate.

Mr. MORRILL. I propose to leave the paragraphs open to amendment.

Mr. HOLMAN. General debate has not yet been closed on the bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the point of order, as the general debate has not yet been closed.

Mr. MORRILL. I move that general debate on the bill be closed in one minute after its consideration shall be resumed in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL moved that the rules be suspended and the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. DAWES in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of House bill No. 649, making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1866.

The CHAIRMAN stated that general debate had been closed in one minute.

The question recurred on the amendment of Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, and it was disagreed to.

The Clerk read, as follows:

For purchase of cereal, vegetable, and flower seeds, and for labor in putting up seeds, seed bags, and miscellaneous items, $61,000.

Mr. PIKE. I should like to know what method is adopted by the Commissioner for the distribution of those seeds. I have received from time to time a very small quantity of seed, which with great care I preserved and directed to my constituents. They have been of exceedingly small value; and I have amused myself by multiplying the value of the seed I have received by the number of Senators and Representatives, and I cannot make out how the amount can reach anything like $61,000. I do not know what other mode is adopted. I represent an eminently agricultural district, and I never heard of a seed getting into it except through my humble instrumentality. If a different mode is pursued I want to know it, so that my constituents may get their proper proportion.

Mr. BEAMAN. I move to reduce the appropriation to $10,000. My experience has been like that of the gentleman from Maine. I presume during the last year that I have received for distribution an amount of seed that may have cost twelve shillings or two dollars, which consisted chiefly of Tuscarora seed corn, black seed onion, marigolds, mangel-wurzel, &c., which are to be found in abundance upon almost every farm and in almost every garden in my district. I do not know how much benefit this will be to the country, but it seems to me that it is an extravagant and profligate appropriation. I have therefore moved to reduce it to $10,000.

Mr. GRINNELL. The gentleman from Maine lives away down East, where the people do not need much seed, as they live by fishing. They do not of course care for the agricultural interest. I would inform him, however, that if there is an agricultural society in his district it regularly receives large bundles of seed.

Mr. COX. I make the point of order that the gentleman must address the Chair.

Mr. GRINNELL. I am addressing the Chair and the gentlemen of the committee alternately.

Mr. PIKE. I will yield my portion to the Chair.

Mr. GRINNELL. Now, sir, the answer to all this matter is that there are, I presume, more than five hundred local agricultural societies in the United States that receive the benefits of this appropriation. I know these seeds are distributed throughout my district and to all our agricultural societies. Our people have not the opportunity of becoming possessed of the rare seeds found in large cities. In those cities, of course, the people can go to the seed stores and obtain them; but we have no large cities in my district, as is the case with other gentlemen, and our people consider it an acquisition to become possessed of these imported new seeds.

I will mention one fact. The article of sorghum seed had become so much deteriorated by admixture with the broom and common corn that it was feared that the introduction of this seed would not prove of so much advantage to the country as anticipated. Now, a part of the appropriation made by Congress heretofore was used to import a large amount of pure sorghum seed, and the result is, that if you will to-day go into the prairies of Illinois and Iowa you will find the farmers successful growers of the cane, and the women and children, whose husbands and fathers are in our armies, living upon the sweets extracted from this sorghum cane, as the only sweet which they are able to obtain. I give but a single illustration of benefits, one of many which could be named.

Mr. SLOAN. I move to amend the amendment by making the amount $50,000. I was disposed to favor the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. BEAMAN:] I inquired of the gentleman from Maine what had become of this large amount of seed for which $54,000 was expended last year, and as the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GRINNELL] has satisfactorily answered the question by showing that a large portion of it has gone into his district, I shall certainly favor keeping up the appropriation.

Mr. MORRILL. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. PIKE] very properly asked for information in reference to the manner in which these seeds were obtained, and the way in which they were distributed. I believe it has been the practice with the Department to obtain seeds not only in this country but abroad; and I believe that a very large amount has been annually spent for seeds abroad in order to introduce new varieties; and it is for each gentleman to judge for himself whether we have obtained any new varieties for the last few years. At the present time, I believe, there is an agent of the Department in China obtaining new sorghum seed, because in this country what we had was allowed to mix with other kinds of corn, as was observed by the gentleman from Iowa.

The mode and manner in which seeds are distributed is mainly through members of Congress. It is true, I believe, that the Department distributes seeds to its correspondents, and also to the various agricultural societies of the country, of whose names they have been informed by members or by others. Last year we did not appropriate so much as we propose to appropriate this year by $4,000. I thought last year that the sum we then appropriated was too much, but I do not now propose any amendment.

Mr. SLOAN. I withdraw my amendment to the amendment.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I move to amend by making the appropriation conform to what it was last year, $57,000.

The amendment was not agreed to.

The amendment offered by Mr. BEAMAN was not agreed to.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I move to amend in the next line, which appropriates $5,200 for employes in seed room, by striking out "$5,200" and inserting "$4,000," the precise amount which was appropriated for the same purpose last year. This raises the salaries of the employes, and I am opposed to it.

Mr. STROUSE. With all respect to the gentleman from Illinois, I think it is false economy to reduce this very small appropriation of $5,200 for the employes in the seed room. It is offered probably on the principle of saving at the spigot and wasting at the bung. The persons employed by the Commissioner of Agriculture to do this work are females, many of them the wives or sisters or daughters of soldiers, who earn a scanty living by working in the Agricultural Department for a very short time in the winter preparatory to distributing the seeds in the spring. They receive a very moderate compensation indeed. It may be that their salaries have been very slightly increased; but I think it ill becomes the Congress of the United States to be shaving down a small appropriation for so meritorious a purpose as this, and only to save $1,200. Let us not begin our economy with such small things as this, but act with a spirit of liberality and justice.

The question was taken on Mr. WASHBURN's amendment, and it was disagreed to.

Mr. COX. I move to add to the clause the following proviso:

And provided, That none but females shall be employed therein.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I raise the point of order that the amendment is not in order unless that be one of the "contingencies for carrying on the Government." [Laughter.]

Mr. COX. The gentleman raises a point of order on everything except whisky. The gentleman's recent experience ought to make him a little cautious how he intrenches upon dignified Legislatures. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order.

The question was taken; and the amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. COFFROTH. I move to strike out the following item:

For propagation and distribution of plants, cuttings, and shrubs, $14,000.

I make this motion for the reason that during the last session of Congress an appropriation was made for this very same purpose, and I received no share of the plants, cuttings, and shrubs. I do not know whether any other gentleman in this House received them or not, but if they were received by any other person I consider that it would be unfair for this House to pass this appropriation unless these plants, cuttings, and shrubs are to be distributed equally among the members.

Now, sir, all the seeds that have come from the Patent Office or from the Agricultural Department to my district would not exceed in value fifteen or twenty dollars. I received about the same amount that the gentleman from Maine [Mr. PIKE] spoke of, a few onion seeds, a few cabbage seeds, and a little lettuce, and probably more celery seed than anything else; and there is very little of that article raised in my district. My constituents complain too that many of the seeds sent them do not grow, that they will not come up, that they are a bad article, and therefore I think it useless that we should spend the money of the people for this purpose, for seeds which will not grow and which are not fairly distributed among the people.

Mr. HOLMAN. A number of years ago I made an effectual effort to have this appropriation stricken out. It was then but $5,000, it is now $14,000. I am satisfied, from the disposition manifested by the House, that this appropriation will not be stricken out now; but I wish to call the attention of the House to the fact that last year we appropriated only $10,800 for this object.

Gentlemen sometimes confound the propagating garden with the botanical garden. It always seemed to me that we appropriated a sufficient sum of money for the embellishment of this Capitol and its grounds, when we appropriated money to keep up the botanical garden, but this propagating garden is assuming the same proportions under the patronage of the Agricultural Department.

I have two amendments which I desire to submit. One is to reduce the amount of the appropriation to $10,800, and the other is to add to the clause the following proviso:

Provided, That the propagation of plants, cuttings, and shrubs shall be confined to such as are adapted to general cultivation, and to promote the general purposes of horticulture and agriculture throughout the United States.

Mr. COFFROTH. I would like to ask the gentleman if he has not had more than his share of those seeds and cuttings.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Chairman, I am compelled in justice to myself, as well as to the Agricultural Department, to say that if gentlemen have received from the Agricultural Department last year no more than they have stated, I and my constituents have been peculiarly favored by Sir Isaac Newton. [Laughter.] I am satisfied that I have received for my constituents valuable seeds, proportioned to the appropriation, and I regret that other members and their constituents have not, for any reason, received the same advantages. It is proper to state, as a reason why my constituents have been so much favored, that I represent a moral agricultural district.

Mr. COFFROTH. I move to amend the amendment by adding "and that they shall be equally divided among the members of the House."

Mr. HOLMAN. The other branch of Congress, I believe, has some little interest in this propagating garden. I trust this House will not permit itself to be charged with illiberality in excluding members of the Senate.

Mr. COFFROTH. I will modify my amendment so as to make it include Senators. The amendment is necessary because there are some members who are a little diffident about going to the Agricultural Department to ask for these seeds, or who have not such winning ways as the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] has, and who otherwise would not get their share of these shrubs and seeds.

The question was taken on Mr. COFFROTH's amendment to the amendment, and it was rejected.

The question recurred on Mr. HOLMAN's amendment, and it was adopted.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to amend by striking out "$14,000" and inserting "$10,800;" so that it will read, "for propagation and distribution of plants, $10,800."

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. ALLISON. I desire to inquire from the gentleman from Vermont the necessity for the following appropriation:

Territory of Nevada:

For salaries of Governor and superintendent of Indian affairs, chief justice, and two associate judges, and secretary, $9,700.

Mr. MORRILL. I believe that since the estimates were made Nevada has become a State. I do not know that there is any necessity for the whole of the appropriation, but there is no harm in letting it remain. A portion of it will most certainly be required—that portion in regard to the superintendent of Indian affairs. Of course only what is legitimate and proper will be expended.

Mr. WILSON. I suggest that the appropriation be reduced to $2,000.

Mr. MORRILL. The Indian agent, chief justice, and two associate judges are to be paid.

Mr. WILSON. The chief justice and two associate judges and secretary were all officers under the territorial government, and their functions end when the Territory becomes a State. I move to amend by striking out "$9,700" and inserting "$2,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary."

Mr. COLE, of California. I ask the gentleman from Iowa if he has any information on which to base this amount of $2,000. He may require more than that for the Indian superintendent.

Mr. WILSON. I believe the salary of the superintendent of Indian affairs is $1,800. That officer will doubtless be continued, and it will be necessary to pay his salary.

The question was taken, and the amendment was adopted.

Mr. WILSON. I move to amend the clause further by making it read, "for salary of superintendent of Indian affairs, $2,000."

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. WILSON. I move to amend by striking out the next item, "for contingent expenses of said Territory, $1,000."

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. WILSON. I move to amend by striking out the next item:

For compensation and mileage of the members of the Legislative Assembly, officers, clerks, and contingent expenses of the Assembly, $20,000.

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. ALLISON. The Clerk has just read this item:

For special and other extraordinary expenses of California land claims, $10,000.

I desire to inquire as to the necessity for this appropriation.

Mr. MORRILL. There have been pending in California for several years some cases involving large amounts of money. Those cases are not yet closed, and they require an amount of time and attention that the district attorney is unable to devote to the subject. Therefore the Department thinks it indispensable that this appropriation be continued at least one year longer.

The Clerk read to line eight hundred and fifty, when

Mr. MORRILL said: I desire to offer the following amendment to supply what was accidentally omitted from the printed bill:

After line eight hundred and fifty insert the following:
For compensation of the district marshals, $12,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOLMAN. Lines eight hundred and fifty-five and eight hundred and fifty-six read as follows:
For additional salary of the treasurer of the Mint at Philadelphia, $1,000.

On this I raise a point of order. On the 29th page of this bill we have already appropriated the usual amount as the salary of the treasurer of that Mint, it being embraced in this item:

For salaries of the director, treasurer, assayer, melter and refiner, chief coinier and engraver, assistant assayer, and seven clerks, $26,400.

I raise the point of order that this is simply an increase of salary from $2,000 to $3,000. This same point was made when the bill was under consideration at the last session, and my recollection is that it was sustained on the ground that this was a direct increase of salary.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of opinion that it comes under the last clause of the 120th rule, as stated yesterday. Since yesterday the Chair has had occasion to examine the history of that clause, and finds that it originated in this way: the rule stood originally without that clause. While so standing, in the year 1838, Mr. Cambreling offered in the House an amendment to an appropriation bill, increasing the salaries of custom-house officers, officers in the Treasury Department. The point of order raised yesterday was made by Mr. Briggs, of Massachusetts, and sustained by the Chair. Upon the next day Mr. Briggs offered as an amendment to the rule the clause which is now incorporated in it, for the purpose of covering the precise case. The matter was referred to the Committee on Rules, laid over one day, and on the next day was brought up by Mr. Cambreling, who stated that it was for the purpose of covering these cases. The amendment was adopted and incorporated in the rule. The history of the case will be found in the Congressional Globe, volume six, commencing on page 224. This clause, therefore, was introduced into the rule for the express purpose of covering precisely these cases. The Chair, therefore, overrules the point of order.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move, then, to strike out this item. It will be observed that we have already made an appropriation for the salary of the treasurer of the Mint at Philadelphia. This is simply a proposition to increase the salary by the addition of $1,000. No fact has been brought to the attention of the House indicating any necessity for such an increase; and although the ruling of the Chair, in view of the precedent, is undoubtedly right, yet it is certainly a very unwise policy to increase here and there a salary by an appropriation of this kind, unless there be some special and extraordinary necessity for it.

Mr. MORRILL. In reply to the argument of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN,] I will state that this appropriation is in pursuance of law. The appropriations have heretofore been made in precisely this form. A part of these additional salaries was authorized as long ago, I believe, as 1846, while a small part of them was authorized last year, on account of the necessity that was felt for a further increase of salaries at one or two particular points.

Mr. L. MYERS. I only desire to state, as a further reason why this increase of salary should be made, that the treasurer of the Mint at Philadelphia is obliged to give $200,000 security.

Mr. MORRILL. I will say to the gentleman from Philadelphia [Mr. L. MYERS] that this proposes no payment of salary in addition to what that officer now receives. In a subsequent part of the bill there is a proposition to still further increase the salaries of these men; but this does not propose any increase.

Mr. L. MYERS. I am very glad to learn that there is to be in a subsequent part of the bill an addition to the salary which this officer now receives.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. If what the gentleman from Vermont says be correct, then we should strike out the word "additional." If it is not an additional salary I would like to know why that word is there.

Mr. HOLMAN. As the gentleman says that this is in conformity to former appropriation bills and in pursuance of established law I withdraw my motion to strike out.

Mr. MORRILL. It is in pursuance of laws a part of which have been upon the statute-book since 1846.

Mr. SPALDING. I move to strike out the word "additional," as the gentleman says that it is not an additional salary.

Mr. MORRILL. It merely makes it conform to the law.

The amendment was disagreed to.

The Clerk read, as follows:

For additional salary of the treasurer of the branch mint at Denver, $500.

Mr. SPALDING. I move to strike that out, as I understand it is a new appropriation.

Mr. MORRILL. It was authorized last year. The amendment was disagreed to.

The Clerk read, as follows:

For salaries of additional clerks in the office of the Assistant Treasurer at Boston, which are hereby authorized, $11,500.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I move to strike that out.

Mr. MORRILL. I do not know that it is necessary to say anything in reference to these officers. Their duties have increased, and an increased force is absolutely necessary to the Government. They receive payments for the loans made by the Government. Many of them are poorly paid, as they say. So far as the business of the Government is concerned they are indispensable, and unless the gentleman wants to prevent the Treasury from performing its legitimate functions he will vote for this item.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I want to know the number of clerks now employed and their salaries, and also what salary it is proposed to pay these clerks. Does he propose to leave it with the Secretary of the Treasury or the Assistant Treasurer at Boston to fix the salary? I think that this is very loose legislation.

Mr. HOOPER. This appropriation is not for a proposed increase of officers in the office of the Assistant Treasurer at Boston, but for those who have been there for the past two years.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. If that be the case, it seems to me to be worse than I imagined. It is for salaries for additional clerks which "are hereby authorized." If these clerks have been employed there without authority of law it is something that this House ought not to tolerate.

Mr. HOOPER. My impression is that the same appropriation was made last year.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I think that this is very blind legislation. We have no knowledge whatever in regard to the number of clerks now in that office; we have no knowledge in regard to the duties they are called on to perform; and yet we are asked to make this appropriation for additional clerks in this appropriation bill. I think that we ought to have some little regard for the Treasury and refuse to make appropriations until we know what they are for.

Mr. MORRILL. I hope that the committee will not vote this provision out.

The CHAIRMAN. Further debate is not in order.

Mr. MORRILL. I move to strike out "five" and insert "four." As I understand the question there is a necessity for an increased force at this office. The large number of millions of dollars subscribed in Boston to the United States loans has made the employment of more clerks indispensable, in order that the duties of the office may be accurately and promptly performed. In addition to all their other duties heretofore, they have not only to receive subscriptions to the loans, but to count the money; and it takes a large force to do that. I hope the motion of the gentleman from Illinois will not prevail.

Mr. WILSON. I ask the gentleman from Vermont why the necessity of putting the item in this form. How many clerks does it authorize, five, ten, or twenty-five? If he chooses to appoint twenty-five clerks will we not be called at the next session, in a deficiency bill, to appropriate money to pay them? There is no limitation of power here. I think the language should be changed, or the paragraph stricken out.

Mr. MORRILL. I do not know that we should be unwilling to allow this discretion to the Secretary of the Treasury. It is a proper one. It is for the employment of clerks where the responsibility is very great. I know of no place where the could better trust the Secretary of the Treasury with some degree of discretion than in reference to the office of the Assistant Treasurer at Boston.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. The explanation made by the gentleman from Vermont does not satisfy me. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. HOOPER] states that the Committee of Ways and Means have passed upon a bill to cover the past delinquencies of the Department in this matter. I have looked over the bill which the Committee of Ways and Means have determined to report, and I ask attention to its provisions for one moment. It organizes this sub-Treasury department at Boston.

Mr. HOOPER. I rise to a question of order. I was instructed some days ago to report this bill from the Committee of Ways and Means, and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURNE] refused to give his permission; and I think it hardly fair for the gentleman to bring it before the House now.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the gentleman from Massachusetts has stated the point of order correctly, and the Chair sustains it. [Laughter.]

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I did object to reporting the bill at that time, but I had not then the opportunity of stating the reasons why. This bill which my friend from Massachusetts proposed to report organizes the sub-Treasury of the city of Boston, and I call the attention of gentlemen to it. It provides for one chief clerk at a salary of $2,500; one disbursing clerk at a salary of $2,000; two clerks at a salary of $1,500 each; one clerk at a salary of $1,400; one clerk at a salary of $1,200; six clerks at a salary of $1,000 each; two clerks at a salary of $800; one messenger at a salary of $700; and two porters at a salary of $600 each. This makes the aggregate salaries $19,600 in order to run this sub-Treasury machine in the city of Boston, while the whole expense of running the State government of the State of Illinois is not $10,000. It is proposed to fix these salaries indefinitely as to time, no matter how much better the currency may become; and after giving a messenger to all those clerks, it adds two porters at a salary of $600 per annum each.

Mr. MORRILL. I withdraw my amendment to the amendment.

Mr. HOOPER. I renew the amendment. I wish to state to the House that this appropriation is designed to meet an arrangement of the sub-Treasury at Boston, which has been found necessary for the past year. The bill which has been referred to was prepared to authorize the appointment of these officers in the usual form. It was necessary to carry on the office, and the expenditure beyond the appropriation has been paid heretofore from the contingent fund of the Treasury Department.

In reply to the remarks made by the gentleman from Illinois in reference to the absurdity of appointing clerks, while he may be a very good judge of their necessity, I desire the Clerk to read the letter from the Treasury Department which accompanied this bill.

The letter was read, and is as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, December 20, 1864.

SIR: I have the honor of submitting for the consideration of your committee the inclosed draft of a bill "to provide for the appointment of clerks in the office of the Assistant Treasurer of the United States at Boston, Massachusetts, and to fix their salaries." It has been prepared in accordance with the views of Mr. Chandler, the Assistant Treasurer, in which I concur, and therefore recommend the passage of the bill.

With great respect,

W. P. FESSENDEN,
Secretary of the Treasury.

Hon. T. STEVENS, Chairman Committee of Ways and Means, United States House of Representatives.

Mr. HOOPER. I wish to add that from my own knowledge of that office I am confident the business cannot be conducted without this appropriation.

I withdraw my amendment.

The question recurred upon the amendment of Mr. WASHBURN to strike out the clause.

Mr. MORRILL. I move that the committee now rise, leaving the amendment pending, as I desire to have a full vote.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. DAWES reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had the Union generally under consideration, and particularly House bill No. 649, making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1866, and had come to no resolution thereon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Post Office Department containing a statement of all the payments from the contingent fund of that Department; which was laid on the table and ordered to be printed.

And then, on motion of Mr. FARNSWORTH, (at four o'clock and fifteen minutes,) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, January 19, 1865.

Prayer by Rev. THOMAS BOWMAN, D. D., Chaplain to the Senate.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. MORGAN presented the petition of Josephine Rice, widow of Brigadier General James C. Rice, praying for a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. WILSON presented a petition of medical officers in the service of the United States, praying that the rank and pay of hospital stewards be increased to that of brevet second lieutenants of artillery, to take rank next after the graduates of the Military Academy at West Point; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

He also presented a petition of hospital stewards, United States Army, praying an increase of rank and pay to that of brevet second lieutenants of artillery, to take rank next after the graduates of West Point Military Academy; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

Mr. DIXON presented the petition of Woodruff & Beach, of Hartford, Connecticut, contractors for building iron-clad vessels for the Navy, praying for additional compensation; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. SUMNER. I offer a memorial of three hundred and thirty-six enlisted colored soldiers at Camp Casey, Virginia, in which they ask Congress to provide by law that colored soldiers, irrespective of former condition, shall receive equal pay and bounty as promised by the Government to other soldiers of the same date of enlistment. I believe that in all perspective cases that equality is secured, and that therefore this memorial can be only applicable to a few past cases, in regard to which, as will be remembered, there was a complaint at the last session of Congress, and that complaint still continues. I believe there is a bill now pending, perhaps before the Senate, to provide a remedy in that case. I hope the remedy will be provided. Meanwhile, I ask that this memorial be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

The memorial was so referred.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I present the petition of William Nicholls, praying for a pension; and in connection with it I ask leave to withdraw from the files a former petition of his, with the papers in support of it, on which there was an adverse report based upon the fact that he did not establish proof of his having served in the war of 1812. He has since ascertained that he can supply that proof, and proposes now to do so. I make this statement so as to come within the rule of the Senate, which does not permit papers to be withdrawn where there has been an adverse report.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. CLARK in the chair.) They may be withdrawn by unanimous consent. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I move that those papers, with the petition which I now present, be referred to the Committee on Pensions.

The motion was agreed to.

THANKS TO GENERAL TERRY.

Mr. WILSON. The Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, to whom was referred a joint resolution (S. R. No. 98) tendering the thanks of Congress to Major General Alfred H. Terry, and to the officers and men under his command, for their gallantry and good conduct in the recent capture of Fort Fisher, have instructed me to report it back with an amendment putting the resolution in a new draft, and I ask that it be put on its passage now.

By unanimous consent, the joint resolution was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The amendment of the Committee on Military Affairs was to strike out all after the resolving clause of the resolution, and to insert the following:

That the thanks of Congress are hereby presented to Major General Alfred H. Terry, and to the officers and men under his command, for the unsurpassed gallantry and skill exhibited by them in the attack upon Fort Fisher, and the brilliant and decisive victory by which that important work has been captured from the rebel forces and placed in the possession and under the authority of the United States, and for their long and faithful service and unwavering devotion to the cause of the country in the midst of the greatest difficulties and dangers.

And be it further resolved, That the President of the United States be, and he hereby is, requested to communicate this resolution to Major General Terry, and through him to the officers and soldiers under his command.

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time, and passed. Its title was amended to read, "A joint resolution to present the thanks of Congress to Major General Alfred H. Terry and the officers and men under his command."

THANKS TO ADMIRAL PORTER.

Mr. GRIMES. I am instructed by the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. R. No. 99) tendering the thanks of Congress to Rear Admiral David D. Porter, and the officers, petty officers, seamen, and marines under his command, for their gallantry and good conduct in the recent capture of Fort Fisher, to report it back without amendment, and recommend its passage. I ask that it be put upon its passage at once.

By unanimous consent, the joint resolution was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. WILSON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 100) to extend the time for the payment of the special income tax by persons in receipt of salaries from the United States Government; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. WILSON also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 404) to secure impartiality in the administration of justice in the District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

FOREIGN IMMIGRATION.

Mr. SHERMAN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 403) to amend the act entitled "An act to encourage immigration," approved July 4, 1864, and the act entitled "An act to regulate the carriage of passengers in steamships and other vessels," approved March 3, 1855, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. SHERMAN. This is an amendment to the immigration bill of last session which was reported by me from the Committee on Agriculture and was in my charge; but the chairman of that committee is not present, and I move that this bill be referred to the Committee on Finance. There is really no appropriate committee for it. It relates to immigration, and probably might be referred either to the Committee on Foreign Relations or the Committee on Finance.

Mr. GRIMES. If it relates to the carrying of passengers it ought to be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. SHERMAN. It only amends the act relating to passengers, so far as immigrants are concerned. It is principally an amendment of the act of the last session relating to immigration. I have no objection to the bill going to the Committee on Commerce, except that I desire speedy and prompt action in order to repair evils that exist now to a certain degree in New York.

Mr. SUMNER. It seems to me that, all things considered, perhaps this bill had better go to the Committee on Finance, of which the Senator from Ohio is chairman. It is well known that the Senator introduced and carried through the Senate, at the last session, the bill which it is now proposed to amend, and I think that the proposition to amend it should be committed to the same hands from which the original bill proceeded. I hope, therefore, that it will be referred to the Committee on Finance.

The bill was referred to the Committee on Finance.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had concurred in the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 390) for the relief of Emily A. Lyon.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bills, in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested:

A bill (H. R. No. 640) providing for a district and a circuit court of the United States for the district of Nevada, and for other purposes; and

A bill (H. R. No. 689) to provide for Acting Assistant Treasurers or depositaries of the United States in certain cases.

CONDITION OF THE INDIAN TRIBES.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I move to take up the resolution which was reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs, in relation to the raising of a joint commission to examine into Indian affairs and the treatment of the Indian tribes by the civil and military authorities.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution (S. R. No. 89) directing inquiry into the condition of the Indian tribes and their treatment by the civil and military authorities. It provides for the raising of a joint committee, to consist of three members of the Senate and four members of the House, to inquire into the present condition of the Indian tribes, and especially into the manner in which they are treated by the civil and military authorities of the United States, with power to sit during the recess of Congress; to send for persons and papers; to employ a clerk; to subpoena or compel the attendance of witnesses; to hear the complaints of Indian chiefs, and to report at the next session of Congress such legislation as may be necessary for the better administration of Indian affairs; and appropriates the sum of $15,000 to defray the expenses of the same.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. GRIMES. I will inquire of the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs how he is going to get members of the House of Representatives to serve on that committee. If I recollect the reading of the resolution, it requires that the committee shall consist of three members of the Senate and four members of the House of Representatives, constituting a joint commission, who are to report at the next session of Congress. The time of the members of the present House of Representatives will expire on the 4th of March, and the new House will not be organized until the 1st of December. It seems to me that the only course the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs, or the committee, can pursue, is to make this a Senate committee, and direct them to report at the next session. It is not possible to have members of the House of Representatives added to this committee if they are to sit during the recess. Those that may be added, if the committee is constituted now, will cease to be members of the House on the 4th of March next, and then there will be no members until Congress shall convene again on the first Monday of December.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I suppose it might be amended so as to provide for the appointment by the Speaker of four members of the present House who are also reelected to the next House. The law can confer that authority.

Mr. GRIMES. I suppose the commission that these men will hold from their Speaker will expire at the same time that the power of the Speaker expires. How is the Speaker going to know in advance who are reelected and who are not until the credentials can be filed in the House of Representatives?

Mr. SUMNER. There can be no objection, for instance, to Congress appointing persons who are not members, outsiders absolutely.

Mr. GRIMES. That is another question. The question here is, whether we shall appoint members of the Senate and House of Representatives or not. We cannot appoint those who are said by common rumor to have been reelected to the next House, because those very men may be decided by the House itself not to be members of that body.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Perhaps all that might be avoided by amending the resolution so as to read, "four members of the House, to be appointed by the Speaker of the House of Representatives." Then, if he should name any four persons who are not elected to the next House, the law would confer upon them the authority to act on the committee during the recess. He, doubtless, would appoint those who are elected to the next House. Personally, of course, I should have no objection if this commission were confined to the Senate; but I think it would be more satisfactory to the country, and more satisfactory to the House of Representatives, as well as to the Senate, that the commission should be a joint one, consisting of members of the House as well as members of the Senate. That was the view of the Committee on Indian Affairs in reporting this resolution. I therefore move to amend the resolution as I have indicated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. CLARK.) The Senator from Wisconsin moves to amend the resolution by inserting in line four the word "present" before "House," and after the word "House" by inserting "to be appointed by the Speaker of the House of Representatives," so that it will read:

That there be raised a joint committee, to consist of three members of the Senate and four members of the present House, to be appointed by the Speaker of the House of Representatives, to inquire into the present condition of the Indian tribes, &c.

Mr. WILSON. It does seem to me that three members of this body will make a committee large enough for the purposes of this investigation. It will cost something, and I do not see any necessity of adding to expense in that direction. If any committee is raised, I hope we shall appoint a committee of three of this body, which will be ample in its numbers for all purposes. I hope the resolution will be so amended as to provide for the appointment of a committee of three members of the Senate to make this investigation. It will be large enough, and will be cheaper to the country than the present appropriation. We cannot afford to make any expenditures which can be avoided.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin.

The amendment was agreed to; there being, on a division—ayes 20, noes 12.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I wish to say one word to my friend from Massachusetts. He suggests that this ought to be a committee composed entirely of members of the Senate, and that it should not consist of more than three in number. I think that is a mistake. If we are to go into an investigation of this matter, I think the committee ought to be numerous enough to allow it to be subdivided, so that it could take testimony in different sections of the United States bearing on this question. It would be impossible for three men to do anything or make any investigation that would be efficient and worth anything. If we are to go into it, so far as I am concerned, I desire that it shall be thoroughly done. If it shall be composed of seven members, two members of the committee sitting together could take testimony and examine in relation to the state of Indian affairs in a certain section or in the Territories, while the others were employed elsewhere. I think it would be more satisfactory to our country to have the committee composed of members of the House as well as members of the Senate.

Mr. MORRILL. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Wisconsin, the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs, who has introduced this proposition, what is expected to be accomplished by it, and what is really the public necessity or exigency for such a measure.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Every one, it seems to me, must be aware that a great deal is said both publicly and privately among members of Congress in relation to the administration of Indian affairs both by the superintendents and agents who are appointed and have charge of these matters as well as by the military authorities who are dealing with them in the various Territories of the United States. It is alleged—I will not vouch for the truth of all these allegations—that in some of the Territories some of our military officers in command sometimes enter upon an expedition and get up an Indian war involving us in the expenditure of millions of dollars. It is also alleged that the superintendents and agents in the administration of Indian affairs in the Territories have been guilty of fraudulent practices by which the Government is subjected to great expense and the Indians themselves badly treated. So much has been said on the subject that it is believed that if we cannot reform altogether the administration of Indian affairs, it would be a matter of economy at least to the Government to spend some money and some time in having an investigation into the truth of these allegations, and to report to the next Congress any suggestions which may occur to the committee for the better administration of Indian affairs.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I shall vote for a committee representing both branches of Congress. I think it ought to be a congressional committee, because it is for the investigation of a very important subject. In addition to what the Senator from Wisconsin has said, I will say that this morning I learned that in August last the Governor of the Territory of Colorado issued a proclamation in which, after reciting that some of the Indian tribes were in a state of hostility against the whites, he required all the Indians to report themselves at certain military posts, stating that those who did not report themselves at these posts were to be regarded as in a state of hostility against the people of that Territory. He then called upon the people there to organize into military companies, directing them, after being thus organized, to exterminate the Indians who did not report themselves at the military posts, and said to those companies he had no means of paying them, but that they must pay themselves by taking the property of the Indians. That was the proclamation as I read it—and I presume it was a correct copy of the proclamation, brought to me by a gentleman in whom I have confidence—dated on the 11th of August last. I presume the troubles in that region of country have grown out of that proclamation—a most horrible thing. I am in favor of a committee representing the entire Congress, and that the investigation shall be thorough. I do not intend to throw any blame on the Administration here about it. I believe the wrongs to the Indians have continued for a number of Administrations; and I believe, further, that most of the Indian wars are the results of outrages committed by our own people upon them. I think Congress ought to take such steps as will save the nation from the calamities of Indian wars.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I move to amend the resolution so as to provide that the three members on the part of the Senate shall be appointed by the President of the Senate.

Mr. GRIMES. I suggest to the Senator that he leave that out, and also strike out that portion of the resolution which directs that the members on the part of the House of Representatives shall be appointed by the Speaker. It does not strike me as proper for the Senate to undertake to prescribe to the House how they shall appoint their committees. I think that should be left out, and let each body appoint its own members of this committee according to the regulations and rules established by the body. We have a method by which we provide for the appointment of our committees; I believe not by the President. It would not be proper for the House to send us an amendment to the resolution declaring that they shall be appointed by ballot; and it may be that the House have their regulations as to how their committees shall be appointed. If the Senator will leave out all of the resolution in regard to the mode of appointment of the committees, then it will be right.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. In answer to the suggestion of the Senator from Iowa, I will say that those words were inserted on my motion with a view to avoid a supposed difficulty growing out of the fact that the term of the present House expires on the 4th of March; and by inserting in the resolution, which has the effect of a law, the words "four members of the present House to be appointed by the Speaker," it will confer upon him the power to appoint them and give them power to sit beyond the termination of the present House of Representatives. That was the reason why that amendment was inserted. The only question is, whether those words are not put in there by way of amendment in such a form as substantially to say that all the members of the committee, the members on the part of the Senate as well as the members on the part of the House of Representatives, shall be appointed by the Speaker of the House of Representatives. I wish to avoid ambiguity on that subject. I ask the Secretary to read the clause as it stands.

The Secretary read, as follows:

That there be raised a joint committee, to consist of three members of the Senate and four members of the present House, to be appointed by the Speaker of the House of Representatives, to inquire into the present condition of the Indian tribes.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I move to insert after the word "Senate" the words "to be appointed by the President of the Senate."

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WILKINSON. I see by looking at this resolution that it provides that the committee may sit during the recess of Congress. I will inquire whether a committee of the present House of Representatives, which expires on the 4th of March, can sit properly after the termination of their term of office.

Mr. TRUMBULL. That point has already been discussed.

Mr. WILKINSON. I was not aware of it.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed.

ISAAC R. DILLER.

Mr. DAVIS. I move to take up House bill No. 94, for the relief of Isaac R. Diller.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill, the pending question being on the amendment reported by the Committee on Foreign Relations, in line six, after the word "thousand," to strike out "six hundred and fifty-five," and in line seven to strike out the words "and fifty-five cents;" so that it will read:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to pay to Isaac R. Diller, late consul at Bremen, the sum of $3,000, in full for the expenses incurred by him for extra clerk hire in his office, and for moneys advanced to destitute American citizens during the interval between the 1st day of August, 1857, and the 20th day of September, 1861.

Mr. DAVIS. I ask for the reading of the report made on this claim by the Committee on Foreign Relations at the second session of the Thirty-Seventh Congress.

The Secretary read the report made by Mr. SUMNER on the 16th of June, 1862:

The Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred the memorial of Isaac R. Diller, late United States consul at the port of Bremen, Germany, praying compensation for moneys expended by him while in the discharge of his official duties, have had the same under consideration, and now report:

It appears from the memorial that Mr. Diller was appointed by the President of the United States, and confirmed by the Senate, as consul to Bremen, in the year 1857; that he took possession of the consulate on the 1st day of August of that year, and that he continued to perform the duties thereof until the 23rd day of September, 1861, a period of four years, one month, and twenty days. That during this period he received as compensation for his services the sum of $4,000 per annum, as provided by the act of August 18, 1856, which was not sufficient to defray his personal expenses, and that he was also called upon to expend his private funds for clerk hire, fuel, and lights, travelling expenses on official business, and the relief of destitute seamen, to the amount of $4,380 55, a reimbursement of which he asks.

The inadequacy of the salary which Mr. Diller received, and the necessity for employment by him of clerks, in order to properly perform his official duties, is clearly set forth in a letter from Hon. Lewis Cass, Secretary of State, to Hon. G. W. Hopkins, chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs of the House of Representatives, dated January 12, 1859.

"The compensation attached to the consulate at Bremen," wrote Mr. Cass, "is $2,000 per annum, and the consul is not permitted to transact business. The consular fees, which in 1857 amounted to $1,177 27, are, under existing provisions of law, paid into the United States Treasury. A large number of American vessels are constantly arriving in Bremen, requiring the immediate attention not only of the consul himself but one or two clerks, and since the establishment of a line of steamers between New York and Bremen the consular duties have been largely increased by the number of American travelers arriving and departing. The Bremen office is also made, to some extent, a distributing office for parcels and letters transmitted from the Department to the United States consular and diplomatic officers residing on the Continent, the rate of postage being about fifty per cent. less upon mail matter sent directly to Bremen than if forwarded via Liverpool. Bremen is also the principal port from which emigrants take their departure to the United States, the number thus leaving amounting in the first ten months and a half of 1858 to twenty-two thousand five hundred and twenty-two, and for the first nine and a half months in 1857 to forty-four thousand nine hundred and fifty-one. It will be readily seen that the time of an intelligent consul must be much occupied in furnishing emigrants with information and in attending to their wants. A competent clerk cannot be obtained for less than $600 per annum, which, in consequence of the repeal of the seventh section of the act of August 18, 1856, regulating the diplomatic and consular systems of the United States, must be paid from the compensation provided for the consul. The cost of living in Germany has also, within a few years, largely increased, as will be seen by reference to the accompanying extracts from dispatches of the United States minister at Berlin and the consul general at Frankfurt, relating to the consulate at Bremen."

Governor Wright, minister at Berlin, informed the Department, in a dispatch dated September 18, 1858, that the consul at Bremen "cannot, with the most rigid economy, live upon his present salary," and S. Richer, Esq., consul general at Frankfurt, said, in a dispatch dated October 12 of the same year, that, for reasons which he gave at length, it was his "entire conviction that $4,000 salary and $1,000 for office expenses would be no more than a reasonable compensation" for Mr. Diller.

The memorialist states that to procure the services of an American citizen as consular clerk, in accordance with the "regulations," who was acquainted with the language of the country, he was compelled to pay his first assistant $600 a year, which he did actually pay during the four years that he held the office, and that the German correspondence relating to emigration occupied nearly the whole of this individual's time during that period. To a second clerk he paid $200 a year, which, he represents, was not a remuneration commensurate with the amount of labor performed, but as much as the memorialist was able to pay under the circumstances. The total amount paid by him for clerk hire is shown to have been $3,305 55.

The memorialist further represents that he was obliged to expend $120 for fuel and lights for the consular office; that he paid $350 for the relief of destitute American citizens, many of them sent to him by United States consuls in the interior of Germany, that they might be sent home; and that his traveling expenses on official business during the period of his consulate were $605. These journeys were to Berlin, to consult with the American minister there in relation to the compulsory enlistment of American citizens; to Frankfurt, to consult with the United States consul there on the transfer of German vessels to the American flag during the Italian war; and to the port of Bremen, to ascertain the real nationality of vessels for which United States papers were asked to render them neutrals.

The committee having requested the opinion of the Department of State in regard to the above items of expenditure by the memorialist, received in reply a letter from Hon. William H. Seward, Secretary of State, dated April 12, 1863, in which he said:

"In regard to office expenses 'for fuel and lights,' I have to state that the Department has never authorized any consul to charge such expenditures to the Government.

"Neither are consuls allowed to charge the Government their 'traveling expenses,' unless, which is very rarely the case, they are traveling on public business under the special orders of the Department, or of a United States legation.

"There is no appropriation subject to the disposition of the Department to enable it to refund to ministers and consuls the donations which they may make in charity to destitute American citizens other than seamen. On two occasions a bill for this purpose has passed the Senate, but was lost in the House of Representatives after debate, on the ground that it would lead to a large and constantly increasing expenditure. In this view of the subject the Department fully concurs. Special appropriations have been occasionally made by Congress, from time to time, for the relief of the consuls at Panama, Havana, Hong Kong, and Mauritius, for the relief thus afforded to American citizens; at the two places first named, American citizens are often overtaken with sickness, and thrown destitute upon the charity of the consul and his countrymen.

"At Bremen, also, a port from whence a large part of the emigration to the United States takes its departure, and where naturalized American citizens constantly arrive, there is a large and frequent call upon the consul for his charity.

"Should it appear that such charitable gifts have been judiciously made, and the proof be such as has been accepted by the accounting officers in adjusting the claims of consuls under similar appropriations, to which I have referred above, the Department is of opinion that an appropriation under this head for the relief of Mr. Diller might justly and equitably be made.

"In regard to clerk hire, I have to state that the repeal of the seventh section of the diplomatic and consular act of August 18, 1856, has operated very severely upon many of the consulates at which the consular business is such as to require the employment of clerks, whose compensation must be defrayed by the consul himself from his salary. The communications of my predecessors will furnish you with the opinion of the Department on this subject. (See Ex. Doc. No. 68, H. of Rep., 35th Congress, 2d sess., pp. 3, 5-13, 15-18, 20, 21, 55-62; also Ex. Doc. No. 44, H. of Rep., 35th Congress, 2d sess., pp. 1-9; see also Report No. 364, H. of Rep., 36th Congress, 1st sess., p. 2; also, manuscript letter dated December 12, 1861, of this Department, addressed to Hon. William P. Fessenden, chairman of the Committee on Finance, United States Senate.)

"The opinions of the Department in regard to the inadequacy of the compensation heretofore paid to the United States consul at Bremen have received confirmation during the present session of Congress, by which it has been increased to $3,000 per annum.

"The circumstances of the case, in view also of the precedents to which I have referred, are such, in the opinion of the Department, as to warrant the recommendation which is now made of an appropriation for the relief of the petitioner."

The committee have been unwilling to recognize the claim for fuel and lights; nor can they recognize the claim for travel except beyond the limits of his consulate. But taking into consideration the inadequacy of his compensation and the meritorious character of much of the services for which the memorialist now seeks remuneration, they think it advisable that the Secretary of State should be directed to audit and settle his accounts on principles of justice and equity, within the limits of $3,000. They report a bill accordingly, and recommend its passage.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I am sorry to be obliged to oppose this bill; but I feel it to be my duty to do so. In this case Congress is asked to do for an old employé of the Democratic party some years ago, what it has refused to do by a direct vote for a meritorious servant of their own at the present time. There is no pretense, or if there is there is no evidence, that Mr. Diller discovered that he was doing such a losing business all the while he was doing it. He was appointed in 1857 and remained until 1861, and received the salary provided by law, which he says was not sufficient for him. I understand—and I get it from my learned friend on my left [Mr. SUMNER]—that applications are coming from all over the world to this Government at the present time stating the inadequacy of the compensation that is paid to consuls now; and I understand the honorable Senator to think that a great many of those representations are well founded, and that their compensation is inadequate. In the case of the consul at Halifax, referred to the other day, we not only had these facts, which I think commended themselves to the whole Senate, but we had the recommendation of the Committee on Commerce.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. CLARK.) It becomes the duty of the Chair to interrupt the Senator to call up the order of the day, being the unfinished business of yesterday.

Mr. HALE. Very good, sir; I shall have the floor when this claim comes up again, I suppose.

MILITARY SERVICE.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The unfinished business of yesterday is the bill (H. R. No. 583) to amend the twenty-first section of an act entitled "An act to define the pay and emoluments of certain officers of the Army, and for other purposes," approved July 17, 1862.

Mr. CHANDLER. I believe the House bill No. 307 was made the special order for this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will inform the Senator that the unfinished business of yesterday supersedes the special order by the operation of the rules and practice of the Senate.

Mr. CHANDLER. I give notice that I will call up that bill the very moment this is disposed of.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question before the Senate is on an amendment of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] to an amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. WILSON.] The bill and the amendment, and the amendment to the amendment, will be read for the information of the Senate.

The Secretary read them. The amendment submitted by Mr. WILSON is to add the following additional sections:

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That it is not within the intent of the first section of the act of March 3, 1863, entitled "An act to authorize the brevetting of volunteer and other officers in the United States service," authorizing the President to confer brevet rank for gallant actions and meritorious conduct, to make a distinction as to pay between officers of volunteer and other forces, including the regular Army; but that such brevet rank does not entitle any officer, either of the regular Army or volunteers, to any increase of pay or emoluments.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That if a soldier, discharged for wounds received in battle, die before receiving the bounty provided by the act of March 3, 1863, entitled "An act to amend an act to authorize the employment of volunteers," &c., the bounty due shall descend to his heirs in the same manner and order of succession as if he had died in the service.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is informed that the Senator from Ohio yesterday proposed to modify his amendment to the amendment. Will he state the modification?

Mr. SHERMAN. My amendment is not offered as an amendment to that of the Senator from Massachusetts, but as an independent proposition.

The amendment of Mr. WILSON was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. I now offer my proposition as a new section:

And be it further enacted, That no alien who has resided in the United States for five years prior to the 19th day of April, 1861, and who if naturalized would have been subject to military duty, shall be hereafter naturalized, any act to the contrary notwithstanding.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in, and ordered to be engrossed. The bill was ordered to a third reading, was read the third time, and passed. Its title was amended by the addition of the words "and for other purposes."

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 640) providing for a district and a circuit court of the United States for the district of Nevada, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The bill (H. R. No. 689) to provide for Acting Assistant Treasurers or depositaries of the United States in certain cases, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

COMMERCE AMONG THE STATES.

Mr. CHANDLER. I now move to take up House bill No. 307, which was made the special order of the day.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 307) to regulate commerce among the several States.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, the bill which is now before the Senate, according to my view, involves principles of great importance, which it is very desirable, if they have not been settled, should be settled at the very earliest possible time. I do not know officially, for there is nothing on the face of the bill which gives the information, whether it is the purpose of the bill only to act practically upon a particular railroad or to affect all the railroads in the country. The legal operation of the bill will of course be coextensive with all the railroads that there may be now or at any time hereafter in any of the States of the Union.

During the long period that has elapsed from the adoption of the Constitution to the present time, no such measure as this has ever been proposed; and as far as I am advised, the statesmen by whom the Constitution was framed, and those who assisted in the organization of the Government under it, and all the men whom we have a right to consider as the great men of the age in which they lived, who have from time to time administered the Government either in the halls of Congress or on the bench, have never pretended, as I think, that Congress has any authority to pass a bill of this kind.

Coeval with the Government, and during the whole of the period to which I have adverted, it seemed to be admitted as a proposition perfectly clear, admitting of no argument to enforce it, that over the internal commerce of a State the State had exclusive jurisdiction, and also to be admitted that with reference to all the territory within the limits of a State the State had exclusive jurisdiction. The United States are not at liberty, by any authority communicated by any express words of the Constitution, to obtain jurisdiction over any portion of the States, except, with the assent of the State governments. That is very clear. If you want a navy-yard, if you want a mint, if you want a court-house, if you want any other matter that requires for its success the possession and jurisdiction over it of any portion of the territory belonging to any one of the States, you can only obtain it with the assent of the State. The power given to the Government by the provision to which I have adverted, of obtaining jurisdiction over any portion of a State, was given because without it, in the judgment of the Convention, there would have been no means of obtaining jurisdiction at all. It was therefore an independent power in the judgment of the Convention; not a power incidental to any of the other powers conferred upon the Government, but a power which it was necessary to confer by a special provision in order to give to the Government the benefit of the exercise of that power.

There was at one time a doubt as to the true meaning of the clause to be found in the eighth section of the first article which gives to Congress the right "to establish post offices and post roads." The question turned upon the meaning of the word "establish," as there used. Some few contended that it gave to Congress the right to make roads as well as to say what roads already made by the States they would use for the transportation of their mails; but the received opinion after a while, which was adopted and has been uniformly acted upon, and since recognized as the correct opinion by the judiciary in every instance in which any analogous question has been before the Supreme Court of the United States and the circuit courts of the United States, has been that the meaning of the clause giving to Congress the right to establish post roads meant only that they had the power to designate roads already existing.

In 1800 Congress authorized the construction of the Cumberland road by the act of the 29th of March of that year. The State of Ohio had been given by the act creating that State a right to a certain portion of the proceeds of the sales of the public lands for the purpose of making roads to that State and in that State; and Congress, at the time the act of 1800 was passed, supposed that the proceeds of the sales of those lands would be sufficient to construct the road which they proposed to make by that act. That road was to commence at Cumberland, was to run of course through a portion of Maryland, a portion of Virginia, and through Ohio to its terminus on the Ohio-line. It became very important, as Congress supposed, to provide for the construction of that road, not only for the benefit of Ohio, but for the benefit of the country at large; but the Congress who passed that act supposed, as is very evident from their language, that they had no power to make that road without obtaining the assent of Maryland, Virginia, and Ohio; and the law therefore provides that the road is only to be made with the assent of those States. That the Senate will see by the terms of the act itself.

From time to time, however, appropriations were made for the further continuation of the road out of funds in the Treasury, the fund received from the sales of the public lands in Ohio being found inadequate to accomplish the purpose; and then this question arose, what authority had Congress to appropriate moneys of the Government to such a purpose? There is in the Constitution no express authority to appropriate money at all; it is to be implied from the provision that "no appropriation of money" for raising and supporting armies "shall be for a longer term than two years," and the provision that "no money shall be drawn from the Treasury but in consequence of appropriations made by law;" but except so far as the implication of the power to appropriate is to be made from the existence of the limitation upon the power in these two clauses, there was no particular provision in the Constitution which authorized Congress to do anything more than to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises. But in the same clause which gives to Congress the authority to lay the taxes, &c., it is provided that they shall also "pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States." The proposition before Congress, which was submitted by a bill afterward vetoed by Mr. Madison, and by another bill afterward vetoed by Mr. Monroe, was that under that authority it was perfectly immaterial whether Congress had the authority to make the road or not by express grant, it being insisted on the part of those who gave a broad construction to the terms of this latter power, that it was itself an independent power; that is to say, that Congress could appropriate the moneys derived from the taxing power to any purpose which in the judgment of Congress was material to the common defense and general welfare. But that was soon found to be altogether untenable; and Mr. Monroe, in a paper which, as I think, exhausts the argument on the point, communicated with his message of May, 1822, vetoing that particular bill submitted to him, came to the conclusion I will now state, admitting, however, that in doing so he had changed his original views. The language of the clause, as the Senate will remember, is that Congress shall have power "to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises, to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States."

The strict constructionists, those who were known at the time as the Virginia school of politicians, insisted upon it that there was no authority to appropriate the money derived from taxes under the clause which gives to Congress the authority to provide for the common defense and general welfare, except to the attainment of some of the particular objects over which Congress was given exclusive jurisdiction, and that it was incumbent, therefore, to go into all the enumerated powers conferred in the clause when you were called upon to appropriate the public money, in order to ascertain whether that appropriation was necessary to carry out the end sought to be accomplished by either one of the enumerated powers. In the paper to which I allude, communicated with his message of May, 1822, Mr. Monroe argued with great force (admitting, as I have just stated, that in that particular his own opinion had been changed on examination) that as there was no limitation at all to the power to lay taxes, &c., as Congress could levy any amount of taxes, any amount of imposts, any amount of duties, and any amount of excise, it was equally true that they could do anything with the money which they should get from the imposition of these taxes that they in their judgment might think would conduce to the common defense and the general welfare; and that the only guard against an abuse of the latter power was precisely the same guard (and which the Constitution supposed to be a sufficient guard) against the abuse of the taxing power; that is to say, responsibility to the people.

The people need not be apprehensive that more than a sufficient amount of taxes would be raised; first, because such taxation would operate on the members of Congress who might impose it; and second, because they would know when they were imposing it that they must go home and account why it was that they had levied such an amount of taxation on the people; and as that was, according to the theory of the Constitution, taken to be a sufficient protection against the abuse of that power, it was also a sufficient guard against the abuse of the other power—the power of appropriating money which they should get by means of the taxing power to any improper or injurious purpose; and he came therefore to this conclusion, that if there was money in the Treasury, which could only get there through the taxing power, Congress might use it in any way that Congress thought proper, and that it would be a legitimate use if they used it for the accomplishment of any national as contradistinguished from any mere local or State object, but that they had the right to decide for themselves what was national; and if they decided erroneously it was a matter that could not be inquired into in any other way than by an appeal to the people and a change of the members of the legislative councils of the country, and the repeal of the statute. He came then to the conclusion, with reference to the particular bill, that Congress might appropriate whatever money it thought proper for the completion of the Cumberland road, and for the completion of any other work of internal improvement; but he considered—and in that he was justified by the whole course of the Government—as perfectly clear that the authority to appropriate money for the construction of any internal improvement did not carry with it the authority to construct the improvement. That involved the exercise of territorial jurisdiction, and the territorial jurisdiction was a matter intrusted entirely to the States. If, therefore, a road was to be made, the road was to be made by State authority; and so in relation to a canal.

I have not got the book by me, but I know I speak it correctly. It would be very unnecessarily trespassing upon the Senate to read the decisions which from time to time have been given upon that clause, or upon the clause authorizing Congress to establish post offices and post roads. It is sufficient for my purpose to refer to a sentence or two in an opinion of the circuit court for the seventh circuit, which I say, with perfect knowledge, is in accordance with the decisions of the Supreme Court where such questions have arisen, and with the opinions of the other circuit courts before whom the question has been presented. And it should be the more persuasive, I think, because it was pronounced by Mr. Justice McLean, who was, if such an expression could be used in relation to a judge, rather latitudinarian in his constructions of the Constitution, and thought that there was hardly anything that the Federal Government could not do under some of its powers. The limitations to which, according to his view, it was alone subjected, were limitations comparatively few in the opinion of many others who differed from him; but so far as this particular question is concerned, he decided in accordance with the view I have stated in what was called the Rock Island case; and I read from his opinion in that case, as reported in the sixth volume of his own Reports, page 524, a sentence or two. The case before the court was an application on the part of the United States to have arrested, by injunction, the bridge proposed to be thrown over the Mississippi at Rock Island, upon the ground that it would interfere with the commercial power, under which power all navigation upon navigable rivers was to be made free, except so far as Congress, from time to time, might impede navigation by the exercise of regulations of their own, passed under the authority which they had to make regulations concerning commerce between the States:

"Under the commercial power, [said Judge McLean,] Congress may declare what shall constitute an obstruction or nuisance, by a general regulation, and provide for its abatement by indictment or information through the Attorney General; but neither under this power, nor under the power to establish post roads, can Congress construct a bridge over a navigable water. This belongs to the local or State authority within which the work is to be done. But this authority must be so exercised as not materially to conflict with the paramount power to regulate commerce."

"If Congress can construct a bridge over a navigable water under the power to regulate commerce or to establish post roads, on the same principle it may make turnpike or railroads throughout the country. The latter power has generally been considered as exhausted in the designation of roads on which the mails are to be transported; and the former by the regulation of commerce upon the high seas, and upon our rivers and lakes. If these limitations are to be departed from there can be no others, except the discretion of Congress."

And then he goes on to speak of what might be the practical mischiefs arising from the possession of such a power by Congress; that is to say, an unlimited power to go into the States to build bridges over the navigable rivers of the States, and to make railroads for transit. As I have said, that limitation upon the authority of Congress is recognized by every judicial decision as far as I am advised which any of the courts have pronounced upon any question at all analogous to the question that is now before the Senate.

Now, Mr. President, what is this bill? It is not a bill to make a railroad anywhere; and for the purpose of illustrating the view which I am about to take it is not necessary to speak of the operation of a bill all over the country; I will take a single case for the purpose of showing what the bill does. I do not say that it has been passed for the purpose of effecting that object, for I do not know it officially, however I may suspect it. The State of New Jersey in the infancy of the railroad system, as far back as the year 1830, when nobody knew with anything like certainty what would be the result—we had no experience at that time which would enable a man or a government or a company to decide whether it would be a profitable business to engage in enterprises of this description—authorized the construction of a railroad under a charter granted to the Camden and Amboy Railroad Company. At the same time they authorized a company to make a canal called the Delaware and Raritan canal. The latter, perhaps, was under all the circumstances supposed to be a more perilous enterprise than the former; for although in Europe canals had been made, yet a canal of this length had never been constructed through a State like New Jersey, not then with the population that now teems upon her fields, and terminating in the cities of Philadelphia and New York, not then as now numbering a population by millions, but cities almost in their infancy comparatively. It was exceedingly doubtful whether either of these enterprises would prove to be lucrative on the part of the corporators. What did New Jersey say? What was she obliged to say? What was her object in saying it? She wanted a railroad between Philadelphia and New York; she wanted canal transportation between those two termini; it was not only important to her, and it was not only important to Pennsylvania and New York; it was important to the United States. Every man who came from the West, traveling north to the East, and every man who came from the opposite quarter traveling West, and every man who had any merchandise to send of any description from west to east or east to west, was interested in having a mode of transportation for himself and merchandise through New Jersey. New Jersey, then, actuated by that enlightened policy which I think has illustrated her career, and by that patriotic policy which has illustrated her career from the beginning of her existence as a State, during the period of the revolutionary struggle down to the present time, determined that she would, if she could, have made through her limits a railroad and a canal which would operate so beneficially not only for herself but for the rest of the country. But how to do it was the question.

This enterprise required an expenditure of millions; she could not make the expenditure, she had not the means of making the expenditure, without very heavy and onerous taxation. Who would make it? Individuals. How could they be induced to do it? By giving them a charter that promised to make the railroad and the canal, when they should be constructed, profitable. How was that to be accomplished? There were two ways to accomplish it: the first was to authorize them to levy any amount by way of toll that they might think proper; the other was to guard them against all competition. It was better, in her judgment, and, as I think, she decided right, that she should hold out the latter motive to the individuals who might be willing to construct this railroad and this canal, because to tax by a heavy imposition of toll would be not only to injure her citizens who might want to travel on these improvements, but would be to injure us and the other citizens of the United States who might want to travel and to transport their merchandise upon them. A smaller tax might be made sufficiently remunerative and satisfactory, and a sufficient inducement to engage in the enterprise, provided the parties were secured as against the injurious effect of competition.

Now, Mr. President, a word or two will show, as I think, that New Jersey had a right to do both. New Jersey was under no obligation to make a road or a canal. I suppose that will be admitted. There is nothing in the Constitution of the United States which compels New Jersey to spend a dollar for the benefit of other States, to spend a dollar in the construction of roads or canals in her own State. What she does for the benefit of her own citizens she is authorized to do, and may be compelled to do, not by the United States, but by the influence of her own population. They elect her Legislature; and if they, the people of New Jersey, are willing to have roads constructed, they, the people, will instruct the members of their Legislature to construct any particular road or canal that they want, but the United States have no right to interfere. If New Jersey was not under any obligation to the United States, or any citizen whatever living in any other State, to construct a road or canal in 1830, when these two improvements were authorized, and she determined upon constructing a road and canal, had she not a right to say upon what terms she would authorize them to be constructed? Who can doubt that? She had the power to make either of these improvements, and nobody had a right to enforce as against her the execution of that power. It was a power confided to her own sole discretion; and being in the full and unlimited possession of the power, she had a right to exert it just in the manner she thought proper; and if she, in her judgment, believed that she could make this road by means of this charter, and by force of all the provisions contained in the charter, including that provision which secures the company as against competition, who has a right to complain of it? Can the corporators complain after they have got the charter? I suppose that question answers itself. And if they cannot complain, who else can complain?

My friend from Michigan is a citizen of the United States, but a citizen of Michigan. He wants to come to Washington. He gets to the eastern limit of New Jersey and he insists upon the right to come through. When he gets there, there is no road to bring him through. What is he to do? File a bill in equity against the State of New Jersey to compel the specific performance of some duty which she owes to the United States, to compel New Jersey to make a road over which my friend from Michigan can travel to Washington or from Washington home? Certainly not. When he gets there, and there is no road, does he stand in a stronger relation to the government of New Jersey than every Jerseyman stands in relation to that government? And if no Jerseyman could complain that New Jersey had not provided for a road through her limits, it would follow necessarily that my friend could not complain that she was without such a road and that he had to foot it the best way he could.

But the question, as I think, is not open to serious doubt. I have said that being under no obligation to make a road at all, being because of the absence of any obligation to make a road clothed with the power to exercise unlimited discretion in making a road, she had a right to determine upon what terms she would make it. She has made it, and she has authorized some of these companies to charge toll. When the honorable member gets to the eastern limit of that State, has he a right to come through New Jersey upon that road without paying toll? How was it before the system of railroads was adopted? How were the turnpike roads made? Not by any act of Congress; not by any power supposed to be derived to the States by any act of Congress, but by virtue of a power antecedently existing in the States, not surrendered by the Constitution of the United States to the Government of the United States, and therefore remaining just as effective and operative as it would have been if the Constitution of the United States never had been adopted. Does anybody doubt that upon those turnpikes, such as were made in all the States of the Union before the railroad system was adopted, no man had a right to travel without paying toll? That question also, I presume, is too clear for debate.

Then, if you cannot travel upon a railroad or a turnpike without conforming to that provision to be found in the charter under which turnpikes or railroads are made that authorizes the companies to charge toll either for the transportation of passengers or the transportation of merchandise, what right have you to complain—I mean legal right, constitutional right? You may think it unkind in New Jersey, a want of comity, the absence of an enlightened policy, that she will have her system of railroads such as it is now; but what right have you to complain that you are placed in the position of all the citizens of the State of New Jersey, and all the other citizens of the country at large?

Why, Mr. President, if you do not pass this bill cannot these companies surrender their charters to New Jersey to-morrow, and then can she not close the road permanently, and permanently close the canal? I suppose nobody doubts that; and if New Jersey could do both, or either, it is only because over the construction of a road or a canal the jurisdiction of a State is not concurrent with any jurisdiction possessed by the United States, but is exclusive of all power on the part of the United States.

When New Jersey passed her act chartering the Camden and Amboy Railroad Company, on the 5th of February, 1830, and by the same act chartered the Delaware and Raritan Canal Company, she granted them certain privileges. The railroad company was authorized to charge ten cents a mile on each passenger and ten cents on each ton of merchandise. There was a provision in that charter, however, which gave to the State a right to take the road or the canal at any time during the thirty years for which the charter was granted upon a valuation; the State was an incorporator to the extent of a thousand shares, I think, and she was entitled by the original act of course to all the dividends that those one thousand shares would earn. Soon, however, the companies and the State became satisfied that it would be to the advantage of both parties, the corporations and the State, that there should be a change in the charter. Several changes were made, but it is only material to my purpose to mention two. The rate of tolls has been decreased to three cents a mile for the through travel, and the company having accepted the change have no right now to charge more than three cents; and the State, in consideration of the company giving up the right to charge the tolls which they were authorized to charge by the original act, agreed to waive her right to take the road and the canal at any time before the expiration of another period, and extended the charters to 1869. They have now, therefore, to run four years. The companies stipulated to pay a certain sum in gross, no matter what might be the receipts; that is to say, provided the receipts did not give such a sum as the State desired, she was to have in all events a specified amount—I forget what it was; but I think about thirty thousand dollars a year.

But the State did more. The companies had her charter, with which she had no right to interfere, as I am sure all Senators understand very well—certainly all the lawyers in the body do. The State could not alter the charter; every provision of it was good as long as the charter lasted. The State could not induce the companies to surrender their right of charging the toll which they were authorized to charge by the original charter of 1830, by alone waiving the right to take the road and the canal until 1869, but had to go further and give them the benefit of another provision, and that was that during the entire period which might elapse from the acceptance of the supplementary act of 1832 until 1869 the State would authorize no road or canal to be made which could compete at all with this road and this canal. That has all been done; that was done in 1832.

Then how does the State stand? I will take the case of one company, for it is fatiguing to mention both. She has granted to the Camden and Amboy Railroad Company a charter which authorized them to construct and keep running up to 1869 a railroad between Camden and Amboy; she has said that in consideration of the company agreeing to charge only three cents—more than two thirds less than they were authorized to charge—in consideration of their agreeing so to release a right which the State had given them, and over which she had no further control, which right stood protected by the United States as a contract, she would agree upon her part that she would not, during the whole period from 1832 to 1869, construct or authorize the construction of any other road which should compete at all with the road of this company. I suppose there is no doubt that the State had a right to make that agreement.

There have been some doubts as to the extent of the provision of the Constitution of the United States which prohibits the States from passing any laws impairing the obligations of contracts. In the beginning of the Government it was supposed that it did not apply to anything assuming the form of a contract to which a State was a party; and therefore no legislation constituting a company, or making a grant of land, and entering into stipulations with the grantee on the part of the State, was by some supposed to be embraced by the prohibition against the States impairing the obligation of contracts. But in the case of the State of New Jersey vs. Wilson, reported in 7 Cranch, and recognized ever since by all subsequent cases, the Supreme Court decided that the contract made in that case was protected. What was that? It was a very strong case, and about which a good deal might have been said at the time, and a good deal was said. There were differences of opinion—not on the bench, for the court was unanimous, but at the bar—whether that contract, if it could be called a contract, was binding at all upon the State, on the ground that it was a contract which the State had no right to enter into. The State of New Jersey took possession of certain lands belonging to Indians within her limits, and agreed to purchase for them other lands, and agreed that the other lands which she was to purchase should not be subject to the taxing power of the State. The Indians sold those lands, and they came into the hands of the parties who were in possession of them, and who were parties to the case which I have just mentioned, and the question before the Supreme Court of the United States, on appeal from the courts of New Jersey, was whether it was competent for the State to surrender at all the taxing power; whether it was not simply void legislation, not because of any clause of the Constitution of the United States, but because of the nature of the power itself. It was imagined to be a power so necessary to State existence, that a State could not deprive herself of it. The Supreme Court, however, decided that in that case the agreement was a contract, and therefore protected by the constitutional inhibition upon the States interfering with contracts.

I shall not fatigue the Senate by referring to other cases. That case has been recognized by every judicial decision pronounced by the Supreme Court since. Precisely the same question was involved and decided in a case before the Supreme Court so recently as 3 Howard. Maryland wanted to make a road from Baltimore to Cumberland to strike the national road; and it was that system which made Baltimore what she was before the system of railroads was adopted. The State had not the money to make the road; but she had banking institutions, and she had persons who were anxious to enjoy banking facilities, and she renewed the charters of the existing banks and has authorized other banks to be instituted, provided, as a condition of their charters, that they should pay a certain amount as a fund to be appropriated to the construction of those roads. The State claimed the right to impose an additional tax. The question came up to the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Gordon vs. the Tax Court; and the Supreme Court unanimously held that Maryland, in the first place, had a right to agree with these banking institutions for the consideration stated in their charter; that is to say, if they would give their money to be appropriated to the construction of these improvements, she in consideration thereof would impose no further taxes upon them during the continuance of their charter. The court were unanimous. The same doctrine was maintained in the prior case of Dartmouth College, reported in 4 Wheaton.

Now, Mr. President, if I am right so far, what does this bill do? It says, no matter what are the limitations to be found in any railroad charter, no matter what they are prohibited from doing, whether, among other things, they are prohibited from carrying upon and over their road, their connections, their boats, their bridges, or their ferries, all freight, all property, all mails, all passengers, all troops and Government supplies, or are prohibited from carrying over such improvement any particular freight, any particular property, or any particular class of passengers or troops, they are to have that privilege by virtue of this act. Is not that altering the franchise? If you have a right to do it, what is the effect of it? Does it not last just as long as the proprietors of the road desire to have it continued? If New Jersey goes to any particular company not authorized by her charter to do these things, and claims and asserts that they are doing what the charter does not authorize; that they are carrying passengers when they are unauthorized by their charter to carry passengers at all; or they are carrying passengers between termini between which they are not authorized to carry them by their charter; and that the charter is forfeited by reason of that abuse of the franchise; they answer "Congress tells us, in spite of you, that we are authorized to do that which you did not authorize us to do, and although we abuse your charter in point of fact, step beyond the limits of the franchise; although you acted honestly with us in limiting the franchise, and supposed that that limitation would be observed by us; and although you granted the charter upon conditions that the limitation would be observed, we do not mean to observe it now. We will claim all the privileges you have granted to us, and we will get rid of the limitations imposed in the charter granting us those benefits, under the authority of Congress."

It is even a greater power than authorizing the road to be made. It is denying to the State the right to make roads of this description as she thinks they ought to be made, because to admit that she has a right to impose limitations as between herself and the holders of the franchise, and to hold at the same time that it is within the power of Congress to free the holders of the franchise from the obligations of the franchise, is to tell New Jersey, (to apply it to New Jersey,) "Your authority to make railroads is to be exercised in subordination to our authority to extend the privileges and to do away with the conditions without which you never would have authorized the roads to have been made at all."

Under this bill they are authorized to receive, for the transportation over their road of what by it they are authorized to transport, compensation. What compensation? How is it to be regulated? What limitation is there upon it? The charter has no limitation, because (according to the assumption I have made, that this is to apply to a road which is not authorized to carry passengers and freight through,) the charter does not authorize them to charge at all for carrying passengers and freight through. Then, if there is no authority in the charter to carry passengers and freight from one terminus to the other, there is no limitation in the charter upon the right to carry such passengers or freight; and as you are about to authorize them to carry passengers and freight, and to receive compensation therefor, without limiting the compensation which they are to receive, you are about to give them the authority to charge just what they please.

I do not know that that is the purpose of the framers of the bill, but that is the effect of it. Then you place New Jersey in this situation: She thought it advisable, and experience has proved that it was sufficient for the purpose of the improvement, that there should be a limitation; you come in and say that with reference to a certain description of work upon the road, transporting passengers or transporting freight, there shall be no limitation, but that, on the contrary, any company to whom this bill may be applicable can charge just what they please.

I do not know, because as yet, except in very general terms, the authority of Congress to pass this act has not been placed upon any particular ground, upon what grounds the friends of this bill suppose the power to pass it is to be found. Is it to be found in the authority to establish post roads? As I have said, it is rather too late in the day to claim this particular power under that clause of the Constitution. The settled doctrine on the subject has been that it gives no power of that kind at all. That is a power to designate some existing road and nothing else, and was not intended to take from the States the authority to stop the road at any time it thought proper. The security against public mischief to result from it is in the interest which every State has in having a connection by these improvements with its own roads or over others. It appeals—and that was supposed to be a sufficient guarantee against abuse—not only to the motive of pecuniary interest, but to the motive of a high and elevated patriotism, the love of country, the love of neighbor; and our fathers thought that the latter would be abundantly sufficient to secure a free communication between the different sections of the country.

It may be said that New Jersey has no right to say that a citizen from Michigan or from Massachusetts shall not come through her territory. It will be sufficient to argue that question when New Jersey says it. She has not said any such thing. If New Jersey is under no obligation to make roads, and particularly under no obligation to make the particular roads which are complained of, the Camden and Amboy railroad, and the Delaware and Raritan canal, all that she has done by making them is to say that a certain description of travel through her territory may be made upon that road and upon that canal; but she has not said that unless you go upon the canal or upon the road you cannot go through her territory. Go upon the other road; if she has turnpikes resort to the turnpikes; if she has no turnpikes travel what are called the country roads; if she has no country roads walk through. If such a suicidal policy was adopted by New Jersey you would not suffer half as much as New Jersey. It would make her a wilderness if she adopted a policy of that description. She is bound, with a view almost to her own existence, certainly to the promotion of her own prosperity, to furnish the means by which travel into or through her territory from the other States may be made; but she is under no obligation to say that she will spend her money to give you a favorite mode of transportation except upon her own terms. She is under no obligation to make these roads at all.

She has resorted to the other mode of making them to which all the States of the Union have resorted. She has constituted companies, and clothed those companies with the authority to exercise eminent domain in order to get the right of way over which the roads are to pass. It was at one time doubted whether that right of eminent domain could be transferred, but that doubt has long since been set at rest. Each State can take private property for public uses independent of any express authority. It is an inherent right of sovereignty, and every State has the authority to do it upon making compensation; and it has been uniformly held from the beginning of the system of roads of every description and of canals, that the State having the authority to do it herself, can do it by means of private companies chartered for the purpose; although one of the effects of such enterprises is the benefit of the particular corporators, the public interest is so far promoted that it well falls within the power which a State has to take private property for public use.

I have no interest in these companies, not the slightest. I wish it suited the policy of New Jersey to have a railroad through every county of the State; but that is a matter for herself to decide.

It is said that she has exacted from the citizens of other States a tax for the privilege of passing over her own territory. That is not so. I do not know what the particular provision of the New Jersey charter is, but I know what the provision in the charter under which the road from here to Baltimore has been made is. The State of Maryland authorizes the company to charge a certain amount of toll per mile for passengers and freight. That she has a right to do, and nobody has a right to complain. The honorable member from Michigan [Mr. CHANDLER] would not complain if the charter provided that the whole amount of that charge was to go into the exchequer of the company; but his complaint is that Maryland in the one case, or New Jersey in the other, is deriving benefit by getting a part of the toll which the companies are authorized to charge. Has she not a right to do it? If she has a right to make a charge without the payment of which no man has a right to travel upon the road, who has a right to complain of the manner in which she disposes of the money which she may receive from the operation of the road? Whether she gives it to the corporators individually, or whether she says that it is to be shared in certain proportions between the corporators and the State, nobody has a right to complain.

The only ground of complaint—not a legal ground of complaint—would be one resting on the assumption of its being a want of proper policy, charging more than should be charged; but what is to be done with the amount is a matter between the State granting the franchise and the corporators under the franchise. In fact, in legal intentment, when a charter of this description is made, the State granting the charter becomes quasi a corporator. The individual passenger pays on going from here to Baltimore $1.50 for the privilege of going expeditiously, with increased safety, at all hours of the day and night. The company have said that they will make a road and they will transport. The States say, "Make the road and transport, and you shall have the privilege to charge $1.50 upon each passenger transported either way, and you and I will share in that $1.50 in the proportion of one fifth to four fifths;" that is to say, Maryland is quasi a corporator as far as that is concerned. I do not know the provision in the New Jersey charters, but I suppose it is substantially the same.

Then the question comes around to and at last results in the proposition I have stated in the beginning: was New Jersey under any obligation to make that road? Everybody must say no. Had anybody else a right to make it except under the authority of New Jersey? I think everybody must answer no. If there was no obligation upon her to make it, and nobody else but herself could make it or authorize it to be made, then she had a right to say upon what terms she would make it; and he who undertakes to make it, or does make it, under a charter which subjects him to certain conditions, does not act honestly, certainly does not act legally, unless he complies with the condition. If he abuses the power, transcends the authority conferred upon him by the franchise, the franchise will be taken from him; the road is no longer his, and vests in the sovereign.

But here you propose to step in and say to New Jersey, who alone could have made the road, to whose exclusive jurisdiction the subject itself is confided, because not delegated by the Constitution; "It is true you had a right to make the road; you have made it; it has been made under your authority; you never would have authorized it to be made except upon the conditions included within that authority; but Congress now says to you your limitations are wholly inoperative as against us; it is our right not to assist anything that you have done, not to complete your road, not to appropriate money for the purpose if money should be wanted, but to step in and annul the very conditions without which you never would have authorized the construction of the road."

With a view to illustrate the operation of this bill, I have spoken of this legislation upon that particular road; but I warn Senators that there is involved in this measure a principle which is destructive of the sovereignty of their own States. If you pass this measure, and it can stand judicial examination—I am sure it will not; at least I think so—you submit the authority of the States now supposed to be exclusive to the unlimited power of Congress, or, to use the language of that part of the opinion of Mr. Justice McLean to which I have just referred,

"If these limitations are to be departed from"— the limitations upon the power of the Government of which he has been speaking, to establish post roads and to regulate commerce—

"then there can be no others except the discretion of Congress."

Congress may do with any of your roads just what Congress may think fit to do; and in a controversy between any one State and all the other States in which the Representatives from the other States may be brought to believe that the interest of their particular constituencies will be promoted by disregarding the limitations in the franchises under which the roads in the particular States have been made, they will be done away with; and then see how we shall stand with our people. We are sent here to take care, among others, of the rights of our States. Our oath to support the Constitution of the United States is not merely to execute all the powers which it confers, but to abstain from exerting any powers which it does not confer. It is an obligation, therefore, to preserve all the limitations upon the power of the Federal Government in order to protect the inherent and original, and undelegated powers which belonged to the States before the Constitution was adopted. We come here, then, with roads made under the authority of our own State legislation, an authority which no one before ever questioned, and if Congress claims the right by their legislation to repeal State legislation, or to do away by congressional legislation with any limitations imposed by State legislation in cases of this description, it is in its result precisely the same as if in words you had said that all the legislation of the States in relation to their several roads are to be considered from this time null and void.

I am sorry, Mr. President, to have occupied so much of the time of the Senate, and conclude with stating the results to which my reflections on the subject have led me, that is to say, that over this subject Congress has no authority whatever. It is a power never delegated by the States, remaining with the States, and a power exclusive because not delegated, and decided to be exclusive by every court that has been called upon to pass judgment upon the subject, and as far as I know, by every statesman who has figured in the councils of the nation, whether in the executive department or the legislative department of the Government, from the time of the adoption of the Constitution down to the bringing of the bill into the House of Representatives.

Mr. MORRILL. I do not suppose there is any expectation of taking the question upon the bill this afternoon; and I do not know whether there is any Senator who desires to address the Senate upon it this afternoon. I understand there are other Senators who design to speak upon the bill. I hope, therefore, the Senator who has charge of it will not object to its postponement to allow me to take up Senate bill No. 212. I move that the further consideration of this bill be postponed to, and made the special order of the day for Tuesday next, at one o'clock.

The motion was agreed to, two thirds of the Senate concurring therein.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

Mr. GRIMES. I move that when the Senate adjourn to-day it adjourn to meet on Monday next. I believe there is no business before us of any kind of consequence. The appropriation bills have not yet reached us.

The motion was agreed to.

HENRY A. BRIGHAM.

Mr. MORRILL. I now move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 212.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill (S. No. 212) for the relief of Henry A. Brigham was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Henry A. Brigham the sum of $2,000, being the amount of his check drawn in favor of the Assistant Treasurer of the United States at New York, on the 7th of November, 1862.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and was read the third time.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I will inquire if there is any report in this case. The bill itself does not explain why it should pass.

Mr. MORRILL. There is a report, which I will ask to have read.

The Secretary read the following report:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the memorial of Henry A. Brigham, military storekeeper and paymaster in the ordnance department of the Army of the United States, report:

The claim is for $2,000, the amount of a check which the petitioner alleges he was compelled to draw in favor of the Assistant Treasurer of the United States in the city of New York, without any consideration therefor, and for which he has never received the amount of said check, or any part thereof.

The facts, in substance, are these: the petitioner holds the office of military storekeeper and paymaster in the ordnance department of the Army of the United States, on duty at the Watervliet arsenal, New York, and had his disbursing account with the Assistant Treasurer of the United States in the city of New York, and paid the employees at said arsenal monthly in funds drawn from said Assistant Treasurer. To enable him to make his monthly payment of October, 1862, on the 7th of November of that year he presented to the cashier of said Assistant Treasurer in New York city a written statement of the amount and denomination of Treasury notes and postage currency required, amounting in all to the sum of $36,300, in notes of denominations of from one to fifty dollars, and $500 in postage currency.

On the following day, during business hours, he called for the money at the counter where he had been accustomed to receive his money.

He shortly gained the attention of the cashier, passed him his check for the sum required, ($36,300,) whereupon the cashier brought a tray from the desk of the pay department to a convenient opening in the counter, the contents of which had been made up in marked packages by one of the paying tellers, for the purpose of making payment thereof to said paymaster—the parties standing upon opposite sides of the counter.

The money had been arranged in packages, notes of fifty dollars in two packages of $3,000 and $5,000, making $8,000 in one bundle, around which was a strap with the amount marked thereon. Notes of twenty dollars, in six equal packages of $2,000—all contained in one general bundle, and marked and strapped as above, and so on for the rest.

The cashier proceeded to take these packages or bundles from the tray, "calling off" the amount marked on the straps as each parcel was passed to the side of the tray in the counter, each amount so "called off" being set down by the paymaster, when the whole amount so stated was found to be $36,300. Both parties still maintaining their positions, said paymaster proceeded to "satisfy himself" of the correctness of the count, commencing with the package of notes of the largest denomination, being that of $8,000.

Upon examination of the bundle marked $12,000, in packages of $2,000 each, there was in fact but five packages, making $10,000. Search was made by the cashier for the missing package of $2,000 at the desk of the pay department and on the floor at the counter where the parties stood, but without success.

The parties had observed, while the cashier was passing the packages from the tray, and the paymaster was setting down the figures, a man—a stranger—standing near the paymaster, with his hands upon the postage currency, and who immediately retired.

It was assumed by the cashier that the delivery of the money was complete when he had "called off" the amount of the several packages or bundles, and passed them from the tray to the counter, as stated above, that the missing $2,000 had been stolen by the stranger, and that having been so delivered and stolen, it was the loss of the paymaster, who was accordingly required to draw an additional check for $2,000, in order to obtain the amount required for his monthly payment.

It is not doubted that the paymaster drew his check in favor of the Assistant Treasurer of the United States for the sum of $2,000 more than he actually received, and that he has been the loser to that amount.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Mr. President, I am not satisfied with that report, and I think the attention of the Senate ought to be called to the precedent we are establishing here. It seems that a paymaster under coercion drew a check for more money than he received, and thereupon, inasmuch as he did not get as much money as he checked for, he comes to Congress and asks Congress to make up the difference. That is all there is of the case. A paymaster calls for a certain amount of money. The cashier gives him within $2,000 of the amount he asks for, and says, "I will not give you the balance unless you draw another check for $2,000; if you want $36,000 in money, you must draw a check for $38,000, and you shall have it;" and inasmuch as he wants $36,000, he draws for $38,000, and thereupon the Congress of the United States is to come in and pass a law appropriating $2,000 to make up the amount he drew the checks for! If there was a loss of money in this case by the cashier of this bank, let him be responsible for it; or if a case is made out that it was stolen from the cashier, and Congress thinks proper to relieve him, relieve him; but it seems to me to be the worst of precedents to allow a paymaster under coercion as it were in this way to draw a check for more money than he gets, and then for Congress to come in and pay the balance. It is establishing what I should think in private transactions would be a most dangerous precedent. The morality of it even is questionable.

Mr. MORRILL. I think if my friend from Illinois had paid a little more attention to the facts of the case perhaps he would not have come to the conclusion that he has announced. I think it not unlikely that the conclusion the Senator from Illinois draws might be just in the case he states; but that is not the case before the Senate.

This paymaster was an agent of the Government, and was dealing with the Government. He was not dealing with a bank, as the Senator supposes. He being an agent of the Government desirous of paying the bills of the Government, applied in his individual capacity as an officer to the Assistant Treasurer at New York for $36,000, giving the specifications, and the Government, through its agents, gave him $2,000 less, under the circumstances detailed in that report, and they made him draw his check for enough to cover the supposed loss, $2,000. It was a transaction with the Government throughout, and a transaction with nobody else. I submit that the paymaster on that statement of the facts has no remedy on earth but the one proposed here. He cannot sue the Government; he cannot deal, as I understand, in any way whatever with the Government except to appeal to Congress.

With the permission of the Senate I will state in a word how the case presented itself. This paymaster went to the Assistant Treasurer at New York and made a requisition for $36,000 to be paid to the employees of his arsenal. They told him to call the next day for the money. When he called, the cashier, or the party acting as cashier, brought the money in a tray to an open space in the counter and undertook to verify the count, the paymaster standing on one side of the counter and the cashier on the other side in the open space. The cashier commenced the verification of the count, and handed out the packages as he had prepared them and said "There are your $36,000." Thereupon, the parties being in the presence of each other, the paymaster said, "Now I will verify the count." He took the packages and opened them in the presence of the cashier and said "There are $2,000 less than $36,000 here." Thereupon they both reexamined them, and both saw that there were $2,000 less. Now, how is it accounted for? The cashier suggested that it must have been taken by some stranger who casually came into the room while these parties were verifying this count; but the committee were not satisfied that that suggestion was at all in accordance with the fact. They thought it was not even probable. There was no intimation, no suspicion, that the paymaster had stolen it, because he was in the presence of the cashier all the time, and the moment that it was suggested he subjected himself to and insisted upon an examination. The committee came to the conclusion, upon these facts, that either inadvertently a mistake had been made in the office in putting up those bills, or that the $2,000 had been abstracted from those packages after they had been put in the tray the night before for the paymaster, and that it was either in the hands of the Government when he was made to draw his additional check, or in the hands and pockets of its unfaithful agents.

Under these circumstances it seemed to be but the sheerest justice in the world that this man, who had no remedy, and no place to go elsewhere, should come to the Congress of the United States and should be indemnified for this loss. I submit to my friend from Illinois whether, with the statement that it is a transaction all through of the Government, and not of a third party, it is not manifestly just that the Government should refund this amount to him. There is not the slightest suspicion from any quarter, either from the Secretary of the Treasury or his agents, whose communications accompany these papers, that there was anything improper on the part of the paymaster, or any want of fidelity or any want of care on his part.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I certainly have no other desire, in calling attention to this matter, than to properly protect the interests of the Government. I know none of these parties, and knew nothing of this claim until I heard the bill read at the Secretary's table, and called for the reading of the report; but it does seem to me it would be establishing a very dangerous precedent, and be unsafe to the Treasury of the United States, to allow a bill of this character to pass. If, however, Senators think not, of course they will pass it.

As it appears now, the transaction was wholly between Government officers. Perhaps when it was up before I stated that the check was upon a cashier, and I may have said of a bank.

Mr. MORRILL. I thought you were under that impression.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Perhaps I did say so; but it was on the cashier of the sub-Treasury. Then the case simply stated as the Senator from Maine presents it is this: two officers of the Government met together to pay money from one over to the other; they found themselves short $2,000 between them; one did not have as much by $2,000 as he ought to have, and the other insisted that he had got the $2,000; and thereupon the party who had not got as much by $2,000 as he ought to have, drew another check for $2,000 more and made up the sum; and the Government of the United States, without any proof at all that this money has been stolen from these parties, proposes to pass a bill to make the thing good. If this bill should pass, then if hereafter a couple of Government officers get together for one to pay over money to the other, and the amount paid does not correspond with the check which the man receiving the money has drawn, he need only draw another check and Congress will make it up. I cannot think that there is any safety to the Government if bills of that kind can pass. I move to lay the bill upon the table. If any gentleman wishes to say anything upon it I will withdraw the motion.

Mr. MORRILL. I desire to say a word.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I withdraw it.

Mr. MORRILL. Let me look on the other side of that picture. As my friend from Illinois has said something about the morality of this thing, let me see what the morality on the other side would be.

The Government of the United States appoints an agent to disburse its funds, as in this case. Everybody knows that when that agent applies for the money he has got to make a requisition, he has got to apply to the Treasury. Everybody understands that he is entirely within the power of the Government represented by the Treasury. The funds are all on the side of the Government; the tray and the treasure are in the hands of the Treasurer and the Government; and he very humbly and meekly stands on the other side with his check and hands it over, and the Government hand him out just what they please, and charge him in his account and on his bond with the full amount. And yet when he comes here and makes out a perfect case and shows you that you either stole it yourselves or lost it thought your infidelity, Senators rise up and say that the morality of the Government does not allow it to rectify mistakes or blunders, or to hold its own officers to responsibility; we have got the power; you cannot sue us, and we will not correct any mistakes! It was not possible for this man, under the circumstances, to correct it.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question right there?

Mr. MORRILL. Certainly.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Would the Senator have given him receipt or drawn his check for $38,000, when he received but $36,000, under those circumstances?

Mr. MORRILL. I cannot say what I would have done if I had been a paymaster, and, upon the report, liable to be dismissed. It might have been weak or it might not. That does not alter the fact. It does not alter the morals and does not alter the equity of the case at all. The Senator inquires of me whether I would have given the receipt in this case. I want to call his attention to the fact in the case while I answer that inquiry. The fact shows that in this case, before they allowed the paymaster to have a shilling, or even to look at the money, they required him to draw his check for the whole amount, and they passed that back on the inner side of the counter, he standing on the other side, and then they handed him out what they chose; so that it was not a question whether he would give a receipt or not; they had got his check for $36,000; he was in their power; and they handed him out $2,000 less. There is no mistake about that, no question about it; and they handed it to him under such circumstances that he could not resist it.

Mr. GRIMES. Was there no receipt drawn?

Mr. MORRILL. There was no receipt drawn, and none required. The check was in the custody of the officers in the sub-Treasury, and they handed him out what they chose, and they handed him $2,000 less than his check called for. I say the Government cannot stand a moment in equity or in good conscience under such a state of facts and refuse to indemnify this man.

Mr. CLARK. I want to inquire for a moment of the Senator what that paymaster could have done under such circumstances. He needed the $36,000 to discharge his duty, and to pay the men under his employ. He notified the Assistant Treasurer beforehand that he should want so much money and in such and such parcels and denominations, and desired that they might be ready for him the next morning. He goes the next morning to the Assistant Treasurer, and says, "Sir, I want that money," and passes over his check. The Assistant Treasurer or one of his clerks takes his check and begins to count him out the money. He counts it on the counter. When he had counted it he passes it to the paymaster to count; and after he has counted it he says, "I have not got my money; I have only got $34,000 instead of $36,000. You have got my check for $36,000." They kept that check, and declined to give him any more. He has, then, $34,000 for his check; he has $34,000 wherewith to pay $36,000. He might have gone away with his money, as they had his check for $36,000, and found himself so much short for paying the men in the employ of the Government; but that did not relieve him. He was then $2,000 short, and there would have been that deficit; but, faithful to his trust, he says, "I must at any rate have $2,000 more; I must have $36,000 in money to pay these men at the arsenal, and if you will not let me have $36,000 on my first check, as I must have $2,000 more, I will give you another check for $2,000." Now, who shall lose that money in justice and in right? There is no suspicion that this paymaster was in any way in the wrong; there is no suspicion that he was not faithful; there is no suspicion that he touched a dollar of the money; but on the contrary, he was out of pocket $2,000.

Mr. GRIMES. Was there any suspicion that it was stolen from his custody?

Mr. CLARK. None in the world; there was not the slightest evidence given to show it. The fault was somewhere in the office of the Assistant Treasurer.

Mr. TRUMBULL. If the Senator from New Hampshire will allow me, let me put that very case. Suppose the Assistant Treasurer is that dishonest man; and it is not impossible that such a case might arise with some of the Assistant Treasurers of the United States. Suppose an officer calls upon him with a check for $36,000, and he gives him $30,000, and refuses to give him any more, there is no question about it; there is pretense set up that it may have been taken away by some person passing through the office at the time. I want to know from the Senator from New Hampshire if he is prepared by legislation to say that the man who brings the check there shall draw an additional check, and relieve that dishonest officer?

Mr. CLARK. I am prepared to say that it is the duty of the Government to relieve this paymaster, for there is no suspicion of dishonesty upon him. I do not charge any dishonesty upon anybody connected with the office. It may have been a mistake; but the committee are as entirely certain as they can be by any proof that this paymaster was an honest man and did not receive the money. If you lay this bill upon the table or refuse to pass it, then this paymaster remains out of that sum of money; he is a defaulter to that amount. You propose to make him pay $2,000 for you, and then not allow him for it. That is exactly the transaction. It is between him and the Government. If you are satisfied that this paymaster was an honest man, as the committee are, then it is the duty of the Government to see that he is not harmed by their officers. That is the way the case stands. There is not a pretense, there is not a suspicion that he received the money. If it was stolen by anybody, it must have been stolen before the delivery was complete to him. If there was any dishonesty, the committee are satisfied the dishonesty was before the money came to him. We do not charge that there was. It may have been a mistake. We are satisfied that he was not to blame about it, and therefore the committee recommend that he should be reimbursed the money, and I hope the bill will be passed.

Mr. GRIMES. I understood the Senator from New Hampshire to say in response to my inquiry that there was no intimation that this money possibly had been stolen from the paymaster. I will read from the committee's own report on this subject. They say:

"The parties had observed, while the cashier was passing the packages from the tray, and the paymaster was setting down the figures, a man—a stranger—standing near the paymaster, with his hands upon the postage currency, and who immediately retired."

That postage currency, I believe, was this sum of $2,000.

"It was assumed by the cashier that the delivery of the money was complete when he had 'called off' the amount of the several packages or bundles, and passed them from the tray to the counter, as stated above; that the missing $2,000 had been stolen by the stranger, and that, having been so delivered and stolen, it was the loss of the paymaster, who was accordingly required to draw an additional check for $2,000, in order to obtain the amount required for his monthly payment."

Mr. CLARK. I misunderstood the drift of the Senator's inquiry if he meant to confine it to the transaction at the tray. I thought his inquiry was as to whether the money was stolen after the paymaster had taken the money. It was found out before he accepted the money.

Mr. GRIMES. It must have been delivered to the paymaster, or else this stranger's hand could not have been upon the package.

Mr. CLARK. Here was the tray containing the money, and the clerk counts it out in the tray to the paymaster. While he is counting it out they observe a man there with his hand on the package of postage currency. The paymaster had not received the money. There was no pretense that the paymaster had received the money at all. But I understood the drift of the Senator's inquiry to be whether somebody could not have stolen it from the paymaster after he had received it. He objected to receiving it, and this was entirely before it was passed to him. He could not have been accountable for it if it had been stolen. The delivery must have been complete before he was accountable for the money.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. Foot in the chair.) The question is on the passage of the bill.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I move that the bill be indefinitely postponed.

Mr. NESMITH. Before the vote is taken, if it is in order, I wish to say a word.

This is the most extraordinary case of a claim I have ever known brought before the Senate.

Here are two men, both represented to be Government officers, engaged in a pecuniary transaction where there are $2,000 missing, and one party who receipts for $2,000 more than he receives, or gives his check for it, which is the same thing, comes in and asks Congress to relieve him. It is alleged that this paymaster was an honest man. I will not undertake to impeach his honesty, but he certainly manifested a very great want of sense.

It has been said that a paymaster going to a sub-Treasurer with a draft, and presenting it, is entirely at the mercy of the Government, or of the sub-Treasurer. I deny that proposition. If the Senator from New Hampshire goes to the Treasurer in this city with a draft for his salary, and the Treasurer says, "Here are $3,000 for your salary," handing him out a fifty-cent postage stamp, would he accept of that? No, sir. And it was as much the duty of this paymaster when he saw that the amount of money was $2,000 less than the amount of his draft, to refuse to accept it and have nothing to do with it, as it would be of the Senator from New Hampshire to refuse the fifty-cent postage stamp for a $3,000 check for his salary.

This case manifests a want of diligence and a want of sense on the part of the officer drawing the draft. He should have refused to accept a cent of the money under the circumstances. Why, sir, if you adopt a policy of this kind, recognizing this sort of transactions between Government officers, you open the door wide for the perpetration of all sorts of frauds. It is the duty of the Government officer, before he delivers up his check, or at least before he becomes responsible for the money, to see that he has the amount to which he is entitled; and it was a want of diligence on the part of this officer to receive $2,000 less than the amount he was entitled to, and then to give an additional check for $2,000 more. Why, sir, the transaction on the face of it will bear no sort of scrutiny. I take the responsibility of stating that in all the various multiplicity of bills for relief that have been introduced into Congress, there can be found no parallel to this case.

Suppose that this Government officer, in the plenitude of his power, as the Senator from New Hampshire says he had a right to exercise, had offered this paymaster a dollar; would that have relieved him? Would that have been a sufficient consideration for the $36,000 draft? I think not. I think it was the duty of this paymaster, as it would be between individuals in a private transaction, to see that he had the full amount of the money to which he was entitled.

The presumption according to the statement of the case would be that there has been fraud somewhere. This person who was near the tray when the money was passed out may have stolen it. If he did steal it, the blame must necessarily attach to the party who then had the money in possession. It was the fault of the sub-Treasurer to allow a stranger to be in such close proximity to so large an amount of money. He was lacking in the exercise of due diligence in that regard. But if this bill passes the Government must eventually be the loser by the transaction, whether the money was stolen by the person who was near the tray, or whether it was stolen by the sub-Treasurer. If the money was not stolen by the individual who was near the tray, but there was a mistake, and $2,000 less paid than should have been paid, then that money must be in the vaults of the sub-Treasurer, and it is very easy to ascertain by his cash account in comparison with his drafts whether the money overran or not on that day; and if he is a dishonest man it would be equally easy for him to retain that amount of money. The thing looks so suspicious on the face of it that I cannot under any circumstances vote for it.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I recollect the examination of this case before the committee at the last session. We all agreed with what the Senator from Oregon says, that it was a singular case, and that drew the attention of every member of the committee to the case, and I believe the whole evidence was read in the presence of the committee. But there was no difference of opinion on the part of the members of that committee as to the duty of the Government to give this paymaster relief.

The facts, as we understood them, were just these: a paymaster had to make a payment on a certain day at his post of duty, of $36,800. On the evening before the day the payment was to be made, he called at the proper department and informed them how much money he needed. That money was counted out all ready for him in packages. When he called to get his check paid, he handed it to the officer; the check was received and laid by; the clerk brought the tray, on which he had arranged the packages, to the proper counter. The Senator from Oregon finds fault with the officer for allowing that stranger in the office. That could not be objected to. It was a public place, where moneys were being paid out.

Mr. NESMITH. With the Senator's permission, I would like to ask him whether it is the usage for strangers to be about places where money is being paid with their hands on other people's money?

Mr. HENDRICKS. There is no evidence in the case to prove that this stranger had his hands on the package. From the whole evidence I never was satisfied the stranger got the money; but I was satisfied that the paymaster did not get the money. That is a very clear thing. No gentleman of the committee doubted on that question; but the committee were not unanimous that the stranger stole the money. There was a stranger at the back of the paymaster during some portion of this transaction.

Then, when the tray was brought to the counter, the clerk counted out the packages of money, and the paymaster made a note of the sums as he counted. When that was concluded, the paymaster said that he would count the money. He commenced counting it upon the same counter, and found that there were $2,000 less than the clerk had counted.

Mr. GRIMES. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HENDRICKS. Yes, sir.

Mr. GRIMES. I believe he is a member of the Committee on Claims, and of course he has investigated this matter. Were the sub-Treasury officers in New York examined on the subject, or did the committee satisfy themselves that the sub-Treasury accounts did not show a surplus of $2,000? It would be very easy for the committee to ascertain whether this $2,000 was paid out of the sub-Treasury or not by referring to the cash account of the sub-Treasury on the day the payment was made. Did the committee inform themselves on that subject?

Mr. HENDRICKS. There was a letter from the Assistant Treasurer at New York discussing the whole case—a lengthy letter, as I now recollect. I cannot state to the Senator exactly what were the contents of that letter. But the money had been counted out, as I was going on to state, by the clerk, and then when the paymaster came to count the money he found that there was a deficiency of $2,000; and here was the point made by the Assistant Treasurer, and also by the Secretary of the Treasury—

Mr. GRIMES. In the letter from the Assistant Treasurer was it admitted that the accounts did not balance for that day, or did balance? That is a very material point, one upon which the whole case hinges.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I cannot answer the Senator on that point. I recollect that the main discussion by the Assistant Treasurer was on this point: he claimed that the payment was complete to the paymaster as soon as the clerk had counted out the packages from the tray on the counter, and he said it could not be allowed, according to the usage of banks, that the party should recount the money. He denied to the paymaster the right to count the money himself. That was the principle that he discussed in his letter, which was before the committee.

The committee were entirely satisfied that the paymaster did not get the money; but the committee were not fully satisfied upon the question as to who did get the money. They were not satisfied as to whether the clerk got it, or whether he made a mistake, or how it was. But right at the counter the paymaster claimed to count the money before he took it from the counter. It was recounted and found to be $2,000 short. The paymaster made a full examination right there before he left the counter. After it was found the money was not there, and his check was inside, he being compelled on that day to make a payment to the employés of the Watervliet arsenal of $36,800, to get that money he had to give this additional check. I cannot see any objection to the course pursued by him about that. Was he to say that the money should not be paid that day to the men at the arsenal, or was he to pay some and leave some unpaid? He could not well do that, and in order to pay the employés at the arsenal he gave this additional check for $2,000. Perhaps I am obtuse on the question, but I am not able to see why he did not do right in that regard. He had $34,800. The officer claimed that that was full payment. He needed $2,000 more to make the payments, and he gave his check for it. It seems to me to be a plain case, and that the paymaster ought to be relieved.

Mr. COWAN. If it were possible to pass a bill here to make this paymaster lose $1,000 of this money and the clerk the other $1,000 for allowing it to be stolen out under their noses upon the counter of the sub-Treasury at the time they were counting it, I should much rather vote for it than for this bill. It does seem to me extraordinary that two men of ordinary intelligence should allow such a thing to take place immediately under their own eyes at a time when their attention must necessarily have been drawn to the transaction.

Mr. CHANDLER. This paymaster may be a very honest man, but from the character of the evidence in this case I should think he was a very foolish one. The evidence is, that he passed over his check for $36,000 to the cashier without receiving that amount in funds. In that case he should have thrown the money back and refused to accept any of it. It is a matter of daily occurrence in every bank in the United States that mistakes occur either in the paying-teller or the recipient of the money; and any merchant or merchant's clerk might as well come to Congress and ask for the correction of an error that occurred of that kind between himself and the teller of a bank as for this paymaster to come to Congress and demand the return of this $2,000. It was a business transaction.

Mr. CLARK. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. CHANDLER. Certainly.

Mr. CLARK. What could the paymaster have done? He passes in his check and the Assistant Treasurer, or his clerk, counts out the money. The paymaster proceeds to count it himself and ascertains the loss. The Assistant Treasurer says, "That delivery was complete; you cannot have your check; there is the money." Shall he go away and leave the money? He cannot get his check back.

Mr. CHANDLER. He can either leave the money or demand his check, or he can accept the money. Does the Senator pretend to say that if I go into a bank and draw a check for $36,000 and they pass me $34,000, and will not give me any more, that I should therefore draw a check for $2,000 more? Why, sir, the idea is absurd.

Mr. CLARK. I do not say that; but that is not this case.

Mr. CHANDLER. It is a very similar case.

Mr. CLARK. He is an officer of the Government who wants $2,000 to complete his payments; and now, he says, "However this loss may fall I will take this money and give you a check for the $2,000, which you will not give me without, and make up the complement for the purpose of paying these men I am to pay, and then this matter is to be settled afterward."

Mr. CHANDLER. It was a business transaction between the paymaster and the sub-Treasurer, the same precisely as the drawing of a check from a bank; there is no difference; and there is no reason on earth, no apology for coming to Congress for the payment of this $2,000. If the paymaster got only $34,800, instead of $36,800, he should have received none of it unless he made up his mind to lose the $2,000 himself.

Mr. CLARK. Will the Senator tell me and tell the Senate where he is to get his money?

Mr. CHANDLER. That is his own lookout.

Mr. CLARK. No, I beg the Senator's pardon; it is not his own lookout, because the man must not suffer for the Government. If he is an honest man and has paid the money for the Government, the Government should see him harmless.

Mr. CHANDLER. He had no right to part with his check until he got the money. As a business man, engaged in a plain, straight-forward, every-day transaction, he ought to have known better. I do not claim that he was dishonest, but I think he was a big fool.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I desire to ask the Senator from Michigan whether it is usual to pay the money out before a check is handed in, at a bank or at a sub-Treasurer's office?

Mr. CHANDLER. Not at all. The check is always handed in; but if the amount counted out is not correct, I take it no business man would ever receive it.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Then, in answer to the Senator, I desire to say that the Assistant Treasurer took the ground that as soon as the clerk had counted out these bundles of money the payment was complete, and the money was in the hands of the paymaster, and he had nothing to do but to carry it away, leaving his check of $36,800 and taking away only $34,800, or to give another check of $2,000, enough to make up the payment to the hands of the arsenal. That is the whole of the question.

Mr. GRIMES. I beg the Senator's pardon, Mr. Cisco does not put it exactly on that ground. He says:

"The delivery was according to the custom of this office and every banking institution in the country, full and complete the moment that the money had been laid upon the counter for Mr. Brigham, and he had taken possession of it."

Mr. HENDRICKS. Yes, sir, and in this particular case he argues that he had taken possession of it because it was taken out of the tray and put upon the counter, and he was in the act of counting it over himself.

Mr. CLARK. That fact of counting was the possession, as they contend.

Mr. HENDRICKS. They claimed that that was possession. As soon as it was handed from the tray and laid upon the counter the Assistant Treasurer contended that it was in the possession of the paymaster, and would give him no relief.

Mr. CHANDLER. The case is just as plain as cases that occur I suppose a thousand and perhaps a million times a day. A merchant sends a clerk to a bank to draw a check. If the bank does not pay that clerk the amount the check calls for, he throws back what is handed to him, and says "I will not touch it; I will go and inform my superior that I have handed you that check, and that you will not give me the amount of it," and then the superior goes to the bank and says "Give me that check, sir, or give me the amount of it." It was the duty of this paymaster to have thrown the money back, and said "There is not $36,800 here; there is only $34,800," and then he should have gone to his superior and reported the case, and not come here to Congress asking payment for his own default. There is no reason, propriety, or common sense in it. I hope the bill will be indefinitely postponed.

Mr. MORRILL called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

Mr. JOHNSON. I am not sure that I understand the facts; but if I do understand them they are these: a paymaster the day before this mistake occurred informed the bank that he wanted $36,800 under a requisition which he had a right to make, and he was told that he could get his $36,800 the next day if he would call. He called the next day, and the cashier brought to him notes which he said in the aggregate amounted to $36,800; and he handed him his check and took the notes, and standing at the counter in the presence of the cashier counted the money to see if there was that amount, and he discovered on his count and before leaving the counter that there was a deficiency of $2,000 in one of the packages.

Now, in point of law that was no payment, if it be true, and if there be no doubt in point of fact, that what was given to him as $36,800 amounted only to $34,800. The rule of all banks, and the rule from necessity, in order to guard against imposition, is that they will correct no mistakes except such as are discovered at the counter. I go with a check, say of $1,000, and the money is counted out to me; they say, "Here are $1,000;" they have got hold of my check; the check is their voucher for $1,000 as against me, if it is my own check; but it is fraudulent to charge me with a debit of $1,000, unless I have got the money. They hand me what they say is $1,000, and I, in the presence of the cashier or of the paying teller, count what is handed to me and find that there is only $800. I am not bound to take it. It is no payment. To make it a payment is to enable the bank to perpetrate a fraud upon the customer.

I once heard of a case which illustrates the practical injustice often of carrying out these rules of banks strictly in all cases, when the mistake is not discovered until afterwards. I got the story from Mr. Benton. When Mr. Randolph was passing by the Bank of the Metropolis on his way to the meeting that was held afterward between himself and Mr. Clay, Mr. Benton being one of his friends upon the ground, he said to Mr. Hamilton, when he got to the Bank of the Metropolis, "There are $6,000 here on deposit belonging to me, and I want to get it out, because I do not know what may happen to me." They stopped, and he went in and demanded his money. They counted him out notes, and he said, "I want money, not notes." The cashier was very much surprised, but he had to count the gold out to him. His servant took it and carried it to the carriage, and they went off with $6,000, as they supposed. A messenger from the bank coming up at full speed met them this side of Georgetown, stopped the carriage, and told Mr. Randolph that the cashier had made a mistake, that the bank had paid him $6,100. Mr. Randolph responded, "If it had not been $6,000, you would have said the payment was conclusive upon me; would you not?" "Yes." "Then go back and tell him I will have no corrections; it is not fair to make one side correct and not the other." But after the messenger had left him, he told Colonel Hamilton, "If I should fall I want this money counted, and if they have paid me $100 too much, as they allege, go and pay it back, because notwithstanding the bank is willing to play the rogue, I am not; I will correct the mistake."

It is bad enough to suffer the banks to prescribe a rule which often practically leads to injustice; for very few men think of counting their money. I am one of the reckless ones, and I never think of it, though I do not know that I have ever been taken in. But without meaning to take you in they make a mistake in counting the money, and you do not discover it until you get home and count it yourself; then they will not correct it; but if you stand at the counter and count the money in the presence of the cashier, he having the check which he has no right to hold until he gives you the money, and you discover in his presence that he has not paid you the amount of the check, to call that a payment is to permit him in open day to perpetrate a fraud on the customer; and that, as I understand it, has been done in this instance, provided it be true, about which I am told there is no dispute, that in point of fact the money handed to this officer was short $2,000, and it was discovered by him to be short in the presence of the cashier before he put the money in his pocket. He offered then to give his check for the amount which he had, $34,800, and they would not let him have that unless he gave his check for $36,800. In other words, knowing that he would lose the $2,000 unless he could be indemnified, they made him give a check for $36,800, knowing that they paid him only $34,800. It appears to me that this claim upon us is only a just demand, provided the facts be as they have been stated.

It is said by my friend from Pennsylvania that some of these men deserved to lose the money, because they were such blockheads as not to discover the fraud that was perpetrated at the counter. I do not understand that the fraud was perpetrated there, or that the mistake occurred there. The notes were put up the day before in packages.

Mr. COWAN. The allegation is that the $2,000 was stolen at that time.

Mr. JOHNSON. That is not it, as I understand.

Mr. COWAN. That has been the argument.

Mr. JOHNSON. I was about to state what is represented to me to have been the fact. He goes on one day and says he wants $36,800; he has a right to $36,800; he has money there to answer his check; he is told to come the next day and the money will be ready for him. The money is counted out in the interim, and when he comes the next day an amount is handed to him at the counter and represented as containing in the aggregate $36,800. The young man who put it up said that he put up $36,800. The cashier carries the money to the counter and says, "Here are $36,800." The paymaster counts the money and finds that it is $36,800, less $2,000; and they refuse to pay him the $34,800 unless he will give a check for $36,800. That, as it seems to me, is a downright fraud on the paymaster. When the money was taken, or whether it was taken by anybody, whether the funds were short or not, I do not know. It may not have been taken by anybody; it may have been a miscount by the clerk who counted the money; or if taken at all, it was taken before the money was delivered to the paymaster; he knew nothing about it; he discovered the mistake in the presence of the cashier.

Mr. GRIMES. I ask for the reading of the deposition of the teller in the sub-Treasury at New York detailing all the facts within his knowledge in connection with this case. Then we shall get at the facts.

The Secretary read, as follows:

City and County of New York, ss:

Edward H. Birdsall of said city, being duly sworn, doth depose and say: That he is at the head of the receiving, counting, and testing department in the office of the Assistant Treasurer of the United States in said city. That on the 8th day of November, in the year 1862, this department had the following business transaction with H. A. Brigham, United States military storekeeper and paymaster for the Watervliet arsenal at West Troy, in the State of New York. He, said H. A. Brigham, was paid by this department, on his (Brigham's) check on said Assistant Treasurer, the sum of $36,800 in United States notes and postage currency, in manner following: a tray, the contents made up in marked packages by one of the paying tellers, and containing this amount of money, was taken by this department from the desk of the pay department to a convenient opening in the counter for the purpose of making to said Brigham a delivery of said contents. The paper hereto attached was then handed by this department to the said Brigham, he (this deponent) at the same time saying, "The items of notes and currency are somewhat different from the memorandum furnished us by you, and you had better make a new list as the money is handed out." Said Brigham then made the figures as they appear in black pencil on said paper as each parcel was passed to him and called off by this deponent. After entering the last item and drawing the line for footings, said Brigham returned the said paper to this deponent, who added up the column and made, as appears in blue pencil mark, the total, $36,800, and the delivery was thereupon complete. Said Brigham then remarked, "You have satisfied yourself it is all right, now hand me the list and I will satisfy myself;" which said Brigham proceeded to do, commencing with the larger denomination of notes, and checked, as will appear by the check mark on said paper, the first item of $8,000 in notes of the denomination of $50, this deponent continuing to stand by said opening on said counter in order to afford to said Brigham any facilities which he might require.

When said Brigham came to the second item on said paper, being $12,000 in notes of the denomination of $20, said Brigham remarked, "How is this? I have only $10,000 in $20 notes," or words to that effect. This deponent then said, "You must have made some error in counting," and commenced to look over the different packages and bundles, and also to examine the floor both inside and outside the counter. The missing bundle of $2,000 was not found, it having disappeared since the delivery to said Brigham of the total amount of his check. This deponent then remarked to said Brigham, "The $2,000 you may be certain has been stolen," and also asked said Brigham who the individual was who had been standing by him, the said Brigham's, side during the time of the delivery, and who was allowed by said Brigham to place his hand on certain of the postage currency subsequent to such delivery, and who was supposed by this deponent to be either the clerk or the personal friend of said Brigham; other paymasters coming to the said office of the Assistant Treasurer of the United States at New York for the purpose of receiving large amounts of money almost invariably have some such attendant to assist them. Said Brigham replied, "I don't know the man, and never saw him before in my life until he spoke to me a few moments ago when I came into the office." This deponent then said, "He has taken your money." To which said Brigham replied, "I don't consider it my loss." This deponent then said, "If you have any doubts on that point, I will go with you to the head of the office." This deponent then took the tray of money, containing $34,800, placed it for safe-keeping behind the counter during their absence, and he with the said Brigham then had an interview with John J. Cisco, Esq., the Assistant Treasurer. Mr. Cisco, after hearing the facts, pronounced the delivery of $36,800 in United States notes and postage currency to have been in all respects proper and complete, and made in manner and form as all such payments are made both in his own office and in the various moneyed institutions of the country on like occasions. Said Brigham then returned to the outer or public office with this deponent, and drew a check for $2,000, making, so far as the deponent is aware, no formal protest. And further, this deponent saith not.

E. H. BIRDSALL.

Sworn to, at the city of New York, before me, this 10th day of February, A. D. 1863.

W. T. LATIMER, Commissioner of Deeds.

Mr. COWAN. I think the position I took is now made good. Of course I am not here to contend that this delivery was perfect, because the person to whom the money was delivered objected upon the spot that the amount was insufficient; but what I meant to say was, not that I was not going to vote for this bill, but that I would rather vote for a bill to impose this sum of $2,000, one half of it upon the teller and the other half upon the paymaster, than to vote for this bill, because they had allowed it, if they were honest men, to be stolen from under their own eyes at the very time they were engaged in counting it. It is a most extraordinary thing to me that such a theft could have taken place there.

Mr. NESMITH. It should be borne in mind that there is no evidence presented to the Senate or to the committee that the amount of money was ever counted out correctly. The deponent, whose affidavit has been read, says it was counted by another person and put up in the bundles. There is no evidence that the full amount of money was ever put in the packages or in the tray. The deponent swears that some other person did so. He does not swear of his own knowledge that it was done. But, sir, looking at the cavalier manner in which this paymaster disposed of a matter of $2,000, when finding the count to be $2,000 short, he said substantially, "It is a matter of no consequence; I do not consider that I am the loser by it," there was a carelessness in the transaction of public business and the handling of public money which, if recognized, indorsed, and encouraged, will throw open the doors of the Treasury to illimitable robbery.

Mr. MORRILL. I wish to make a single remark in reply to the inference that this money was stolen. Of course the committee considered that question as to the probability of its having been stolen. It will be observed that this money was in large packages, that the package from which the $2,000 was missed was a package of twenty-dollar notes, done up in $2,000 packages, and all embraced in a larger package. The $2,000 that were lost were missed from that large package. How could $2,000 be got out of that general package while it was lying in that tray in the presence of both the cashier and the paymaster? The committee came to the conclusion that there was not the slightest probability of its having been stolen, and the inevitable inference the committee drew was that it either was not put into the tray at all by the clerk who made it up, or afterward put into his own pocket and the books made to balance.

Mr. HARRIS. I have intentionally refrained from taking any part in the discussion of this question, for the reason that Mr. Brigham, this paymaster, is my personal and very intimate friend; and I have not been disposed, acting rather in a judicial capacity, to take part in the discussion of these facts. I know him to be as upright and honorable a man as sits within these walls. I am satisfied that no Senator here believes or suspects, that no human being believes or suspects, that he has had a dollar of these $2,000. And yet if this motion is to prevail, this innocent man, a man of uprightness and intelligence honestly and faithfully attempting to discharge his duty to the Government, is by the deliberate action of this Senate to be charged with this sum of $2,000. That is just the predicament of this question. If the Senate choose under these circumstances to postpone this bill indefinitely, this honest man, this faithful servant of the Government, this intelligent and loyal man must submit to be charged with $2,000, when nobody believes, nobody suspects, that he ever had a dollar of it.

Mr. BROWN. I desire to ask the Senator from Maine who made a statement connected with this matter just now, whether the evidence shows that there was an entire package missing or only part of a package? In the reading which the Clerk gave I understood that there was one of the packages missing.

Mr. MORRILL. No, sir; $2,000 out of the general package of $12,000. The package was marked and passed over to the paymaster as $12,000, in sub-packages of $2,000 each, and it turned out that there were in that general package only five packages of $2,000 each.

Mr. BROWN. I did not understand the reading of it correctly when read by the Clerk.

Mr. MORRILL. The fact is as I have stated, and that fact we thought negated the idea of larceny in the presence of the parties.

Mr. CHANDLER. I believe the honesty of this paymaster has not been called in question in the course of this debate. It is a matter of constant occurrence for men doing large business, particularly manufacturers, to give notice the day before to a bank that they require a given amount of money in given denominations of bills. It would appear that this money was put up in advance in that way; and in all probability, instead of there being six $2,000 packages of twenty-dollar notes there were really but five such packages, so that there was but $10,000 in the package of twenties though it was marked on the outside $12,000. By the count as given by the teller he had $36,800, but when he came to examine the packages himself and to take off the figures there were but $34,800. That was discovered on the spot, and, as the Senator from Maryland justly observes, it was no delivery; he never received the $36,800; that sum was not delivered to him. He had no right to receipt for $36,800; he had no right to give a check for the other $2,000. There is not a merchant in the country doing a large business who would not have said to his clerk who permitted such a transaction, "Sir, I do not know that you are a knave, but you are a fool; you are totally unfit to transact this business; you must leave my employment;" and if he held bonds that were good he would compel the clerk to pay $2,000 before he discharged him, and he would never let him draw another check in the world.

Mr. MORRILL. That question was referred to the Assistant Treasurer, and he decided that it was a delivery, and that the paymaster was bound by it.

Mr. CHANDLER. But common sense says it was not a delivery, and therefore the paymaster should have said, "I demand back the check;" and if the check was not returned he should have referred the case to his superior officer. There was no delivery. The fact that the teller decided it was a delivery did not make it a delivery. It was neither a delivery in point of fact nor in point of law. He has no claim whatever. I hope the bill will be indefinitely postponed.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I wish to ask the Senator from Michigan just one question. If he did not get the $12,000, and only got $10,000 in that general package, and if, in fact, it was not a delivery, and if, in fact, the paymaster said "This shall not be my loss," and the clerk proposed that they should go and see the Assistant Treasurer, and they went and consulted him, and he said the case was against the paymaster and for the office, and this officer submitted his judgment to the judgment of the superior officer there, ought he to lose $2,000 for that?

Mr. CHANDLER. He had no right to submit it to that officer. He might as well have turned round and submitted it to the porter. It was his duty to submit it to his superior officer, the party for whom he was acting as agent. If I send my clerk to draw $36,000, and that clerk says "I will leave it to another clerk in this bank whether this is a delivery or not," he cannot come back to me and say "I have given away $2,000 of your money." I would say "You had no right to give it away; you must produce me that $2,000; and inasmuch as you have been foolish enough to yield that $2,000, you shall never draw another check for me; you are totally incompetent and unfit to transact this kind of business; now account to me for the $2,000 and leave my employment as not a fit man to exercise these duties further."

Mr. FARWELL. I suppose this paymaster was obliged to have the money; if he could not get the whole he was obliged to take enough to make his payments, and he did. He could not go off and leave the money. There is, however, one point upon which I want information. There can be no doubt, I think, that this $2,000 was stolen. The cash account of the Assistant Treasurer would show whether the money was stolen, or whether it remained in the sub-Treasury. If it was stolen by the clerk of the Assistant Treasurer, this man most certainly ought to have relief. If it was stolen through his neglect, by the person who is testified to have stood beside him, he ought not to have relief. Upon this question the deposition which has been read leaves some doubt on my mind; and I should like to know from the committee who investigated this matter how it presented itself to their minds, whether there was any explanation in regard to the man who appears by the testimony to have been a stranger and to have handled the money after it had come into the possession of this paymaster.

Mr. MORRILL. The committee attached no importance to the suggestion that the man had stolen it. We thought it not at all probable that the money could be accounted for in that way.

Mr. FARWELL. It is the only point that raises any doubt in my mind about which way I ought to vote. If I understood correctly the deposition which was read, there was a man there who was a stranger who had his hand upon these packages of money while they were lying on the counter after their delivery to the paymaster. These men are sometimes very adroit and will take money in situations and places where it would appear almost impossible. I really feel some difficulty in the case. If the money was stolen from the paymaster, he ought to lose it. If it was stolen by the agent of the Government, by the teller who put it up, the Government ought to lose it.

Mr. SUMNER. I think on the whole we had better adjourn; and I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. MORRILL. Let us dispose of this bill; otherwise it will take another day.

The motion to adjourn was not agreed to; there being, on a division—yeas 13, noes 16.

Mr. BROWN. I desire to vote understandingly on this question, and to deal with liberality as far as possible to this paymaster; but there is one point on which I should like to ask whether any evidence was adduced before the committee, and that is, did the cash account of the Assistant Treasurer the next day show his cash in a correct state, or was there any surplus over?

Mr. MORRILL. We had no especial evidence on that subject except what is contained in the statement of the cashier. He did not state how that was.

Mr. BROWN. The inference, then, is that the cash was correct.

Mr. MORRILL. That is the fair inference probably from that statement; but he did not make any statement as to the exact condition of the books.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. Foor.) The question is on the motion to postpone the bill indefinitely.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 16, nays 18; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Brown, Chandler, Conness, Cowan, Dixon, Farwell, Foster, Grimes, Harlan, Henderson, Nesmith, Sprague, Ten Eyck, Trumbull, Wilkinson, and Wilson—16.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Clark, Davis, Doolittle, Foot, Harris, Hendricks, Hicks, Johnson, Lane of Indiana, Morgan, Morrill, Powell, Ramsey, Sumner, Van Winkle, Wade, and Wiley—18.

ABSENT—Messrs. Buckalew, Carlile, Collamer, Hale, Harding, Howard, Howe, Lane of Kansas, McDougall, Pomeroy, Richardson, Riddle, Saulsbury, Sherman, and Wright—15.

So the motion was not agreed to.

The question recurring on the passage of the bill,

Mr. CHANDLER. I should like to have the yeas and nays on this bill. It is a very important precedent.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 21, nays 10; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Clark, Cowan, Davis, Dixon, Doolittle, Foot, Harris, Hendricks, Hicks, Johnson, Lane of Indiana, Morgan, Morrill, Powell, Ramsey, Sumner, Van Winkle, Wade, Wiley, and Wilson—21.

NAYS—Messrs. Brown, Chandler, Farwell, Foster, Grimes, Harlan, Nesmith, Sprague, Trumbull, and Wilkinson—10.

ABSENT—Messrs. Buckalew, Carlile, Collamer, Conness, Hale, Harding, Henderson, Howard, Howe, Lane of Kansas, McDougall, Pomeroy, Richardson, Riddle, Saulsbury, Sherman, Ten Eyck, and Wright—15.

So the bill was passed.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate communications from the Secretary of the Treasury and the Secretary of the Navy, in answer to a resolution calling for a statement of counsel fees paid by the various Departments; which, on motion of Mr. TRUMBULL, were ordered to lie on the table.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Several executive messages were received from the President of the United States, by Mr. NICOLAY, his Secretary.

On motion of Mr. WILSON, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business; and after some time spent therein the doors were reopened, and the Senate adjourned.

THE OFFICIAL PROCEEDINGS OF CONGRESS, PUBLISHED BY F. & J. RIVES, WASHINGTON, D. C.

THIRTY-EIGHTH CONGRESS, 2D SESSION.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 21, 1865.

NEW SERIES.....No. 22.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, January 19, 1864.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by Rev. JAMES I. FERREE, United States Army. The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

SPECIAL COMMITTEE.

The SPEAKER appointed GREEN CLAY SMITH of Kentucky, GLENNI W. SCOFIELD of Pennsylvania, JAMES C. ALLEN of Illinois, JOHN H. HUBBARD of Connecticut, and JAMES S. BROWN of Wisconsin, the special committee ordered by the House yesterday, to investigate charges against Hon. LUCIEN ANDERSON.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. FORNEY, their Secretary, informed the House that the Senate had passed, with amendments, a joint resolution (H. R. No. 91) in relation to the treaty of 1817, in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

DESTROYED BONDS.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts, by unanimous consent, introduced the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means consider the expediency of providing by law that where satisfactory proof is furnished the Secretary of the Treasury that any Government bond has been destroyed, he be authorized to issue a duplicate therefor.

INCOME TAX.

Mr. MILLER, of New York, by unanimous consent, introduced the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to inquire into the expediency of laying a tax of one per cent. upon the first $600 of income now exempt from taxation; with leave to report by bill or otherwise.

ENROLLED BILL.

Mr. COBB, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled an act (H. R. No. 390) for the relief of Emily A. Lyon; when the Speaker signed the same.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. FORNEY, their Secretary, notified the House that the Senate had passed with amendments, in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

An act (H. R. No. 583) to amend the twenty-first section of an act entitled "An act to define the pay and emoluments of certain officers of the Army, and for other purposes," approved July 17, 1862.

Also, that the Senate had passed joint resolutions of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

Joint resolution (S. R. No. 89) directing inquiry into the condition of the Indian tribes and their treatment by the civil and military authorities;

Joint resolution (S. R. No. 98) to present the thanks of Congress to Major General Alfred H. Terry and the officers and men under his command; and Joint resolution (S. R. No. 99) tendering the thanks of Congress to Rear Admiral David D. Porter, and to the officers, petty officers, seamen, and marines under his command, for their gallantry and good conduct in the recent capture of Fort Fisher.

MAJOR DAVID H. HASTINGS.

Mr. DAWES. I have in my hands the finding of a court-martial of so peculiar a character that I desire to introduce a resolution in relation to it, and I hope there will be no objection.

Before a court-martial lately held in this city Major David H. Hastings was arraigned upon three charges: first, embezzlement of money of the United States; second, knowingly using forged vouchers; and third, forging vouchers. He was convicted upon each of these charges, and in all upon twenty-six specifications. The sentence of the court-martial was as follows:

"To be cashiered and utterly disqualified to have or hold any office or employment in the service of the United States; to refund and pay into the Treasury of the United States the amount found to have been embezzled by him, to wit, $26,675, to pay a fine of $5,000, and to be imprisoned, in such place as the Secretary of War may direct, for one year, and until the amount embezzled and the fine as herein fixed shall be paid into the Treasury of the United States; provided that the whole amount of imprisonment shall not exceed five years."

This sentence has been reported to the War Department. With the finding of "guilty" that Department has not interfered; but it has interfered with the sentence, and has commuted it. I ask the attention of the House to the sentence as it now stands, for embezzlement of $26,675, for knowingly using forged vouchers, and for forging vouchers. The sentence, as it now stands, is this:

"It is therefore ordered that his sentence be commuted to suspension from rank, pay, and emoluments, for the period of six calendar months!" [Laughter.]

I therefore ask unanimous consent to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to communicate to this House the record of the late trial by court-martial of Major David H. Hastings, who has been suspended from rank, pay, and emoluments for six calendar months, upon conviction by said court-martial of forgery and the embezzlement of $26,675.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the resolution will be considered as introduced and agreed to.

There was no objection.

Mr. DAWES. I move to reconsider the vote by which the House has agreed to the resolution, and I also move that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PREVENTION OF SMUGGLING.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, by unanimous consent, presented a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury in regard to smuggling; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, also, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill for the further prevention of smuggling; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

CREDIT FOR HUNDRED DAYS' MEN.

Mr. NOBLE, by unanimous consent, introduced a joint resolution; which was read, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, &c., That the Secretary of War be instructed to give credit, in any draft hereafter to be made, for the amount of services furnished by the State of Ohio and other States, by troops called into the service for one hundred days, during the year 1864; that, in giving such credits, the same shall be reduced to years and credited to the districts and subdivisions of districts to which the troops may have belonged.

The joint resolution was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

PACIFIC RAILROAD.

Mr. COLE, of California, by unanimous consent, reported from the select committee on the Pacific railroad, a bill to authorize and aid in the construction of a railroad connecting the Pacific railroad in California with the Columbia river in Oregon; which was read a first and second time, and postponed for one week.

EXPLORATION OF EASTERN ASIA.

Mr. CLAY. I am directed by the Committee on Agriculture to move that the memorial presented some time ago from Dr. McGowen for a scientific exploration of eastern Asia be printed. The motion was agreed to.

SHIP CANAL AROUND NIAGARA FALLS.

Mr. LITTLEJOHN. I hold in my hand a bill entitled "An act authorizing the construction of a communication around the falls of Niagara, in the State of New York, for the passage of gunboats and other vessels." I shall offer this bill as a substitute for the bill on the same subject which has already been introduced, and I move that it be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

MILITARY ROAD IN WASHINGTON TERRITORY.

On motion of Mr. SCHENCK, by unanimous consent, the Committee on Military Affairs was discharged from the further consideration of the memorial of the Legislative Assembly of Washington Territory in relation to the military road across the Cascade mountains, and the same was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

MRS. A. M. ROLAS Y ROBALDO.

On motion of Mr. SCHENCK, also by unanimous consent, the Committee on Military Affairs was discharged from the further consideration of the petition of Mrs. A. M. Rolas y Robaldo, praying to be paid for certain property destroyed by order of the officers of the American Army in Mexico; and the same was referred to the Committee of Claims.

READING MATTER FOR THE ARMY.

On motion of Mr. SCHENCK, also by unanimous consent, the Committee on Military Affairs was discharged from the further consideration of the petition of officers of the army of the Potomac for reading matter; and leave was granted to the petitioners to withdraw said petition.

STEAMBOAT PILOTS.

Mr. ELIOT, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be instructed to inquire into the expediency of amending the act regulating steamboats passed in 1852 by providing safeguards in the appointment of pilots by local boards appointed for that purpose, with leave to report by bill or otherwise.

IMPRISONMENT OF JUVENILE OFFENDERS.

Mr. WILSON, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law for the imprisonment of juvenile offenders against the laws of the United States in houses of refuge instead of jails and penitentiaries.

PETITION PRESENTED.

Mr. SHANNON, by unanimous consent, presented the memorial of Samuel Morris, of California; and the same was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

CONSCRIPTION.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Connecticut. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to offer the following resolution:

Whereas a circular has been issued by Provost Marshal General Fry which is in the words following:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
PROVOST MARSHAL GENERAL'S OFFICE,
WASHINGTON, January 2, 1865.

The attention of Acting Assistant Provost Marshals General of States and Boards of Enrollment is called to the fact that the quotas assigned under the call of December 19, 1864, for three hundred thousand men, must not be reduced, except by actual enlistments in the Army, Navy, and Marine corps since the 19th ultimo.

JAMES B. FRY,
Provost Marshal General.

And whereas said order is manifestly unjust to such localities as have in good faith filled their quotas by enlistment in advance of said call: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be directed to inquire whether some measure should not be adopted to obviate the hardship that will result by such a construction of the law, and that they report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I have no particular objection to this resolution, but I desire to state that I called upon Provost Marshal General Fry for an explanation of that circular, and was informed that credit will be allowed for all enlistments made prior to the 19th day of December last, before the quotas are fixed, so that there will be no such result as the gentleman from Connecticut anticipates.

Mr. SCHENCK. I was desirous before this matter was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs to submit an explanation somewhat like that which has been made by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BOUTWELL.] I took occasion to call upon the Provost Marshal General in reference to this very order, and I may say, in brief, that he explained it all away; it does not mean anything in particular, and there is to be no action under it such as might be expected from reading it. Nothing is intended by that order except that care shall be taken in making the assignment of quotas that no credit shall be given except that to which the district is properly entitled. It was also occasioned in part by the fact that the December returns had not come in, and the explanation of it is that the people of each sub-district shall receive full allowance of credit in making the draft for every man put into the Army, whether before or after the 19th of December. In other words, I think that the interpretation put by the Provost Marshal General upon that order obviates the necessity of making any inquiry about it. The interpretation put upon the circular by the gentleman from Connecticut was a very natural one, but, as I have said, it has been explained away, and in practice no difficulty will arise from the publication of the order such as might reasonably have been expected from its terms.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Connecticut. I am very happy to know that that is the interpretation of the circular. It has been understood very generally to mean what its terms import.

Mr. SCHENCK. I admit the incongruity between the terms of the order and its interpretation.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Connecticut. In view of the explanation which has been made, I withdraw the resolution.

DUTIES ON IMPORTS.

Mr. PENDLETON, by unanimous consent, introduced a joint resolution supplemental to the resolution passed April 29, 1864, entitled "A joint resolution to increase temporarily the duties on imports;" which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

THE ENROLLMENT LAW.

Mr. SCHENCK. The Committee on Military Affairs, it will be remembered, reported a few days ago a bill (No. 678) to amend the act entitled "An act further to regulate and provide for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes," approved July 4, 1864, and other acts relating to enrollment and draft, which was recommitted to the committee and ordered to be printed. The bill is now printed and in the possession of members of the House. It is proposed by the committee to report back that bill and ask that a time be fixed for the consideration of the subject. There are a great many applications from all sides of the House for amendments to the enrollment act. The committee have embodied in their report in the form of a bill such amendments as they think essentially necessary, making them as few as possible, for its greater efficiency and for more general justice to those citizens who have objected to it.

There are gentlemen on all sides of the House who have other amendments to propose to the bill when it comes up, and the committee desire that the bill should be discussed so as to leave open the opportunity for amendment. I propose, with the consent of the House, that this day two weeks, or some other day—I will not interfere with other subjects—be set apart for the consideration of this bill, and we will report it back with that understanding or order.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask the unanimous consent of the House for the privilege of having an amendment to the bill ordered to be printed.

Mr. SCHENCK. I hope that there will be a general order for the printing of all amendments to be proposed to the bill, so that when we come to the consideration of the bill we shall have the amendments before us in proper form.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

The bill was then received, ordered to be printed, and made the special order for two weeks from this day, after the morning hour.

LIGHT-HOUSE DUES.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania, by unanimous consent, presented the memorial of the Board of Trade of Philadelphia, recommending the levying of light-house dues upon foreign vessels trading with this country; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

DANIEL J. BROWN.

Mr. HALE, by unanimous consent, moved that leave be granted for the withdrawal from the files of the House of the petition and papers of Daniel J. Brown.

The motion was agreed to.

THANKS FOR THE CAPTURE OF FORT FISHER.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. Speaker, I ask the unanimous consent of the House to introduce a resolution which I think will meet with the approval of every member upon this floor.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled, That the thanks of Congress be, and are hereby, tendered to Brevet Major General Alfred H. Terry, of the Army, and to Admiral David D. Porter, of the Navy, and to the gallant officers and men of their respective commands, for the splendid, united, and successful operations by land and sea which have resulted in the capture of one of the strongest fortresses ever defended, and the closing of the last open port from which the rebels were deriving their supplies.

Mr. SCHENCK. Mr. Speaker, I am ready to give thanks to the Powers above and those below for this victory. But it does seem to me that the principle the House appears disposed to adopt of referring to appropriate committees resolutions of this character is the proper one. If as much of the resolution as relates to the Army is referred to the Committee on Military Affairs I promise that it shall be reported back to-morrow morning, and I think that the same promise can be made for the Committee on Naval Affairs, although I do not know the day of its meeting.

The other day a resolution was offered giving thanks to Major General Sherman, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and it was there so modified as to make it a more grateful compliment to his friends, as I happen to know, and also, I think, to the general himself, by enlarging its scope and changing its language. I do not know that that is the case here, but I think we should refer these resolutions, so as to add to the value of the compliment in expressing not only the opinion of the House, but in expressing that opinion after deliberation and thorough examination.

I will not make objection provided so much of the resolution as relates to Admiral Porter be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and so much as relates to General Terry be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. COX. When the resolution was offered the other day thanking General Sherman, and was passed, I thought it was eminently due to Major General Thomas that some recognition should be made of his very distinguished service. And, sir, a great many civilians and military men think that his services were more valuable than those even of General Sherman, inasmuch as they drove the rebels from the State of Tennessee and broke an army to pieces. I think now, as the House is in a thankful mood, that we should have a resolution thanking General Thomas and his army. I have drawn up one already; I will have it read also, and, if it is the pleasure of the House, have it referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, who, I have no doubt, will put it in a graceful shape, and have it properly reported to the House.

Mr. SCHENCK. I will only remark that I do not apprehend there will be the slightest difference of opinion between my colleague and the Committee on Military Affairs connected with the proper disposition manifested to thank those various leaders of our Army. I alluded to the correction made in the resolution of thanks to Major General Sherman, not with a view to claim that the Committee on Military Affairs can couch such a resolution in language any more graceful than could my colleague, particularly, who is a master, as every one knows, of all the arts of rhetoric. In the case of General Sherman, and I refer to it only as a matter of illustration, the original resolution thanked him for his brilliant expedition through Georgia. The committee, on examining the resolution, thought it more appropriate, and entirely deserved by General Sherman, that he should be thanked for his successful and memorable campaign from Chattanooga to Atlanta, and then for his triumphal march through Georgia and the capture and occupation of Savannah.

If the resolution of which my colleague [Mr. Cox] gives notice shall be introduced after that which has been introduced by the gentleman from Connecticut has been disposed of, we shall be very glad to have it referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and I will make the pledge to him that the Committee on Military Affairs will be prepared to report it back, I think, certainly as early as to-morrow. All I contend for is that it is the better rule in all these cases, no matter how eminent may have been the services, how deserved the compliment this House thinks proper to bestow, to refer such resolutions to a committee before final action upon them.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. To debate such a resolution as this seems to me to deprive it of half its benefit; to refer it, if the gentleman does not debate it, seems to me to impair its value.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Is this resolution before the House?

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman from Ohio objects it is not.

Mr. SCHENCK. I withdraw my objection. Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. All I desire is to know whether it is before the House for discussion.

No further objection being made, the resolution was read a first and second time.

Mr. SCHENCK. Now I move that so much of the resolution as relates to Admiral Porter be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and so much as relates to General Terry be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Is that debatable?

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not see how the resolution can be divided so as to refer one part of it to one committee and another part to another committee. If it were in the shape of two resolutions they could be referred separately.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I was going on to remark that to refer a resolution of this character is to impair half of its efficiency. Indeed he is twice thanked who is thanked at once. In the light of what the American people know has transpired within the last ten days, it is asking too much that a simple resolution of thanks to the officer who led the land part of this expedition, and to the officer who commanded the naval part of the expedition, should be referred to a committee. There is nothing in that resolution of a complicated nature. There is no such question in it as that which the gentleman from Ohio raised in relation to General Sherman, as to whether he should be thanked for other things than the taking of Savannah.

This resolution, in the name of the American people, by the mouth of the American Congress, thanks those two officers for their united, successful, and splendid expedition which resulted in the capture of Fort Fisher. I have no doubt that the Committee on Military Affairs, and especially the able gentleman who so gracefully presides over that committee, could couch the resolution in more grammatical phrases, but what it would gain in grammar it would lose in force.

Now, in reference to the resolution of thanks to General Sherman I will say, if it is proper to refer to the body sitting in the other end of the Capitol, I understand that that resolution passed instantly upon its presentation to that body, and a motion to refer to a committee was voted down.

I hope the motion to refer this matter to a committee will be voted down. There is a difficulty, as the gentleman has already seen, and as the Speaker has announced to the House, in sending this resolution to any committee of this House. The resolution is predicated upon the fact that this victory was the united achievement of the Army and Navy, and it thanks in one sentence and in one breath the officer who led the Army and the officer who commanded the Navy.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I desire to ask the gentleman a question: does not this resolution, in the form in which he has drawn it, reflect upon Major General Butler?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Not at all, sir. It is expressly guarded in that respect, and was intended to be so guarded. I have no reflections to make at a time like this upon one of the earnest men of the nation. The hour of triumph is certainly not the hour to make an assault upon that valiant officer. I may add that, if I am rightly informed as to General Butler's views, he rejoices in this victory to-day equally with any man on this floor or anywhere. I was about to say, Mr. Speaker, that the resolution is not susceptible of division; and there is no one committee of this House to which it can be or ought to be referred, unless it is the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, for it is a Union resolution, complimenting both Army and Navy, both men and officers, both the sea and the land force. Without intending to debate it, (it is certainly a work of supererogation to present reasons for its passage,) I hope the House will adopt it at once.

Mr. GRIDER. I desire to ask, Mr. Speaker, whether there is now before the House a proposition to thank General Thomas for his gallantry.

The SPEAKER. No such proposition is before the House.

Mr. GRIDER. Is it in order to say anything on that subject?

The SPEAKER. It is not, under the rules of the House.

Mr. GRIDER. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to occupy two minutes on that subject. [Cries of "Go on!"]

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection. The gentleman will proceed.

Mr. GRIDER. Nobody, I believe, on either side of the House, objects to complimenting the gallantry of either our soldiers or the officers who command them. I do not know why a suggestion should come from the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] opposing a resolution to compliment General Thomas. I beg leave to state that the victory achieved by General Thomas over Hood was the most decidedly useful and grand victory to certain sections of this country that has been accomplished during this war. If Hood had overcome Thomas—

Mr. SCHENCK. Do I understand the gentleman to say that I have said anything which would imply an objection to thanking General Thomas?

Mr. GRIDER. I understood the gentleman to object.

Mr. SCHENCK. Why, sir, so far from doing so, I promised that if my colleague would introduce such a resolution, it should receive the prompt action of the Committee on Military Affairs, and be reported, if possible, to-morrow.

Mr. GRIDER. I am glad that the gentleman has made that explanation. I should not have arisen if I had so understood him.

Mr. SCHENCK. I am perfectly satisfied that, if anybody is entitled to thanks, General Thomas is entitled to them.

Mr. GRIDER. Then I will simply say, in conclusion, that I hope that everybody in this House is willing and anxious to make a proper acknowledgment of the services of General Thomas.

Mr. SCHENCK. Mr. Speaker, I think, with the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] that a discussion of the merits of this resolution would take away half its value; and I have therefore utterly refrained from its discussion. I have spoken nothing about the propriety of thanking or not thanking these officers, assuming that this House would be, as I think it ought to be, unanimous in giving most decided approbation in the form of a resolution of thanks to these officers, both naval and military, for their conduct in the attack on Fort Fisher. I did claim that, as a matter of precedent and practice, it is better that every such resolution should go to a committee, and be by the committee considered and reported back without delay, promptly, in order, by such promptness, to add more to the value of the resolution. But, since the gentleman has, very unnecessarily, spoken about the ability of the Committee on Military Affairs to report such a resolution in better form, I will now speak in reply to what he has said upon that point.

The first objection that I would make to this resolution is, that it does not even give correctly the title of Porter. It calls him "Admiral Porter." We have no "admiral" in our service. The gentleman, as a member of the Committee on Naval Affairs, ought to know that "admiral" is as distinct a rank as vice admiral, or rear admiral, or captain, or lieutenant. Porter is, as I understand, a rear admiral. We have no admiral; we have a vice admiral, and six or eight rear admirals, of whom Porter is one.

There is one of the blunders. If this resolution is to be engrossed upon parchment and framed, as I think it should be, for the benefit of the children of that gallant commander, whom I admire personally as well as for his professional eminence, (for he is a friend of mine, and I will not be the last to thank him,) if this resolution is to be used in that way, to be handed down as an heirloom in his family, Rear Admiral Porter would certainly desire that it should be correct in its form, so that future generations might at least know what was his rank in the Navy. Yet this resolution, though it comes from a member of the Naval Committee, does not even give correctly the title of this officer, but, on the contrary, gives him the title of an officer unknown in our Navy. That is my first objection.

Again, this resolution speaks of Fort Fisher as one of the strongest fortresses ever defended. Well, that sounds a little newspaperish. It is a very strong work, from all the accounts we have of it, and it has tended to prove the great strength of earthworks against any bombardment; that is one of the results of the experience of this war; but, as compared with some of the fortresses of the world which have been both attacked and defended, I undertake to say history will show that it is not one of the strongest ever defended, whoever may say to the contrary. There may be a difference of opinion about that.

Again, the resolution goes on to speak of closing up the last open port through which the rebels are drawing their supplies. It was not an "open port" in the strict sense of the words; it was a blockaded port, and it was not the last port into which blockade runners could go. There are several yet on the coast of Texas, and they can even go into Charleston. So that that statement is incorrect in point of fact. It is a little newspaperish too. It would do for an article in a newspaper, and would be a very excellent article. I would prefer, in giving thanks to our admirals and generals who have distinguished themselves as these two officers most eminently have, that the resolution of thanks should be simple and dignified, so as to express the fact, and accompany that fact with thanks, full thanks, unmeasured thanks, and not go off upon any doubtful questions as to the strength of fortresses, or whether all the southern ports are closed, or as to any other collateral issue.

I have been drawn unwillingly into this comment upon the resolution, but the discussion upon it has been provoked by the gentleman on the Naval Committee, the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] himself. Perhaps I might say that it was not at all on account of the particular form or phraseology of the resolution that I offered my proposition that it should be referred, but I did it for the sake of the precedent and practice. I think it best that all such resolutions should be referred. As the Speaker has decided that this resolution is not divisible, although I believe a different practice has prevailed in the Senate in regard to similar resolutions, I will move that the whole resolution be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, the committee of which the gentleman from Connecticut is himself a member, as I have no fear but that when he comes to reconsider it and rewrite it he will present it in a simple, clear, and satisfactory shape to this House, and we shall all be glad to vote for it.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I simply desire to remind the House of the fact that a few days ago, when a resolution was introduced into this House giving the thanks of Congress to General Sherman, I then rose in my place and asked that a vote should be taken on the resolution at that time without referring to the Committee on Military Affairs. That was objected to, and the House decided to refer the resolution to the committee.

Now, it seems to me that it would be invidious and wrong to treat a resolution of thanks to any other officer in a different manner from the manner in which we treated that resolution. Having established the precedent of referring these resolutions of thanks to the appropriate committees, we ought, in all consistency, to follow that precedent. I was then in favor of voting thanks promptly when a resolution was introduced and the officer was deserving of thanks, but the House established a different precedent, and we ought now to follow it.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I have no ambition to enter the lists with the gentlemen from Ohio; [Mr. SCHENCK,] either before the country or before the House, to decide upon points of grammar. The gentleman from Ohio is a mighty grammarian; I am willing to concede that; but I hope the gentleman will not forget that good old maxim that he who sticks in the letter sticks in the bark. His habit I think is to stick in the bark before this House, and that style of oratory which he adopts is pretty familiar to most of us.

Now, the gentleman's criticism, so far as there is any criticism worth replying to, is that the title of the naval officer we propose to thank here is misquoted in the resolution. The gentleman had that resolution before him, and if he had been disposed to deal fairly by it, or the member who presented it, he would have stated to the House that a blank or space was left before the word "admiral," for the very purpose of putting in the title of Rear Admiral Porter before the resolution was acted on by the House. The resolution was drawn in a moment at my desk, and it could not then be ascertained what his real title was. If it is the main objection of the gentleman from Ohio that Admiral Porter is not designated as Rear Admiral Porter, it is perfectly competent for any member of the House to submit an amendment in that regard, and I notify the gentleman that I will accept the amendment.

With regard to his other criticism, as to whether this was one of the strongest fortresses, I think that the judgment of the country, and of military and naval men, will not agree with the criticism that he has passed, that this was not one of the strongest fortresses. Certainly they who went down on the first expedition to take Fort Fisher came back with no such opinion as that gentleman entertains.

Now, with regard to the precedent. The precedent has been both ways, and there has been, in other words, no precedent at all. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FARNSWORTH] states that in his opinion it would have been more proper to have passed the resolution of thanks to General Sherman without referring it to the Committee on Military Affairs. And although it is not parliamentary to refer to the Senate, the practice has been in cases of emergency and importance for the Senate to pass resolutions of this character without reference. This, of course, is a matter of no particular emergency, and I do not want to hinge any debate on it. It has been three days since the news came, and was announced by the Speaker from his desk, of one of the most magnificent victories of this or any war, and I think it is high time that a resolution should be brought before Congress thanking those gallant officers of the Army and Navy for this remarkable service.

It seems to me, and it is one of the grounds upon which I urge the passage of the resolution, there is eminently more propriety in passing such a resolution at once than in referring it to a committee as there is no appropriate committee to which it can be referred, a fact admitted by the gentleman from Ohio himself.

The SPEAKER. As the decision of the Chair has been somewhat questioned, and as the action of the Senate has been brought into the discussion both by the gentleman from Illinois and the gentleman from Ohio, the Chair asks that the action of the Senate may be read.

The Clerk read, as follows:

"Mr. DIXON. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to introduce two joint resolutions, one giving the thanks of Congress to Rear Admiral Porter, and the other to Major General Terry for the recent brilliant victory at Fort Fisher; and I will observe that although these distinguished officers were jointly engaged in this victory, I have followed the precedents in proposing to give them the thanks of Congress in separate resolutions.

"By unanimous consent, leave was granted to introduce the joint resolutions; and they were severally read twice by their titles, and referred as indicated below:

"A joint resolution (S. R. No. 98) tendering the thanks of Congress to Major General Alfred H. Terry, and to the officers and men under his command, for their gallantry and good conduct in the recent capture of Fort Fisher—to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

"A joint resolution (S. R. No. 99) tendering the thanks of Congress to Rear Admiral David D. Porter, and to the officers, petty officers, seamen, and marines under his command, for their gallantry and good conduct in the recent capture of Fort Fisher—to the Committee on Naval Affairs."

The SPEAKER. It will be seen that two separate resolutions can be referred to separate committees, but the Chair cannot see how one joint resolution can be mutilated and part sent to one committee and part to another committee.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I modify my resolution by inserting the word "rear" before "admiral."

Mr. COX. I do not believe that the House and country will regard the reference of this resolution to the Committee on Military Affairs as a reflection upon the officers, soldiers, and sailors who are thanked by it. It is time that this House had some rule in relation to resolutions of this character—some general rule—for the gentleman from Connecticut has himself confessed that these resolutions are drawn in a hurry, currente calamo, in a spirit of patriotic impulse, at the desk of members, without any special care as to style or manner, or the toilet of the resolution, if I may use the expression, and these resolutions become tame and mere platitudes unless there is some grace given to their expression. I do not mean to say that the present resolution lacks proper expression, dignity, and grace, but I will say this, sir, that when we undertake to give thanks it ought to be done in some sort of graceful style. It ought to have on its best clothes and its best manners. Therefore I think that this and all similar resolutions should be sent to a committee with a view, if you please, to give them a proper polish. I expect to introduce a joint resolution of thanks to General Thomas, and to move to send it to the Military Committee.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Does the gentleman object to the peculiar language of this resolution, and if so, will he not suggest some modification?

Mr. COX. I cannot do it just now. I would like to read it critically, and I would like to have the aid of gentlemen familiar with classical models. I remember very well, when these resolutions became so common and so tame in the last Congress, upon the taking of Vicksburg by General Grant, I had the honor of drawing up a resolution of thanks, and I consulted General Sickles, and consulted Grecian models; and I got it up in artistic style. A resolution is more valuable and more acceptable when got up in taste and good style. Although the gentleman from Connecticut may have all graces of style, I insist that while he has a rush of patriotic impulse at his desk he is not in a proper condition to draw up a proper resolution; and therefore it should be referred in order to give the resolution the grace and polish which are due to a resolution from this Congress.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. If there is any defect in style in the resolution I will say that my style has been partly modified by and partly founded upon a very classical book entitled "The Buckeye Abroad."

Mr. COX. I have already been overwhelmed with compliments by the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, and I will now have to throw myself into embarrassment from the remarks of the gentleman from Connecticut. [Laughter.]

Not only is there a dispute as to style, but matters of fact are in question here, and surely the gentleman would not push a resolution when the facts themselves are in question. A reference is no reflection whatever upon General Terry, and none whatever upon Admiral Porter. It rather gives weight to a resolution if it is properly referred, and passed after a careful review by an appropriate committee.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put; and under the operation thereof the resolution was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

THANKS OF CONGRESS TO GENERAL THOMAS.

Mr. COX, by unanimous consent, introduced a joint resolution expressive of the thanks of the American people to Major General George H. Thomas and the army under his command; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

TAX ON BANK NOTES.

Mr. BROOMALL asked unanimous consent to introduce the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing that a stamp of one per cent. be required to be placed by the bank or the holder on every State bank note before issuing or passing it; and renewed every six months; and report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. STROUSE objected.

PROSECUTION FOR LIBELS IN THE DISTRICT.

Mr. ASHLEY, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill in reference to the prosecution for libels in the District of Columbia; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

REPORT OF SUPERINTENDENT PUBLIC PRINTING.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House the annual report of the Superintendent of Public Printing; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

REPORT ON INTERNAL REVENUE.

Mr. MORRILL, by unanimous consent, introduced the following resolution; which was referred, under the rule, to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That five thousand extra copies of the report of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue be printed: two thousand for the use of the members of this House, and three thousand for the use of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue.

REPORT OF J. W. KING.

Mr. A. W. CLARK, from the Committee on Printing, reported the following resolution:

Resolved, That there be printed for the use of the Navy Department one thousand copies of the report of Chief Engineer J. W. King on the dock-yards of Europe, with the maps accompanying the same.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. How much will the engraving of the maps cost? We have already made an appropriation of eighty or ninety thousand dollars for engraving.

Mr. A. W. CLARK. About one thousand dollars. The Committee on Printing were at first opposed to engraving the maps; but the Department considered that the work would be comparatively worthless without the maps.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I will make no objection if the gentleman will add a proviso to the effect that the engraving shall not cost to exceed $1,000.

Mr. A. W. CLARK. Our estimate was $700, but I stated in round numbers $1,000, so as to get it large enough.

I call the previous question.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. I desire to say upon this subject that the report of Chief Engineer King is an elaborate document, the result of a special visit to and examination on his part of the dock-yards of Europe. It is an elaborate statement of the character and appliances of those yards, procured at the request of the Secretary of the Navy, and bearing directly upon the future interests of the naval service in this country; and the maps which accompany the report are an essential portion of it, and the report itself would be quite unintelligible without them.

This resolution, which was sent yesterday, I think, to the Committee on Printing, was framed upon a letter received from the Secretary of the Navy, addressed to me as chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, desiring that this work might be printed in the form recommended in the resolution. I do not think the cost of the maps and charts will exceed the amount he has asked for, or if it exceeds it at all it will be in a very slight degree. I think it important that the maps should be printed.

Mr. A. W. CLARK. I now demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. A. W. CLARK moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. MORRILL. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. The motion was agreed to.

So the rules were suspended; and the House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. DAWES in the chair,) and resumed, as a special order, the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 649) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending 30th of June, 1866; the pending question being upon the motion of Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, to strike out the following clause:

For salaries of additional clerks in the office of the Assistant Treasurer at Boston, which are hereby authorized, $11,500.

Mr. MORRILL. All I desire to say in regard to that amendment is that this is the sole and entire appropriation that is made for the sub-Treasurer's office in Boston, and from information before the Committee of Ways and Means they were satisfied that an appropriation of this amount is absolutely indispensable, and they will, perhaps, before the close of the session propose to increase it beyond the present amount upon the representations made by the sub-Treasurer of that city. I call for tellers on the amendment.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. MORRILL, and WASHBURN of Illinois, were appointed.

The committee divided; but the tellers were unable to agree upon a report, and Messrs. BAXTER and NOBLE were appointed tellers.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 50, noes 50.

The CHAIRMAN voted in the negative, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MORRILL. I offer the following amendment:

On page 38, after line nine hundred and fifteen, insert as follows:

For procuring dies, stamps, adhesive stamps, paper, printing forms and regulations, advertising, and other expenses of carrying into effect the act of June 30, 1864, $1,100,000.

For paper, special dies, and printing of circulating notes and expenses necessarily incurred, including express charges in procuring the same, $677,500.

In explanation of that amendment I will state that it has been usual to make this appropriation in the miscellaneous bill, but since this bill was printed it has been thought better to have all these appropriations included in this bill. Since the estimates were made out, a communication has been received from the Secretary of the Treasury showing that a further sum will be necessary above what was estimated for, in consequence of a decision of the Comptroller of the Treasury that certain expenditures for the Internal Revenue department must be paid out of the Treasury instead of being paid out of the current revenues. I send a letter to the Clerk's desk to be read.

The Clerk read, as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, December 14, 1864.

SIR: I have the honor to call your attention to the estimate of $700,000 "for procuring dies, stamps, adhesive stamps, paper, printing forms and regulations, advertising, and any other expenses of carrying into effect the act of June 30, 1864," to provide internal revenue, &c., submitted with the other estimates for the year ending June 30, 1866. (See printed estimates, page 23.)

The Commissioner of Internal Revenue now represents that this sum will be insufficient, for the reason that since the estimate was submitted he has learned that the First Comptroller has directed that the salaries of the revenue agents and inspectors appointed under the above act shall be paid from the appropriation thus asked for, rather than from the accruing revenue. The Commissioner estimates that $350,000 will be required for the payment of such agents and inspectors for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1866; and that $50,000 will be required for the purchase of cotton tags for the same period.

I therefore request that $400,000 may be added to the amount already submitted, making $1,100,000.

I am very respectfully your obedient servant,

W. P. FESSENDEN,

Secretary of the Treasury.

HON. THADDEUS STEVENS,
Chairman Committee Ways and Means.

[The committee here rose informally; and, the Speaker having resumed the chair, a message was received from the President of the United States, through Mr. NICOLAY, his Private Secretary, announcing that he had approved and signed a joint resolution (H. R. No. 56) providing for the termination of the reciprocity treaty of June 5, 1854, between the United States and Great Britain. The committee resumed its session.]

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I desire to ask the gentleman from Vermont how much, if his amendment be adopted, will then have been appropriated for this purpose.

Mr. MORRILL. This amendment will not embrace the same subject. The usage hitherto has been to include it in the miscellaneous appropriation bill. The estimates require $677,000 for paper, special dies, printing of circulating notes, express costs, &c. As I have stated, the Comptroller of the Treasury has decided that these expenses are not to be paid from the current revenue of the Department. This last item, therefore, does not increase the expenditures of the Government at all.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. This item of $2,000,000 "for necessary expenses in carrying into effect the several acts of Congress authorizing loans and the issue of Treasury notes" is certainly a very startling amount to be appropriated for that purpose, and I should like some information about it. How is this sum to be absorbed? For what purpose is this $2,000,000 to be expended? I desire to know if the Department is taking money out of this fund to make certain experiments in hydrostatic printing, and if so how much. I want to know whether a vast amount has not been expended in experimenting on this subject by parties who are applying for a patent at the Patent Office for that invention. I would be glad that some information should be given to the committee on this subject before the appropriation is made.

Mr. MORRILL. Although we have already passed that item, my amendment not relating thereto at all, but coming in as a substantive proposition, still I am perfectly willing to reply to the query of the gentleman from Illinois. The item of $2,000,000 covers not only the expenses of printing notes and bonds issued by the United States, but it covers all the expenses in relation to obtaining loans, commissions, &c., and the expenses of printing fractional notes.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I propose to amend the amendment offered by the gentleman from Vermont by adding to it the following:

Provided further, That no further expenditure shall be made for experiments on the system of hydrostatic printing by the Treasury Department until such experiments shall have been definitely authorized by law, and a distinct appropriation made therefor.

Mr. MORRILL. I have no objection to the adoption of that amendment.

Mr. HOOPER. I hope that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois will not be adopted. I think he is entirely mistaken in supposing that there is a waste of money in printing at the Department. I think, from the information obtained by the investigating committee on this subject last session, that the cost of printing at the Department is not more than half of what would be charged for the same work by the bank-note companies.

Mr. WILSON. I ask the gentleman whether he has any information as to the cost of these experiments, and as to the number of impressions made on these presses per hour or per day.

Mr. HOOPER. I have no other information except from my own observation, which is that they print at least as rapidly as the common presses.

Mr. WILSON. I am quite as well satisfied, from the testimony taken before the committee that investigated the subject last session, that the printing is not so rapid. I think the testimony showed very clearly the difference—some witnesses making the difference as fifty is to two hundred between the hydrostatic presses and the rolling presses; one witness stating, I believe, that they made but seventy impressions per day on the hydrostatic presses. I have no doubt at all of the propriety of this amendment. I think that these experiments ought to be stopped until there can be such investigation into this matter of printing as will induce Congress to authorize it by law.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I was glad to see that the gentleman who has charge of this bill did not interpose any objection to the amendment which I propose. Now, sir, I am authorized to state that $300,000 of the money that we appropriated has been taken to experiment upon the subject of hydrostatic printing; while the amount of money which had been printed by this method on November 15, 1864, was only $312,000. We have paid $300,000 for printing and experimenting upon $312,000. This experiment upon hydrostatic printing, as it is called, has been continued, without any authority of law, for two and a half years. It is the revival of an experiment which, after trial of more than twenty years, had been abandoned. This money has, for the purpose of testing this matter, been taken from the Treasury by two parties, Spencer M. Clark and Stewart Gwynne; and these men have filed in the Patent Office a caveat for a patent of the process for experimenting upon which they have taken the money of the Government. This is the precise state of the case. This is my reason for offering the amendment, and the reason why I put the question to the gentleman from Vermont. I ask this committee whether they are prepared, under such a state of facts, to vote down this amendment. I ask the committee to pass upon the conduct of men in the Treasury Department, who, after taking the Government money for the purpose of these experiments, are applying to the Patent Office for a patent, thus seeking to appropriate to themselves the benefit of the experiments which have been made.

Mr. MORRILL. If there is any real abuse at the Treasury Department in relation to printing, I, for one, will not vote against any measure that shall look to its correction. Some of the facts stated by the gentleman from Illinois are, perhaps, as he states them; in others he is undoubtedly incorrect. Congress did authorize the Treasury Department to establish a printing office in the Treasury building without any limitation; and consequently whatever that Department has done has been in pursuance of positive law. Now, in relation to any experiments that have been undertaken at that Department, my information, as gathered from an investigation at the last session, was this, that some losses had been incurred by the Treasury Department in obtaining some machinery which is now useless; but I was assured that the gain to the Treasury Department was more than four times in excess of the amount of the loss.

Mr. WILSON. As I understand this matter of printing in the Treasury Department, the hydrostatic presses are used solely to print the fractional currency. They are not used for the purpose of printing the bonds, the certificates of indebtedness, the Treasury notes, or the notes of the national banks. The amount of the fractional currency is but small compared with the whole amount of printing done in the Department. I think that any gentleman who will take the trouble to look through the testimony taken before the committee will come to the conclusion, as I did, that the expenditure for the purpose of experimenting on hydrostatic presses for printing fractional currency is far beyond what Congress authorized.

Mr. MORRILL. If the gentleman will so frame his amendment as not to hamper the Treasury Department in its ordinary proceedings; if he will so frame it as to meet the precise point which he makes—that is, to prevent men from using the public funds to further their own private speculations—I will vote for it; but if it goes beyond that I must oppose it. I think that the language of the amendment, in its present form, is too broad.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I call for the reading of my amendment. I think the gentleman would not object to it if he understood it.

The Clerk read the amendment.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I do not propose to change that amendment. I think that if the gentleman has listened to it it must meet his approbation. It certainly cannot interfere with any of the legitimate operations of the Department. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Hooper] withdraws all objection to it.

Mr. GARFIELD. If there is any way in which I can move an amendment I should like to do so, as I want to say a few words on the subject.

The CHAIRMAN. Further amendment is not in order.

Mr. GARFIELD. I am sorry, for I think that the gentleman has made a great mistake.

The amendment of Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, was agreed to.

Mr. BROOKS. I do not know that all of this sum may not be necessary.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is not in order.

The question recurred on Mr. MORRILL's amendment as amended.

Mr. PRICE. I want to understand the amendment as it has been amended. I understand that it makes an expenditure of near four million dollars. Am I right? I understand there are $2,000,000 in the text as it stands, $1,200,000 in the amendment, and then $600,000 besides.

Mr. MORRILL. I have already explained this amendment twice.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is not in order.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I ask, by unanimous consent, that my amendment be transposed, and placed before the amendment of the gentleman from Vermont.

There was no objection, and it was agreed to accordingly.

Mr. MORRILL's amendment, as amended, was then adopted.

The Clerk read, as follows:

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the compensation of the Treasurer of the United States be, and the same is hereby, fixed at $6,000 per annum; the compensation of the Assistant Treasurer at New York, at $7,000 per annum; and the salaries of the Assistant Treasurers at Philadelphia, Boston, and St. Louis, at $5,000 per annum each, to commence from the 4th day of March next; and the amount necessary to pay the same for the current and next fiscal year be, and the same is hereby, appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated: Provided, That the increased compensation authorized by this section shall continue in force for two years from the 4th day of March next, and no longer.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to reduce the salary of the Assistant Treasurer at New York from $7,000 to $6,000.

I wish to inquire of the gentleman from Vermont who has charge of this bill what is the present salary of the Assistant Treasurer at New York.

Mr. MORRILL. Six thousand dollars.

Mr. HOLMAN. The present salary is $6,000, while the salary of the Treasurer of the United States is $5,000. This increases that salary from $5,000 to $6,000. The salary has been doubled within the last four years, or since the war began. It was only $3,000 at that time. And it is now proposed to increase the salary of the Assistant Treasurer at New York to $7,000—$1,000 more than is proposed to be paid to the Treasurer of the United States. Is it not rather singular to pay the first officer connected with the Treasury $6,000 and one of his assistants $7,000? This also increases the salary of the Assistant Treasurers at Philadelphia, Boston, and St. Louis from $4,000 to $5,000. It seems to me that we ought not to encourage this increase of salaries, and therefore I have moved the pending amendment. I hope the House will not increase the salary of the Assistant Treasurer at New York beyond $6,000.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. Chairman, as a general principle I concur entirely with the gentleman from Indiana and all those who oppose the increase of salaries, but evidence was presented to the Committee of Ways and Means which they thought sufficient to induce them to make a unanimous report in favor of the increase of this amount. Why, sir, there is no comparison between the amount of business done by the Treasurer of the United States now and what was done four years ago. You can hardly induce men who give bonds to an enormous amount for the faithful performance of their duties to hold these offices at the present salary. No man in this House could be hired to take the risk as a mere commercial speculation for the amount of this salary. And in relation to the Assistant Treasurer of the United States at New York, it was with the utmost difficulty that a man of sufficient character and experience in that city could be pressed to take that office. The present incumbent was only induced to accept the office by the Treasurer upon the understanding that he would recommend to Congress an increase of his salary. At the time he was appointed he was receiving $8,000 per annum in the business of a private company, and he was also promised $10,000 the next year. The Committee of Ways and Means propose to increase his salary to $7,000, and the balance he must take in honor. Under the circumstances it has become indispensable, as shown to the Committee of Ways and Means, that we should have not only men of ripe experience but men who are willing to devote themselves as diligently to the service of the Government as they would to their own private offices, and that cannot be done without a liberal salary.

Mr. ODELL. I move to amend by striking out "$7,000" and inserting in lieu thereof, "$8,000," so as to make the salary of the Assistant Treasurer of New York $8,000. I do so believing that the services rendered by the gentleman who now occupies that position are worth that money. I have no sympathy with the sentiment expressed by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Holman] with reference to the salaries of these high offices of trust. He who now occupies this position, Mr. Stewart, left a position giving him a higher salary at the urgent solicitation, I might almost say the demand of the Government, and took the head of that department in New York. It is known to gentlemen here that other gentlemen had the proffer of that place, but that Mr. Stewart, almost at the command of the Government, consented to occupy the place at a salary less than he was receiving before from a private banking institution of which he was president. I hope the salary will be put at $8,000.

Mr. HOLMAN. I take it for granted that a public officer in the performance of any given duty devotes his entire time and talents to its performance, and I should suppose that the former Assistant Treasurer at New York, whose salary was only $4,000 per annum was compelled to give his entire time and experience to the discharge of his duties, and that his responsibility was of the same character as it is to-day. The increase of the business of a department does not increase the duties or the responsibilities of its head. If he be a man of integrity he can incur no responsibility, he does not even by the perfidy of his subordinates.

What astonishes me more than all else is that those gentlemen upon the other side of the House who have been the leaders in economy in assailing these petty items of increase of comparatively small salaries are so passive when it is proposed to increase a salary from $5,000 to $7,000. Those gentlemen have devoted hours of debate in opposition to a slight increase of small salaries—the salaries of clerks. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] and from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURN] attacked with great vehemence the attempt to increase the salaries of clerks and of the police, and other humble salaries; but when a proposition is introduced to increase the compensation of this high officer of the Government, no voice is raised against it.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. We were waiting for the other side of the House to show a little spirit upon this occasion. We have been fighting the effort to increase these salaries all through, and we have received very little support from that side of the House.

Mr. HOLMAN. On the contrary, so far from that being correct, on the very proposition which was a short time since lost by the casting vote of the Chairman, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES]—there being 50 to 50 on a division—most of the opposition came from this side of the House. The only division which has been had to-day was on that proposition.

What means all this talk about there being only a few men who can fill this position? Why, sir, the country is full of men competent to any of the offices. It could not be otherwise in a country full of intelligence and energy. There are men in the ranks of your armies who are competent both in integrity and ability to perform the duties of this position, and who have the experience necessary to enable them to perform them. The truth is, as every man knows, that the more arduous and difficult duties in connection with all these Departments are performed, not by the heads of the Departments, but by those occupying comparatively inferior positions, and receiving but a pittance of compensation—men who have served in the capacity of clerks for a lifetime. It is not true in fact, with all deference to the opinions of gentlemen, that there are so few men in the country fit to fill offices such as is filled by this gentleman in New York as to justify an extravagant increase of salary to secure any particular one, and yet it is said that we must pile up the salary for the purpose of obtaining the benefit of competent services. Salary alone seems to be considered; the honor of the position, the claims of the country upon its eminent citizens at a time when so many sacrifices are being made, are never taken into the account.

I have always estimated the duties of the Treasurer of the United States as of a very delicate character, requiring eminence at least in integrity and general experience in affairs, and I thought when this war began that a salary of $3,000 a year, although the Treasurer then devoted all his time to the duties of the office, was scarcely sufficient, and hence I made no opposition to raising it to $4,000, and subsequently to $5,000; but when the House deliberately at the last session, not only in Committee of the Whole but in the House, struck out the item making that salary $6,000, and, when the Senate put it in, disagreed to it, it seemed to me that the Committee of Ways and Means, bowing to the solemnly expressed judgment of the House, would not again insist upon bringing this subject to our consideration unless directed by the House.

I should complain of the action of that committee whatever might be my views now of the policy of increasing his salary. And yet I should greatly prefer seeing his salary increased than any other. I think it now lower, duties and responsibilities considered, than any enumerated in this section. Standing alone, now, there would be less objection to increase his salary than in the connection in which it stands. The eminent services of General Spinner are appreciated. His spotless integrity and patient and laborious performance of his duties are known and appreciated. The country has been most fortunate in having such a citizen the custodian of the public treasure. I cannot believe that his salary should be less than the Assistant Treasurer at New York. I am not proposing any motion on the subject of the increase of his salary. I do not propose if the increase of the other salaries is stricken out to get belligerent over the increase of the Treasurer's salary alone. I know there are strong arguments for the increase if any of the higher salaries are to be increased, but this is not now before the committee.

The question now before the committee is upon a proposition to increase the salary of the Assistant Treasurer in New York to $7,000, while leaving the salary of the Treasurer of the United States, who is responsible for the whole of the public funds, and to whom the Treasurer at New York is but an assistant, both in the dignity of position and in responsibility, at $6,000. I have heard no argument, and I do not believe there is an argument which will justify this discrimination, which puts the salary of the subordinate $1,000 higher than that of the principal.

The question was taken on Mr. ODELL's amendment, and it was rejected.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I now move to amend the section by striking out the word "six" in the third line and inserting "five" in lieu thereof.

Mr. HOLMAN. The pending amendment is to strike out "seven" and insert "six," and it seems to me that another amendment of the text cannot be made.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment of the gentleman from Illinois pertains to a different subject than that to which the original amendment applies, and therefore, during the pendency of the original amendment, it is not in order.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. What is the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN]?

The CHAIRMAN. It refers to the salary of the Assistant Treasurer in New York.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. What is it?

Mr. HOLMAN. It is to strike out "seven" and insert "six," so as to make the salary $6,000.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I move to amend so as to make it $5,000, and that will enable me to say what I desire to say. I think the committee may as well meet this question of raising salaries here as at any other time, and meet it squarely.

It is true, as the gentleman from Indiana has stated, that this question of raising the salary of the Treasurer of the United States was passed upon at the last session of Congress, and Congress determined that the salary should not be raised. The Senate, according to my recollection, put in an amendment raising it and the House rejected it. I was one of those who voted against raising the salary of the Treasurer of the United States, as that was a marked case. I believed then, as I believe now, that if any salaries are to be raised at all the salary of the Treasurer ought to be raised. He is a gentleman of the highest integrity and capacity, with whom I had the pleasure of serving in Congress for six years, and there was not a closer voter in Congress than General Spinner was. He was the first man in the House to oppose any increase of salaries and all extravagant expenditures.

The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] might have observed that the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. WILSON], and his colleague, [Mr. PRICE], and myself have become somewhat fatigued in endeavoring to cut down these expenditures. We have almost invariably failed, and have not received the aid of gentlemen upon the other side of the House. This is a proposition to raise the salary of the Assistant Treasurer at New York $1,000, and I should like to know why that officer should have $1,000 more salary than the Treasurer of the United States. And then it makes the salaries of the Assistant Treasurers at Philadelphia and Boston and St. Louis $5,000, increasing them $1,000 or $1,500 per annum. But other equally meritorious cases have been passed over. I desire to know why the salary of the Assistant Treasurer at Chicago, where I believe there is very nearly as much business as at Boston, or St. Louis, or, perhaps, even at Philadelphia, has not been raised when the salaries of others are being raised? I would have introduced an amendment to raise the salary of the Assistant Treasurer at Chicago, but, as I have said, I am opposed to the raising of any salaries. As the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. WILSON], who sits near me says, all of these sub-Treasurers whose salaries are raised are fortunate enough to be represented on the Committee of Ways and Means. I do not undertake to say that that has had any influence in getting the salaries of these officers raised; but I observe that the salaries of these officers, with equal claims, have not been raised. I trust the committee understands the subject, and will pass upon it now, and say whether we are willing to go into a general increase of salaries or not.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. Chairman, I believe I have performed what is my simple duty in relation to this matter. After looking over the whole subject I became satisfied that there was a necessity for raising the salary of the Assistant Treasurer at New York if the Government would have the services of a first-class man for the place. The office, as is well known to all members of the House, went a begging for months. Mr. Cisco declined and resigned his place, and was only induced by the urgent persuasion of the Secretary of the Treasury to remain until he could find a suitable and proper man. A man who holds that position in New York is necessarily subject to a much larger expense than if he held it in this city. He has to negotiate large sums, has a very large number of clerks under his charge, and is under the necessity of living in greater style, perhaps, than is the Treasurer at Washington. Nevertheless the increase of the pay of the Treasurer here is demanded as a matter of justice to the present incumbent. There is no more faithful officer in the whole land than the present occupant of that position. As is well known to the members of the House, he has nearly broken down his health by long and continuous labor in that office. For a large part of the time during the last four years he has labored in that office no less than sixteen hours a day, taking his meals in his office.

Now, in relation to the matter of the Treasurer at Chicago, I desire to ask the gentleman from Illinois what the name of the Treasurer is at Chicago.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I can tell the gentleman from Vermont the name of the collector, who also discharges the duties of treasurer. It is Luther Haven, one of the most responsible and estimable gentlemen in the country; a man of the highest intelligence, and equally worthy of a high salary as any of the other officers provided for in this bill.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. Chairman, we did not report an increase of salary for a sub-Treasurer at Chicago, simply because there was no officer of that class there. The West has not been neglected. The gentleman charges that all those places are represented in the Committee of Ways and Means. That is a mistake. I represent none of them.

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman from Vermont suggests that the question of increasing the compensation of General Spinner is not involved in this discussion. I believe, myself, that there are infinitely stronger arguments in favor of increasing his salary than there are in favor of increasing any of these other salaries.

The question was taken on Mr. WASHBURN's amendment, and it was rejected.

Mr. BLOW. I move to amend the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. PRICE], HOLMAN,] by increasing the salary of the sub-Treasurer at New York to $7,500. I desire to say a few words only in reference to the agent of the Treasury at the city of St. Louis. If there is no assay office there there ought to be. As to the agent of the Treasury, I have this much to say: that officer, some months ago, resigned his position, simply because the salary was not a sufficient inducement for him to hold the office and incur the responsibility of paying out $130,000,000 per annum. After his resignation was tendered, the honorable Secretary of the Treasury tried for months, and we aided him all we could, to procure another equally suitable and competent person to take that position, but he failed in finding a man of that character who would be willing to take the responsible position for a compensation of $4,000 per annum. The consequence is that Mr. Farrell is still the agent of the Treasury at St. Louis, not because he desires to hold the position, but at the special request of the Secretary of the Treasury. I think we have fixed the compensation of these officers very justly, at the moderate sum of $5,000 for the sub-Treasurers at Boston, Philadelphia, and St. Louis.

I can say this much in addition, that in the city of St. Louis (I do not know how it may be in other cities) men are not willing to take these vast responsibilities and give the immense securities required, when the salary of the office is so meager that it will not compensate them for the burden resting upon them.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. The treasurer of the State of Illinois receives a salary of but $800 a year. The present treasurer is a constituent of my colleague, [Mr. Ross,] and I have never heard his integrity questioned. The late treasurer, a constituent of my colleague, [Mr. FARNSWORTH,] performed faithfully the duties of the office for the same salary.

Mr. BLOW. What is his responsibility?

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. It is very great.

Mr. BLOW. How much? Ten millions?

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Well, the responsibility is about a thousand millions, I reckon! [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. Blow] has expired.

The amendment of Mr. HOLMAN was agreed to.

Mr. COLE, of California. I move to amend by inserting after the words "per annum," in the fifth line, the following:

For compensation of Assistant Treasurer at San Francisco, $6,000.

I wish to say, Mr. Chairman, that the present compensation of this officer is but $4,500, which he receives in paper, in a country where gold is the circulating medium. That amount is altogether insufficient to afford him a respectable support for himself and his family. This officer is obliged to give bonds in the sum of $500,000; and the responsibility resting upon him is exceedingly great. He in fact discharges the duties of some three or four officers. He discharges the duties of sub-Treasurer of the United States for that post, and also the duties of treasurer of the Mint of the United States, which, at that place, as is well known, does a great deal of business. Besides that, he is obliged to receive, as depository, all the money that is sent out by the Government for all that coast, and also all the stamps that are used on the Pacific side, and to distribute them to the several States and Territories without any compensation. He is also required to receive subscriptions for the loans of the United States, for which no compensation is paid to him. This proposition for an increase of his salary is certainly a very modest and reasonable request on his behalf.

There is a great deal of complaint on account of the low compensation that this officer receives, and there is a real necessity for its increase to at least the amount which I propose. I hope that the committee will recognize the justice of this application, because it is impossible for a faithful officer to discharge the duties of this office at the present salary, unless, as in the present instance, he does so from pure motives of patriotism.

Mr. SHANNON. Mr. Chairman, while there is a great deal of truth in what my colleague has stated in relation to this officer, I wish to say that, if he will resign his place, there are probably not less than twenty responsible gentlemen who will apply for it immediately and will gladly take it at the present salary, with all its labors and responsibilities; there are probably not less than twenty patriots who will come forward and demand the position.

Mr. COLE, of California. I have no doubt, Mr. Chairman, that there would be hundreds of applicants for the position; but they would not be such men as would be required for the administration of the office.

Mr. SHANNON. Yes, sir; they would be perfectly good men.

The amendment of Mr. COLE, of California, was rejected.

Mr. WILSON. I now move to strike out the entire section. The case which has just been presented by the gentleman from California is no doubt a very meritorious case; but the committee cannot be brought to see it in the light in which he regards it. I have no doubt that there are other cases equally meritorious. Here, for instance, is the case of the gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. MORRILL,] who is a most laborious member of this House, devoting all his time and attention to the public business, and who, I am quite sure, does not receive an adequate compensation in view of the labor which he performs and the value of his services. But, unfortunately, he, like the rest of us, has to bear his proportion of the losses resulting from the present state of war. All public officers must do the same thing. If a dollar in paper will not buy as much as did a dollar in gold before the war, we must all alike bear the consequences of the changed condition of affairs. I therefore hope, sir, that the committee will strike out the entire section of the bill.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. Chairman, the committee may as well determine now whether the Government is to have faithful and competent agents, and we are to pay them an adequate price, or whether we are to have bunglers and swindlers, for it comes to that. It is well known that the late Assistant Treasurer of the United States at New York left his office, although the Government asked and urged him to remain. He found the compensation inadequate to his labors. The Treasurer in his report tells us that he had to make several applications before he could get a competent man to take it, and that with the assurance that he would present his case to Congress for the purpose of an increase of his salary. I have no doubt, sir, that when this Congress adjourns without giving him an increased salary he will go back to the place that he left, where he was receiving $8,000 per annum with much less labor, and there was an offer to increase it in one year to $10,000. The Government then will be left to those poor paupers who seek these places because they can get nothing else to live on—men who are wholly unfitted for these offices. This is a time when skilled men are needed for the service of the Government. We do not want poor creatures who are fit for nothing except to draw their salaries. We need men who are fit for these responsible places. Such men can find employment anywhere at liberal pay, and yet it is proposed that the Government shall take the refuse matter. We cannot get men who are fit for these places at low salaries. In my judgment, sir, there never was a more false economy than paying competent officers niggardly salaries. There was never a more false economy than in trying to get men at low salaries, when those low salaries will not enable us to procure men of ability and skill.

Mr. Chairman, these are not suggestions of the Committee of Ways and Means. They are the suggestions of the heads of the Departments, who say that they cannot carry on the business of the nation in this manner. These are times which require much skill and labor, and unless we can get men in whom we can have confidence we may as well stop altogether. I think, therefore, the opposition made to this section is a mistake. If gentlemen will consult the heads of Departments, and learn the trouble they are put to in order to procure these men, they would think exactly as I do. They have to labor to prevent them from resigning.

I have no doubt that what the gentleman from California has said of the office in San Francisco is true; and that he could find enough of men there, turned out from the mines and canals, who would be willing to take it.

Mr. Chairman, there are as good men as any in this House who are willing to take it at the present salary.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. SPALDING. I move to strike out "seven" and insert "four." I am not prepared to dispute with the gentleman from Pennsylvania the proposition that the class of employes of the national Government provided for in this section are perhaps paid too low for their services. I am not prepared to deny his proposition that ordinarily to command the first-class ability we have to give the first-class pay. But, sir, I do differ with him when he says that this Government must, in its present embarrassment, raise the pay of its employes. And I am not prepared to take a distinction between officers and soldiers of our Army, and officers and sailors of our Navy, who are poorly paid, and these gentlemen who exercise a trust in the office of the sub-Treasury in the different cities. It cannot be unknown to the members of this committee that at this moment every class of employes under our Government are pressing upon us applications for increase of pay, and upon the same grounds now stated by my friend from Pennsylvania, that they cannot live upon their monthly pay and salaries.

Why, sir, the Committee on Naval Affairs, of which I have the honor to be a member, is now overburdened with applications from every part of every department of the naval service for increased pay; and I understand that the Committee on Military Affairs is pressed in the same way. We know that the officers and men in the Army and Navy ask for increased pay. If any class of our citizens be heard they should be heard in regard to an increase of pay for their services. But it is not confined to them, for all the clerks in all the Departments here in Washington are making an attack upon this Congress for an increase of their compensation. Now, it becomes this committee at this point to determine whether the Government is prepared with money to answer these repeated demands now made upon it. Why, sir, if I understand the condition of things correctly, it is with difficulty that we pay from quarter to quarter the soldiers we have now under arms in the field. Is it not so? Are there not millions of suspended accounts now in the Treasury Department, and are we prepared to swamp the Treasury at once, by casting upon it, in the shape of increased pay to the employes of the Government, I do not know how many hundreds of millions more, but hundreds of millions it must be?

I object, in the first instance, to any increased pay; and I intend to follow up that course until I find a disposition in the House to enlarge salaries, and when they do that, I am for taking down the bars and letting all come in. And what will be the consequence?

Mr. BROOKS. I did not intend to say anything upon this subject, nor do I intend now to extend my remarks beyond that of the sub-Treasurer of New York. Seven thousand dollars, I know, is an enormous salary in the estimation of many gentlemen who live where such salaries are not common. But in the city of New York, salaries of $25,000 a year are given to parties having far less responsibility than the sub-Treasurer at New York. This is an office which must be given to a rich man. It is not an office for a poor man. It is an office which no poor man can possibly have, for at the start he is obliged to give bonds to the amount of $400,000; and no poor man can give such a bond unless he has some preliminary arrangement outside to steal more than the amount of the bond. There are hundreds of men in New York who would take the greatest pleasure in giving this $400,000 bond, give $1,000,000 for the position of the New York sub-Treasurer for a single year. I could furnish a regiment of such applicants for office; but in order to obtain the right sort of a man a salary must necessarily be given him corresponding to that which is given in like cases in other employments. When the incomes of men border upon a million a year, it is not to be expected that such men will desire to take the office of sub-Treasurer at $7,000 a year. And therefore the Department had exceeding difficulty in obtaining a man of so high a character as the gentleman who now holds that office.

Gentlemen from the interior must not estimate their salaries in the interior by the salaries which are necessarily given in New York city. Many men in the interior obtain their butter, for example, for twenty, thirty, and forty cents a pound, and the farmer makes a profit by making it at fifteen cents a pound. We in New York are obliged to pay seventy and seventy-five cents a pound for it; and eggs, and everything else, are high in proportion. The rent of a house, respectable for a man entrusted with such a high office, would absorb fully one half of the salary we propose to give. Gentlemen must bear in mind that a new system of administration of the Government has been established since the war broke out. The sub-Treasury of New York has become a great national banking institution, and disburses directly or indirectly, in some form or other, by exchange or otherwise, $1,000,000,000 annually; and the Assistant Treasurer handles, in all probability, a far greater sum of money than would be necessary to carry on the pecuniary administration of this Government. We have voted to-day $3,700,000 for the mere printing of this money which the Assistant Treasurer of New York has more or less to handle. Our appropriations for the great Mint at Philadelphia are only $150,000 in this bill, while the appropriation for the paper money which runs through the hands more or less of the Assistant Treasurer of New York—

Mr. MORRILL. Of course the gentleman from New York does not mean to misstate anything, but we have not appropriated any such sum as he states for the mere printing. It includes the whole expense of the loans, paper, and a large number of other items.

Mr. BROOKS. There was an appropriation in the bill of over two million dollars, and the gentleman has offered an amendment which we have passed appropriating $1,100,000 more.

Mr. MORRILL. That includes the expense of adhesive stamps and other things.

Mr. BROOKS. Well, that is merely an incidental topic. I am desirous of sustaining the position taken by the gentleman from Vermont that this is hardly an adequate salary. I am quite sure the House cannot do better than vote this sum.

Mr. SPALDING. I withdraw my amendment to the amendment.

Mr. ARNOLD. I renew the amendment, so that my remarks may be in order. I hope the motion of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. Wilson] will prevail. I think we may as well meet this question of the increase of salaries and of compensation at once. If, however, that motion shall not prevail, I shall then move to insert the city of Chicago among these other places where the compensation is increased. I know that the person who discharges the duties of this office there receives only $1,400 compensation, and he is responsible for more than $100,000,000 per annum which passes through his hands. Of course the compensation is entirely inadequate, and the disparity between the value of the services rendered and the compensation given can be no greater in New York, or Boston, or Philadelphia, or anywhere in the United States. There is no officer under the Government who discharges as responsible duties, in my judgment, for such small compensation; and yet, in the present condition of the finances of the country, there is patriotism enough there to enable the Government to obtain a competent man to discharge the duties of that office at the present rate of compensation, and I believe there is patriotism enough everywhere to discharge the duties of these offices.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. Brooks] refers to the large yearly incomes of gentlemen living in the city of New York, and he says there are plenty of men there who would be willing to take the office for the sake of the stealings of the office. I would like to know if there is not some patriotic wealthy man in New York who would take the office at such a time as this and discharge its duties for the compensation now allowed by law, and for the honor and distinction of serving the country at the present time. I believe that you can obtain at the present rate of compensation competent men to discharge the duties of all these offices, and that an increase of compensation is entirely unnecessary. It is not pretended that men in the employment of the Government are adequately paid in these times. There is scarcely a high officer in the Army or a man in high civil position, who is paid an adequate pecuniary compensation for the services which he is now rendering; but we do not see patriotic soldiers or civilians leaving the public service at such an hour because their compensation is too small. We do not see distinguished members of this House retiring because their compensation is inadequate. I trust, sir, that the House will to-day indicate, by rejecting this entire section, an indisposition to increase the salaries of civil officers.

Mr. MORRILL. The gentleman from Illinois has made a conclusive argument against the amendment which he says he will offer hereafter, and hence it is not necessary for me to refer to it.

Mr. Chairman, "facts are stubborn things." We cannot resist the evidence that we have tried low salaries in some of these places and they have been found insufficient to accomplish the purposes of the Government. We know from actual experiment that the requisite ability and experience cannot be had in the city of New York for the salary that we have heretofore paid. In the face of this evidence I do not believe it wise on the part of the committee to go on and legislate so that we shall have no competent officers in these places. I believe in keeping the fountains pure at their source.

What are the facts? Since the commencement of this rebellion not a dollar has been lost through frauds in these sub-Treasuries. That is not our experience in the past history of the country. It is well known that the sub-Treasurer at New York has a large force under his command and is made responsible for them. Some days they have to receive and pay out not less than $20,000,000 in a single day. To be sure, a large portion of this is in paper. But on some days it is very large, amounting to millions in absolute coin. If one of his clerks take a counterfeit note, or a spurious coin, the sub-Treasurer alone is responsible. It is a very difficult matter to carry on operations of such a gigantic nature, and to have them always come out without the loss of a dollar.

Under these circumstances I trust that the House will act with its usual judgment. It is a separate and distinct question from that of raising salaries generally; and I am glad to see so much evidence on the part of members that we will rather undertake to improve the currency and make it more valuable to the men who have salaries, and to our officers and soldiers in the field, than to go upon the principle of a general increase of salaries throughout the country.

Mr. ARNOLD. I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I move a pro forma amendment in order that I may say why I shall vote for the proposal of the Committee of Ways and Means. In the first place it is my habit to follow that committee with only about half an eye open; and in this particular case my eyes have been opened wide by the debate that has sprung up on the proposition. I am opposed to any increase of salaries that have heretofore been fixed at a proper rate for the services performed, where that increase is asked because of the depreciation of the currency or the increase of the nominal value of articles. I thought at the last session, and I think now, that the remedy for the evil is in remedying the currency and not in increasing salaries. I will vote for any measure that tends to reduce the volume of the currency and thereby add to its value; but I shall not vote to increase any salary merely because it is insufficient by reason of the depreciation of the currency.

Mr. WILSON. Will the gentleman from Maryland permit me to make a remark here?

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. Certainly.

Mr. WILSON. The gentleman will be inconsistent with this section of the bill, because it is provided that the increased compensation authorized shall not continue in force for more than two years from the 4th of March next. I presume the Committee of Ways and Means expects to return to specie payments before then.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. Or the Committee of Ways and Means may suppose that the war will be ended and the extraordinary expenses of the Government reduced within such a volume as that less compensation will procure adequate business talent to perform the duties. One hypothesis is as legitimate as the other; and either is only hypothesis. The reason for the increase asked here is this: you must have business men to transact the business of the Government. The patriotism of the people may very well be called upon in every legitimate form to support the Government; but you do not anywhere else rely on the patriotism of the people to fill the offices of the Government. If you are to transact business you must have business capacity, and pay for it at business rates. Now, the amount of business cast on this particular officer has no just proportion to the compensation paid him in comparison with the salaries paid for like services in the ordinary business of the country. This is not the increase of an inadequate salary, become inadequate because of the depreciation of the currency, but it is the increase of a salary inadequate on its original basis, and therefore requiring to be increased.

For these reasons, Mr. Chairman, I shall vote for the proposition of the Committee of Ways and Means. In my judgment a responsible officer will save a thousand-fold his salary every year, whereas an incompetent man, by mere errors, bungling, and stupidity, to say nothing of possible cheating, will cost the Government ten times his salary every year. I withdraw my amendment.

The amendment of Mr. WILSON, to strike out the second section, was not agreed to; there being on a division—ayes 43, noes 51.

Mr. WILSON. I will not call for tellers on this question, if it be understood that we shall have an opportunity to take a vote on the question in the House.

Mr. MORRILL. I shall have no objection to that, because I shall move to reinsert the section as it was originally, except in one particular, and that will give the gentleman the opportunity he desires.

Mr. ARNOLD. I now move to amend by inserting, "the salary of the Assistant Treasurer at Chicago shall be $4,000." The salary of that officer is now $1,400. I ask the gentleman from Vermont to give his assent to this amendment.

Mr. MORRILL. I cannot give such assent. There has been no action of the committee on this subject.

Mr. ARNOLD. An increase of this salary was repeatedly recommended by the late Secretary of the Treasury. I could, were it necessary, have read to the House a communication from the late Secretary of the Treasury recommending an increase of this salary. There is no case anywhere of such inadequacy of salary with reference to the amount of labor and the responsibility. This office was created and the salary fixed when Chicago was a village of five or ten thousand inhabitants, with no considerable commerce. It has now grown to be one of the largest cities in the Union, and this officer at that point now has the responsibility of receiving and paying out hundreds of millions of dollars per annum. Because he has not been persistently demanding an increase of salary certainly he should not be made the victim of an unjust discrimination, when an increase of compensation is given to the Assistant Treasurers at New York, Boston, and St. Louis. I say with the utmost confidence that in no one of the cities where the salary is increased is there so great a disparity between the labor and the responsibility on the one hand and the salary on the other, as there is in the case of this officer in the city of Chicago. He has not been dogging the heels of the Committee of Ways and Means, urging an increase of his pay; but if an increase should be made anywhere, it should certainly be made in the case of this most meritorious officer, who has not been persistent in demanding an increase, but has faithfully attended to the discharge of his duties. I hope, therefore, that this amendment will be adopted.

Mr. MILLER, of New York. Mr. Chairman, I cannot vote for the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. ARNOLD,] and I hope that the House will hereafter adopt the proposition of the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. WILSON,] to strike out the whole section.

Mr. ARNOLD. If this amendment be adopted I will cheerfully vote with the gentleman to strike out the whole section.

Mr. MILLER, of New York. I wish to say, Mr. Chairman, that I cannot see why the argument pressed by the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. DAVIS,] will not apply to every other case in which we are asked to increase salaries. Have not the labors of every head of a Department or bureau increased during this war? Have not the labors of every civil officer increased? These officers are all asking, with one accord, for an increase of salary. If we allow an increase in this instance we must of necessity allow it in every other. This matter does not involve simply the increase of $2,000 asked in this case; it involves the question whether we shall add millions of dollars to the expenses of the Government by increasing the salaries of all our public officers. For if we adopt the increase in one case it will be brought forward as a precedent for an increase in numerous other cases—a precedent the force of which we cannot consistently deny.

I am not surprised, as some gentlemen appear to be, that, in our efforts to check the increase of expenditures we do not get assistance from gentlemen on the other side of the House. We all understand that when the slavery question shall be removed from our discussions the questions attracting the public attention will be chiefly of a financial nature. We are going to be met with the cry of "economy in our expenditures." We cannot expect gentlemen on that side of the House to stay our course when we are rushing on this rock of extravagance. I do not expect it; and I am not surprised to find that gentlemen on that side of the House are willing to assist members on this side to increase salaries. I expect that in a few days there will come from that side of the House a proposition to increase the pay of our soldiers and our sailors; and it is to be seen how that proposition will be met. When I have been appealed to by clerks from my own district to vote for an increase of salaries, I have said to them, "I cannot do it;" and I have told them, "There are three or four thousand patriotic men from my district, who are not only serving their country, but facing their country's enemies; and the salaries of these men should be increased first; but I do not believe that the situation of our Treasury will allow even that." And can we resist that when we vote for this increase? Not at all. Men who are holding office under the Government are suffering as men are suffering who are living upon salaries all over the country; no more and no less.

Everybody in this time is living economically. Everybody at this time is suffering from the increased price of everything throughout the country. Everybody is suffering from the increased cost of living. And when men are patriotically bearing the expenses of taxation and patriotically living upon small salaries all over the country, is it a time to increase the salaries of the employes of the Government? I know that these men when they are applicants for office profess a great deal of patriotism, and I think that they can bear the present salary when they have tried so hard to get the places in the first instance. I shall vote against any increase of salary; but I will say the first increase I can be induced to vote for is when gentlemen on the other side shall propose to increase the pay of our officers and soldiers and sailors.

Mr. KERNAN. I move to amend the amendment by making it $3,500, in order to say a few words. I am a good deal surprised that my colleague from New York, whose remarks were made apparently with a view to an effect elsewhere, should, in view of the enormous expenditures which have been made of the public money, rise in his place here and charge that it is because we on this side of the House will not help them on that side to do what is right. I am a very young member upon this floor, but I remember one occasion when we on this side of the House endeavored to oppose some measure—it was the measure which afterward failed in the other House—I mean the confiscation bill—and its failure showed that we were right although it was forced through this House by members on the other side. On that occasion, sir, we were told, and I will give substantially what was said, that we on this side had better confine ourselves to our legitimate business, the business for which we were sent here, of embarrassing and opposing, as the people trusted, that side of the House. And the House will remember that they said that they would take care of the Government which had been intrusted to them. We on this side have submitted on all occasions. What did we find to be the case? That it was fatal, almost, to any measure to have it come from this side of the House.

We were not able to get anything through. What then, Mr. Chairman, were we to do? We were told by members on that side that this was not the time for economy when we proposed to reduce appropriations, that seemed too large. All we could do then was, when members on that side endeavored to cut down what we believed to be larger expenditures than were necessary, to help them, as we were not allowed any chance of success if we proposed to do so ourselves.

The gentleman from New York says that he would ask what encouragement we had given. Why, sir, at this very Congress there has been an appropriation of $108,000 for furniture for the Treasury building; and yet the other day, when I endeavored to strike out $15,000 of that amount in order to show the disapproval of Congress of such extravagant expenditures, I could scarcely raise a friend to support me except on my own side of the House.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. How many members on the gentleman's side of the House voted with him?

Mr. KERNAN. I believe that they all voted with me, and that that side voted the other way.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. No, sir; I voted with the gentleman.

Mr. KERNAN. I give the gentleman credit; and I am glad to know there are men on that side who vote with us against extravagant expenditures. But I do not want the insinuation to go out, as it is an unjust one, that we would not help them, and were therefore responsible. I have remained here during the action on this long bill, and have voted on all occasions for the reduction of extravagant appropriations; and this side has voted in the same way.

Mr. MORRILL. As I believe this debate is wandering from the bill, I move that the committee rise for the purpose of terminating the debate upon the whole bill, unless unanimous consent be given to take the question.

Mr. KERNAN. I withdraw my amendment to the amendment.

Mr. HOLMAN. I desire to offer an amendment to this section.

Mr. MORRILL. You can offer it.

Mr. HOLMAN. I want to explain it.

Mr. MORRILL. I insist upon my motion.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. Dawes reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had under consideration the special order, being House bill No. 649, making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1866, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. MORRILL. I move that all debate upon the special order in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union be terminated in two minutes after the committee resumes the consideration thereof.

Mr. HOLMAN. I suggest that the gentleman makes it ten minutes.

Mr. MORRILL. I will modify my motion according to that suggestion.

The motion was agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT OVER.

Mr. STILES. I move that when the House adjourns it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

The motion was not agreed to.

LEGISLATIVE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. MORRILL. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

So the rules were suspended; and the House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. Dawes in the chair,) and resumed, as a special order, the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 649) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending 30th of June, 1866; the question being on the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. ARNOLD.]

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I move to amend the amendment of my colleague by reducing the amount to $3,500. I do this not merely for the purpose of opposing the amendment of my colleague, for if any of these gentlemen are entitled to have their compensation increased, this officer at Chicago is as much entitled to it as any of them, but it seems that he has not been sufficiently in the ring to get into this combination for increasing salaries. But what I more particularly desired to say is that it does seem to me that this attempt to increase the salaries of these high officers is most impudent and atrocious.

Mr. THAYER. The gentleman talks about rings being formed for raising salaries, and pronounces the effort impudent and atrocious. Now, as one of the gentlemen who is to be affected by this proposed increase of salaries is a resident of my district, I desire to know whether the gentleman has any reason for supposing that he is in the ring.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. He is certainly in the ring of this section, which rings of an increase of salaries.

Mr. THAYER. Then the gentleman does not mean to impute anything improper by his language.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. No, sir; not at all. I do not propose to indulge in any attack upon the character of these men; but I do repeat that I think the commencement of increasing salaries at this end of the route, beginning with high officers, is a most impudent and atrocious thing. There are some branches of our Army that have not been paid for nearly six months. A few days ago I received a letter from an officer in command at New Orleans, in which he informed me that the paymaster had not been there for nearly six months. Here are soldiers drawing only sixteen dollars a month, and exposing their lives to danger and death, and no complaint comes from this Committee of Ways and Means that they are not receiving enough; there is no proposition to increase their pay. But when these men who, the gentleman from New York [Mr. Brooks] says, have an income of $1,000,000 a year, come and ask for an increase of their salaries, behold they must have it.

Why, sir, if these gentlemen in New York who are demanding an increase of their salaries have an income of $1,000,000 a year, it seems to me they are engaged in a very small business in demanding of us an increase of one, two, or three thousand dollars a year. Why, I am astonished at the declaration which has been made here that you cannot get competent men to fill these offices unless you increase the compensation. Who has ever resigned? When, sir, has there been more than one instance under this Administration of an officer resigning because of the inadequacy of his salary? Not at all. The men who deserve an increase of salary are the men who cannot resign, who are mustered into the service, and who if they attempt to resign are put under arrest; they are the poor men, the men who are exposing their lives every day, and what will not a man give in exchange for his life?

Mr. HOLMAN. I very cordially concur in the views expressed by the gentleman from Illinois, while I am not in favor of his amendment. We upon this side of the House shall be very happy to cooperate with him in behalf of justice to a class of persons who cannot get out of the service.

But in connection with this subject I desire to bring to the attention of the House a proposition which will accomplish a great act of justice on the part of this House; and I am happy to believe that the ruling of the Chair will enable that proposition to come before the House as a contingency for carrying on a Department of the Government. I ask that my amendment may be read. It is in the nature of a limitation upon this appropriation.

The Clerk read the amendment, as follows:

Add to section two the following:

And provided further, That the appropriation made by this act shall be on the condition that every private soldier who shall have enlisted in any regiment or battery previously organized, with the distinct assurance given at the time of the enlistment by the recruiting officer, or by the Governor of the State where the enlistment was made, that he should be mustered out of service with the regiment or battery in which he enlisted, shall, upon his application, be mustered out of the service with such regiment or battery, in accordance with such assurance; or if the regiment or battery shall have been mustered out such soldier shall be forthwith discharged, anything in the mustering-in roll of such soldier to the contrary notwithstanding; and the Secretary of War shall, subject to the approval of the President of the United States, adopt the proper rules as to proofs of such enlistment necessary to carry this provision into effect.

Mr. MORRILL. I cannot raise a point of order upon that amendment. I presume the gentleman having got in his Buncombe speech, does not care to press it.

Mr. HOLMAN. I do care a great deal about it.

Mr. MORRILL. I make the point of order that the amendment is not germane to the bill, and is independent legislation.

Mr. HOLMAN. It is a limitation upon the appropriation, and provides for one of the Departments of the Government that comes within the ruling of the Chair already made.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. HOLMAN. I must appeal from that decision of the Chair most respectfully. The amendment certainly comes within the ruling made by the Chair since this bill has been under consideration.

The question was taken on the appeal, and the decision of the Chair was sustained as the judgment of the committee.

Mr. SCHENCK. Is there any time remaining for debate?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks there is about one minute left.

Several MEMBERS. Two minutes.

Mr. SCHENCK. As I propose to vote in favor of the amendment to strike out this whole provision, I desire to explain in a few words why I shall do so.

I believe that such is the condition of the currency of the country, such the embarrassments of the Treasury, and such the necessity for the appropriation of our means to the carrying on of this war, that in the present state of affairs, however meritorious the application, we cannot increase generally the salaries of the officers of the Government throughout the country. I believe that there are very few of the present officers of the Government, civil or military, who are not compelled to be exceedingly frugal to live at all within the means that we give them for that purpose; but if we commence at all, we must go through with the whole list; and I am very unwilling to commence with gentlemen who are receiving comparatively large salaries, however inadequate they may be, who by living a little more closely to the wind, a little more frugally, can manage to get on, if at the same time we deny an increase to the clerks here and the lieutenants and others in the Army who cannot possibly live upon the means that we furnish them.

[Here the hammer fell, the time allowed by the resolution of the House for debate on the bill having expired.]

Mr. ARNOLD. I will accept the amendment of my colleague, establishing the salary of the sub-Treasurer at Chicago at $3,500.

The question was taken on Mr. ARNOLD's amendment as modified, and it was rejected.

Mr. MORRILL. I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill to the House.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. DAWES reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, as a special order, had under consideration House bill No. 649, making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1866, and had directed him to report the same back to the House with sundry amendments.

SENATE BILLS REFERRED.

Mr. SCHENCK. I ask the gentleman from Vermont to give way to me a moment.

Mr. MORRILL. Certainly.

Mr. SCHENCK. Joint resolutions giving the thanks of Congress to General Terry and Admiral Porter have just arrived from the Senate. I move that they be taken from the Speaker's table, and referred respectively to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Committee on Naval Affairs.

There being no objection, joint resolution (S. No. 98) to present the thanks of Congress to Major General Alfred H. Terry and the officers and men under his command, and joint resolution (S. No. 99) tendering the thanks of Congress to Rear Admiral David D. Porter, and to the officers, petty officers, seamen, and marines under his command for their gallantry and good conduct in the recent capture of Fort Fisher, were taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time, and referred: the former to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, and the latter to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

The House resumed the consideration of House bill No. 649, making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1866.

Mr. MORRILL. I move to strike out the last section of the bill, as follows:

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the compensation of the Treasurer of the United States be, and the same is hereby, fixed at $6,000 per annum; the compensation of the Assistant Treasurer at New York at $6,000 per annum, and the salaries of the Assistant Treasurers at Philadelphia, Boston, and St. Louis at $5,000 per annum each, to commence from the 4th day of March next; and the amount necessary to pay the same for the current and next fiscal year be, and the same is hereby, appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated: Provided, That the increased compensation authorized by this section shall continue in force for two years from the 4th day of March next, and no longer.

And to insert in lieu thereof the following:

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the compensation of the Treasurer of the United States be, and the same is hereby, fixed at $6,000 per annum; the compensation of the Assistant Treasurer at New York at $7,000 per annum; and the salaries of the Assistant Treasurers at Philadelphia, Boston, and St. Louis, at $5,000 per annum each, to commence from the 4th day of March next; and the amount necessary to pay the same for the current and next fiscal year be, and the same is hereby, appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated: Provided, That the increased compensation authorized by this section shall continue in force for two years from the 4th day of March next, and no longer: And provided further, That nothing herein contained shall be construed as increasing the annual compensation of the Treasurer of the Mint, ex officio Assistant Treasurer of the United States at Philadelphia, beyond $5,000 for his services as Treasurer of the Mint and as Assistant Treasurer.

Mr. WILSON. I hope that substitute will be allowed to go in without a contest, and then the House can take a vote on striking out the whole section.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the substitute being incorporated in the bill as the original text?

Mr. HOLMAN. I object.

Mr. MORRILL. The section is modified in the last proviso, in order that the Assistant Treasurer at Philadelphia shall not from any construction of the law receive a double salary.

Mr. ARNOLD. Will the gentleman from Vermont modify it by inserting a provision for the Assistant Treasurer at Chicago?

Mr. MORRILL. I would be glad to do so, but I am not at liberty, as I am acting under the direction of the Committee of Ways and Means. Besides I do not see that we would gain anything by it, for the gentleman from Illinois has already announced that he will vote against it, whether that is on or out.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. The gentleman from Vermont agreed that if his substitute was accepted we should have a vote on striking out the section as amended. By that means those who are opposed to this increase of salaries would get the opportunity they desire, and we would save a good deal of time.

Mr. HOLMAN. The objection to that is that in the section as amended by the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, the salary of the Assistant Treasurer at New York is fixed at $6,000, whereas the substitute fixes it at $7,000. If the House were not to strike out the section as it now is, that salary would remain at $6,000; but if the substitute of the gentleman from Vermont were allowed to be incorporated as the original text, and were not to be stricken out, that salary would be $7,000.

Mr. MORRILL. I must insist that this is not the same question as the general question of raising salaries throughout the country. I make the point that this increase is represented, by the proper organ of the Government, to be indispensable to the conduct of this Department. I know that at New York, the only city where the salary of this officer has been reduced by the action of the Committee of the Whole, the officer is one of experience, tact, and skill, who saves to the Government daily more than the amount of his salary. I think it, therefore, the part of wisdom that we should consent, not to an extravagant salary, but to make it what it ought to be, considering the vast amount of business that is done at that office.

Mr. GARFIELD. I hope that the amendment in relation to dry plate printing in the Treasury Department will not be adopted by the House. I will not enter into an argument of the case, but I will simply state a few facts. It has been stated here that vast sums of money are being expended in the Treasury Department for an experiment—an experiment which has been a failure. Now, sir, I hold in my hand the report made by the investigating committee last fall; and on page 360 is a letter from the late Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Chase, in regard to the cost of printing money under that system, and, indeed, in regard to the whole cost of printing in the Treasury Department. That letter of the Secretary of the Treasury and other documents show conclusively that the cost of this printing is more than one hundred per cent. more when done by bank-note companies than when done in the Treasury Department.

Mr. WILSON. I desire to ask the gentleman whether, in the statement submitted by the Secretary of the Treasury, the entire cost of printing is not included, whereas the amendment to which the gentlemen refers relates only to the experiment with the hydrostatic press.

Mr. GARFIELD. Certainly. If the gentleman had waited, I should have come to that.

Now, sir, the cost of printing in the Treasury Department, as given in these tables, includes the entire outlay for hydrostatic presses. The expense of large and heavy machines, now thrown aside as worthless, is included in the cost. Yet, notwithstanding all this, the cost of printing is not so great, by one to three hundred per cent., as it was when done under contract by the bank-note companies of New York.

In regard to the dry plate printing, to which the gentleman has referred, the committee did report that the machinery was very heavy and expensive, that the experiment had not yet been completed, and that they could not recommend the system on the score of economy. It seemed to us to be an expensive experiment and one of doubtful success. But since that time the experiment has proved highly successful. I think there can scarcely be found an instance of so marked a success in any branch of mechanical ingenuity as this experiment in dry plate printing. If the gentleman will visit the Treasury Department he will find that printing is there executed far faster by this method than by the old method; and not only faster, but far better. The printing is executed in such a way as to afford almost an absolute security against counterfeiting. Within the past few months one of the most accomplished engineers of England has visited the printing establishment of the Treasury Department, and he declares the printing machinery now in use there to be a master-piece of skill in mechanics. And I am informed to-day by a gentleman on this floor that Professor Agassiz, who has witnessed the operation of that machinery within the past week, pronounces it one of the wonders of the age—one of the marvels of mechanical science.

These facts, which have come to light since the committee made their report, constitute, I think, a triumphant vindication of the genius of the man who has perfected this mechanism, whatever may be said against his personal character. I hope that these facts will convince the House of the impropriety of retaining an amendment which would throw a reflection upon the whole system.

Mr. PRICE. As the gentleman was a member of the committee charged with the investigation in reference to the printing of bills, I wish to ask him what is the cost per thousand for printing?

Mr. GARFIELD. I will read from the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury, which I hold in my hand:

"The cost per $1,000 of five-cent fractional currency."

Mr. PRICE. That is not the question. I wish to know the cost per thousand of printing the bank bills?

Mr. GARFIELD. The cost of printing the bank bills has nothing to do with dry plate printing. I beg to remind the gentleman that I am speaking on the subject of dry plate printing, and the fractional currency is the only kind of currency printed in that way.

Mr. PRICE. The question under consideration involves the printing of the bank bills as well as the fractional currency.

Mr. GARFIELD. It does not. Dry plate printing is used only in producing fractional currency. It has, therefore, nothing to do with bank bills. Dry plate printing is what is now under consideration.

Mr. PRICE. I repeat the question—the gentleman has been on the committee and can answer it—what is the cost of printing bank bills per thousand impressions?

Mr. GARFIELD. I can tell the gentleman, but that is not germane to the subject under consideration at all. I will tell the gentleman after awhile.

Mr. PRICE. I prefer to have my question answered now.

Mr. GARFIELD. And I prefer, as I am upon the floor, to consider the question pertinently and in my own way.

I ask the attention of the House to what I shall read from a letter of the Secretary of the Treasury:

"The cost per $1,000 of five-cent fractional currency has been $24.59; postage currency, $38.77. The cost per $1,000 of ten-cent fractional currency has been $12.29; postage currency, $29.38. The cost per $1,000 of twenty-five-cent fractional currency has been $6.14; postage currency, $14.69. The cost per $1,000 of fifty-cent fractional currency has been $3.03; postage currency, $7.34.

"The whole amount of postage currency furnished by the bank-note companies has been $20,192,956; the number of impressions 6,680,364, and their cost $393,548.99. The whole amount of fractional currency furnished in the Department to the 2d day of June, 1864, was $6,934,691; the number of impressions, 1,681,856, and their cost, $50,930.10.

"A production corresponding in face, value, and numbers, with that of the bank-note companies would cost in the Department, as nearly as can be estimated, $158,571.89."

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I ask the gentleman to answer the question whether it did not cost over $300,000 to print $312,000 under this experiment?

Mr. GARFIELD. I expect that the first sheet of the postage currency cost $200,000, provided they had only printed that single sheet. It would have cost that amount if they had printed only one sheet and had charged to that sheet all the expense of getting up the necessary machinery. It would indeed be a costly sheet that on its face was worth only two dollars and would cost the Government nearly a quarter of a million of dollars. But, sir, that is not the way to estimate the cost of printing.

Mr. DAWES. I ask the gentleman from Ohio whether he approves of an arrangement by which the head of a bureau who makes the contract is permitted to be a part owner of the patent under which the printing is done?

Mr. GARFIELD. In the first place, Mr. Speaker, I was not aware that any such arrangement had been made. If there is any such arrangement I most certainly do not approve of it.

Mr. DAWES. Does it not appear in the report of the committee of investigation?

Mr. GARFIELD. There was nothing in the report concerning the patent.

Mr. DAWES. I do not speak so much of the report as the evidence taken before the committee.

Mr. GARFIELD. That is not involved in this case.

Mr. DAWES. I thought the gentleman had his own opinion on the subject.

Mr. GARFIELD. I have given my opinion.

Mr. DAWES. What is the gentleman's opinion on the point I make, that the head of the bureau who makes the contract for printing is a part owner of the patent for the new kind of paper on which it is done.

Mr. GARFIELD. If that statement is true it does not seem to me to be a proper arrangement. But that is not the question before the House. I am ready at any time to be led into a general debate concerning this whole report. The subject before the House is, shall we condemn in this bill the new mode of printing our public securities? Shall we condemn it here and now?

Mr. DAWES. I say that it is pertinent to the gentleman's argument that we shall limit this appropriation, and stop the application of the money of the Treasury to experiments to be made under the superintendence of the head of the bureau, so long as he acts in the double capacity of making the contract and owning the patent about which the contract is made.

Mr. MORRILL. I can yield no further for this discussion. I ask unanimous consent to make a correction.

Mr. ROSS. I object.

Mr. MORRILL. I move, then, an amendment.

When the proposition was adopted by which the binding of the Congressional Globe was transferred to the Globe office, I moved a larger deduction than should have been made. I want now to make the proper deduction of $18,600, so as to leave the appropriation $55,111.24; and on that amendment, and the bill and amendments, I call the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put; and under the operation thereof all the amendments recommended by the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, together with those offered in the House, were agreed to, with the exception of those indicated below.

Second amendment reported from the Committee of the Whole:

On page 6, line one hundred and eleven, insert after the appropriation for the Congressional Globe the words:

And to pay the publishers for binding the same, $48,800.

Mr. A. W. CLARK. Debate is not in order strictly, but I ask unanimous consent to make a remark or two.

Leave was granted.

Mr. A. W. CLARK. That appropriation, under a misapprehension of facts, was made greater in amount than was necessary. That amount of appropriation covers both the printing and binding. The Superintendent of Public Printing called upon me and stated that the appropriation was very much larger than was necessary to do the work at the Government printing office. The attention of the proprietors of the Globe was called to the matter, and they informed me that the $48,800 covers the whole expense of printing and binding. The Public Printer desired me to state to the House that the expense of binding at the Government office was ninety cents a volume; and I find by taking these figures that the binding, as proposed at the Globe office, would cost perhaps one dollar a volume. The Public Printer also informs me that the facilities for binding in his office are entirely adequate to all the wants of the Government. He asks, therefore, that the binding should be retained where it is now, and that this amount should not be deducted from the item of the bill making appropriation for binding public documents.

Mr. MORRILL. This amendment was introduced into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union with a statement that the Government printing office was utterly unable to bind and deliver this work in proper season; that the volumes have been withheld ever since last session from members, and that they have not yet received them. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] stated that the proprietors of the Globe were willing to bind these volumes for the same price that it cost at the Government office, and that they would deliver the work in ninety days after the close of each session. I have already offered an amendment diminishing the amount appropriated for binding public documents by only $18,600, instead of $48,600.

Mr. NORLE. I will remark that I made the statement that the Globe proprietors would do the work for the same price that it cost at the Government office, and that they would deliver the work in ninety days after the close of each session, and I made it by authority.

Mr. A. W. CLARK. In reply to the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] I will state that the cost at the Government office is ninety cents per volume; and that the Globe people propose to do it at the same price. They authorized me to make that statement to the House. The Public Printer is now delivering the entire set to the House. He has forwarded the binding with all his energy, and he says his facilities for binding are greater than that of any other establishment, and asks that the work may remain where it is now. One argument used upon the part of the Globe office is the safe delivery of the Globes. The printing office is now held responsible for the same. The work has been done well, and as promptly as it could have been done by any other binding establishment in this city.

The amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL. As this first amendment fails the other amendment on the same subject ought to fall with it. I will withdraw my amendment to diminish the sum appropriated for public printing by the amount of $18,600, if there be no objection.

There was no objection, and the amendment was withdrawn.

The amendment recommended by the Committee of the Whole, to diminish the amount appropriated for public binding by $48,600, was also disagreed to.

Sixteenth amendment:

Strike out section two, as follows:

And be it further enacted, That the compensation of the Treasurer of the United States be, and the same is hereby, fixed at $6,000 per annum; the compensation of the Assistant Treasurer at New York at $6,000 per annum, and the salaries of the Assistant Treasurers at Philadelphia, Boston, and St. Louis, at $5,000 per annum each, to commence from the 4th day of March next; and the amount necessary to pay the same for the current and next fiscal year be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated: Provided, That the increased compensation authorized by this section shall continue in force for two years from the 4th day of March next, and no longer.

And insert in lieu thereof the following:

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the compensation of the Treasurer of the United States be, and the same is hereby, fixed at $6,000 per annum; the compensation of the Assistant Treasurer at New York at $7,000 per annum, and the salaries of the Assistant Treasurers at Philadelphia, Boston, and St. Louis, at $5,000 per annum each, to commence from the 4th day of March next; and the amount necessary to pay the same for the current and next fiscal year be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated: Provided, That the increased compensation authorized by this section shall continue in force for two years from the 4th day of March next, and no longer: And provided further, That nothing herein contained shall be construed as increasing the annual compensation of the treasurer of the Mint, ex officio Assistant Treasurer of the United States at Philadelphia, beyond $5,000 for his services as treasurer of the Mint and as Assistant Treasurer.

Mr. MORRILL. I demand the yeas and nays upon that amendment.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The amendment was not agreed to.

The next question recurred upon striking out the second section, as follows:

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the compensation of the Treasurer of the United States be, and the same is hereby, fixed at $6,000 per annum; the compensation of the Assistant Treasurer at New York at $6,000 per annum, and the salaries of the Assistant Treasurers at Philadelphia, Boston, and St. Louis at $5,000 per annum each, to commence from the 4th day of March next; and the amount necessary to pay the same for the current and next fiscal year be, and the same is hereby, appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated: Provided, That the increased compensation authorized by this section shall continue in force for two years from the 4th day of March next, and no longer.

Mr. WILSON demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 78, nays 39, not voting 65; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Ames, Ancona, Arnold, Ashley, Augustus C. Baldwin, John D. Baldwin, Baxter, Blaine, Boutwell, Boyd, Broomall, William G. Brown, Chandler, Clay, Cobb, Cole, Cox, Cravens, Dawes, Dawson, Denison, Dixon, Eckley, Eldridge, Finck, Ganson, Gooch, Grinnell, Hale, Harrington, Benjamin G. Harris, Holman, Ashel W. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Ingersoll, Orlando Kellogg, Kernan, Lazear, Le Blond, Loan, Long, Mallory, Marey, McClurg, McDowell, Middleton, Samuel F. Miller, Amos Myers, Noble, Norton, Orth, Perham, Perry, Price, Samuel J. Randall, William H. Randall, Edward H. Rollins, Ross, Schenck, Scofield, Sloan, Spalding, William G. Steele, Sules, Strouse, Sweet, Townsend, Tracy, Wadsworth, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Wheeler, Williams, Wilson, Windom, and Yeaman—78.

NAYS—Messrs. Beaman, Blow, Brooks, Ambrose W. Clark, Coffroth, Creswell, Henry Winter Davis, Deming, Driggs, Elliot, Frank, Garfield, Hall, Hotchkiss, Jenckes, Julian, Kelley, Francis W. Kellogg, Knox, Littlejohn, Longyear, McAllister, McBride, Moorhead, Morrill, James R. Morris, Leonard Myers, Charles O'Neill, Pike, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Scott, Shannon, Smithers, Stuart, Thayer, Upson, Van Valkenburgh, and Wilder—39.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. James C. Allen, William J. Allen, Anderson, Bailly, Blair, Bliss, Brandegee, James S. Brown, Freeman Clarke, Thomas T. Davis, Donnelly, Dumont, Eden, Edgerton, English, Farnsworth, Glider, Griswold, Harding, Charles M. Harris, Herick, Higby, Hooper, Hulburd, Hutchins, Philip Johnson, William Johnson, Kalfabeck, Kasson, King, Knapp, Law, Marvin, McIndoe, McKinney, William H. Miller, Daniel Morris, Morrissor, Nelson, Odell, John O'Neill, Patterson, Pendleton, Pomeroy, Priyan, Radford, Robinson, Rogers, James S. Rollins, Smith, Starr, John B. Steele, Stevens, Thomas, Voorhees, Ward, Webster, Whaley, Chilton A. White, Joseph W. White, Winfield, Benjamin Wood, Fernando Wood, Woodbridge, and Worthington—65.

So the second section of the bill was struck out.

Pending the roll-call,

Mr. COBB stated that his colleague, Mr. McINDOE, was confined to his room by illness.

Mr. FARNSWORTH stated that he was paired off with Mr. STEVENS.

Mr. A. W. CLARK stated that his colleague,

Mr. HULBURD, had been called home by sickness in his family.

The vote was announced as above recorded.

Mr. ARNOLD moved to reconsider the vote by which the second section of the bill was struck out; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. MORRILL moved the previous question on the passage of the bill.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and under the operation of the previous question the bill was passed.

Mr. MORRILL moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SECOND ASSISTANT SECRETARY OF WAR.

Mr. DEMING. I ask unanimous consent to have taken from the Speaker's table and referred the bill of the Senate authorizing the President to appoint a Second Assistant Secretary of War.

There being no objection, an act (S. No. 385) authorizing the President to appoint a Second Assistant Secretary of War, was taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

GUNBOATS ON THE LAKES.

Mr. COX. I ask unanimous consent to have taken from the Speaker's table and referred the joint resolution of the Senate terminating the treaty as to gunboats on the lakes.

There being no objection, the joint resolution referred to was taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

PROPOSITION TO ADJOURN OVER.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. MORRIS, of Ohio. I move that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

The question was taken, and the motion was not agreed to.

RAILROAD GRANTS IN MINNESOTA.

Mr. WINDOM. I ask unanimous consent to introduce for reference a bill extending the time for the completion of certain land-grant railroads in Minnesota, and for other purposes.

Objection was made.

Mr. HOLMAN. I now insist on my motion to adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and thereupon, (at twenty-five minutes past four, p. m.,) the House adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, January 20, 1865.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. CHANNING.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

CANCELING POSTAGE STAMPS.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Postmaster General on the subject of a patent for canceling and marking the stamps used by the Post Office Department; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, and ordered to be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. FORNEY, their Secretary, informed the House that the Senate had passed an act (S. No. 212) for the relief of Henry A. Brigham, in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

TRADE WITH CANADA.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting, in compliance with a resolution of the House of December 20, 1864, a report of what goods have been permitted to pass from the United States through Canada and again into the United States, &c.; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

BURSTING OF NAVAL GUNS.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Navy, transmitting, in compliance with a resolution of the House of the 5th instant, a report in regard to the bursting of guns on board the vessels of the United States fleet in the bombardment of Fort Fisher; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

THANKS FOR THE CAPTURE OF FORT FISHER.

Mr. SCHENCK, by unanimous consent, reported from the Committee on Military Affairs, with an amendment, joint resolution (S. R. No. 98) tendering the thanks of Congress to Major General Alfred H. Terry, and the officers and men under his command, for their gallantry and good conduct in the recent capture of Fort Fisher.

On motion of Mr. SCHENCK, the House proceeded to the consideration of the joint resolution; which was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the thanks of Congress are hereby presented to Major General Alfred H. Terry, and to the officers and men under his command, for the unsurpassed gallantry and skill exhibited by them in the attack upon Fort Fisher, and the brilliant and decisive victory by which that important work has been captured from the rebel forces and placed in the possession and under the authority of the United States, and for their long and faithful service and unwavering devotion to the cause of the country in the midst of the greatest difficulties and dangers.

And be it further resolved, That the President of the United States be, and he hereby is, requested to communicate this resolution to Major General Terry, and through him to the officers and soldiers under his command.

The amendment proposed by the Committee on Military Affairs was to insert in the fourth line, before the word "major," the word "brevet."

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution was ordered to be read a third time. It was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move to amend the title by inserting before the word "major" the word "brevet."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SCHENCK moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT TILL MONDAY.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move that when the House adjourns to-day, it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

Mr. STEVENS. I hope the gentleman will not press that motion at this time.

Mr. SCHENCK. I withdraw the motion for the present.

THANKS OF CONGRESS TO GENERAL THOMAS.

Mr. GARFIELD, by unanimous consent, reported back from the Committee on Military Affairs a joint resolution expressive of the thanks of the American people to Major General George H. Thomas and the army under his command, with an amendment in the form of a substitute.

On motion of Mr. GARFIELD, the House proceeded to the consideration of the joint resolution; which was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the thanks of the American people are eminently due, and are hereby tendered, to General Thomas and the army under his command for their brilliant courage and endurance, which resulted in the defeat of the rebel army under Hood, and the expulsion of the enemy from the State of Tennessee.

The amendment proposed by the Committee on Military Affairs was to strike out all after the word "resolved," and insert the following:

That the thanks of Congress are due, and are hereby tendered, to Major General George H. Thomas, and the officers and soldiers under his command, for their skill and dauntless courage, by which the rebel army under General Hood was signally defeated and driven from the State of Tennessee.

The amendment was adopted.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. GARFIELD moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

EXCUSED FROM COMMITTEE SERVICE.

Mr. J. C. ALLEN. I learn from the reading of the Journal this morning that the Speaker has appointed me a member of the special committee charged with the duty of investigating certain charges against a member of the House. I feel it my duty to ask to be excused from service on that committee. I do not believe it will be possible for me to devote to the matter that attention which will probably be necessary.

There was no objection; and Mr. ALLEN was excused.

MERCHANTS' EXCHANGE, NEW YORK.

Mr. STEVENS, by unanimous consent, reported from the Committee of Ways and Means a joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to give the necessary notice stipulated of the intention of the United States to purchase the building known as the Merchants' Exchange, New York city, now used for custom-house purposes.

The joint resolution was read a first and second time; and on motion of Mr. STEVENS the House proceeded to its consideration.

It authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to give notice to the owners of the building in New York city known as the Merchants' Exchange, and occupied as a custom-house, of the intention of the United States to purchase the same for the sum of $1,000,000, in accordance with the terms stipulated in the existing lease of the property to the Government.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. STEVENS moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CONSULAR AND DIPLOMATIC BILL.

Mr. STEVENS. House bill No. 598, making appropriations for the consular and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the year ending the 30th of June, 1866, has been returned from the Senate with a few amendments, and we do not think it worth while to have them referred to the Committee of Ways and Means. I ask that they be taken up and concurred in.

There was no objection, and the bill and amendments were taken up.

First amendment of the Senate:

In the following, before the word "Mexico" insert the words "republic of:"

For salaries of envoys extraordinary, ministers, and commissioners of the United States at Great Britain, France, Russia, Prussia, Spain, Austria, Brazil, Mexico, China, Italy, Chili, Peru, Portugal, Switzerland, Rome, Belgium, Holland, Denmark, Sweden, Turkey, New Grenada, Bolivia, Ecuador, Venezuela, Guatemala, Nicaragua, Sandwich Islands, Costa Rica, Honduras, Argentine Confederation, Paraguay, Japan, and Salvador, $308,500.

Mr. COX. If there be a perfect concurrence in that amendment I have nothing to say; otherwise I should like to have the yeas and nays.

Mr. STEVENS. The Committee of Ways and Means recommend a concurrence.

The amendment was concurred in.

Second amendment:

Strike out "St. Lambert and Longueuil" from the list of consulates, schedule B.

The Committee of Ways and Means recommended concurrence.

The amendment was concurred in.

Third amendment:

In the following, increase the appropriation from $5,000 to $20,000:

For expenses incurred under instructions from the Secretary of State, in bringing home from foreign countries persons charged with crime, and expenses incident thereto, $5,000.

The Committee of Ways and Means recommended concurrence.

The amendment was concurred in.

Fourth amendment:

Add at the end of the bill:

For expenses of the commission to run and mark the boundary line between the United States and the British possessions bounding on Washington Territory, $13,250.

The Committee of Ways and Means recommended concurrence.

The amendment was concurred in.

Mr. STEVENS moved to reconsider the votes by which the amendments were concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

WAGON ROAD.

Mr. WALLACE, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to construct a wagon road from Lewistown, in the Territory of Idaho, to Virginia City, in the Territory of Montana; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

LAND GRANT TO MICHIGAN.

Mr. UPSON, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to amend an act entitled "An act to amend the act making a grant of alternate sections of public lands to the State of Michigan, to aid in the construction of certain railroads in said State, and for other purposes;" which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

PROSECUTIONS FOR LIBEL.

Mr. WILSON, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back House bill No. 692, in reference to prosecutions for libel in the District of Columbia, with a substitute.

The substitute was read, as follows:

That in all prosecutions or indictments for libel instituted, or which may hereafter be instituted, in the District of Columbia, the truth thereof may be given in evidence under the general issue as a justification of the alleged libel; and if it appear that the matter charged as libelous was true, and was written or published with good motives and for justifiable ends, the defendant shall be acquitted.

The substitute was adopted. The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WILSON moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

WESTERN DISTRICT COURT OF MISSOURI.

Mr. KING, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back House bill No. 631, to provide for holding courts in the western district of Missouri, and prescribing the times thereof, with an amendment.

The amendment was read, as follows:

That hereafter the judges of the eastern and western districts of the United States courts for the district of Missouri, shall each receive as a salary the sum of $3,000, to be paid in the manner now provided by law.

Mr. HOLMAN. The title did not indicate the purpose of the bill and amendment. It simply provided for the holding of the courts, otherwise I should have objected to its introduction. I object to the reporting of an amendment to a bill changing materially its character.

The SPEAKER. The objection comes too late.

Mr. HOLMAN. The title does not express the character of the bill.

Mr. KING. Mr. Speaker, if the House agree to the amendment of the Committee on the Judiciary it is competent to amend the title of the bill. I admit that the title does not exactly correspond to the bill as amended.

I will remark that the present salaries of these judges is $2,500. I know that there is great objection to increasing salaries, but I also know that they have been increased during this session in one or two instances under precisely the same circumstances. There are two places of holding the district court of the United States in Missouri at this time. This bill proposes to provide a third place, St. Louis. The judge that held that court, if he should, as he has done heretofore, reside at Jefferson City, will be two hundred miles from St. Louis; and if he undertakes to get there by railroad communication he will be three hundred miles.

The business in the western district of Missouri I am sure will increase very much, as it has increased in the eastern district. The present salary is wholly inadequate, and therefore I ask the adoption of the amendment proposed by the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. HOLMAN. It will be remembered that there are two judicial districts in Missouri, and that this provides for the salary of the two judges, $3,000 each, $2,500 being the present salary. I trust the House will not increase this salary to the extent proposed. The State which I have the honor in part to represent constitutes one judicial district, and has as much business as the two districts of Missouri combined; and the salary of the judge is $3,000 per annum.

It seems to me that this precedent should not be established now, and therefore I move that the amendment—if that will not carry the bill with it—be laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. That would carry the bill with it.

Mr. HOLMAN. Then I move that the bill be recommitted to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. KING. I would like to say one word in reply. I do not know how the gentleman arrives at the information that the State of Indiana has as much judicial business as the two districts of Missouri. I am sure I have not that information, and I do not know how he gets it; but I do know that the business of the eastern district of Missouri, at St. Louis, has increased fourfold of late, and the prospects are that it will continue to increase. The present rate of high living, the amount of tax which is taken off of salaries, the depreciation of the currency, and the appreciation of everything else, really puts the present salary below that which a lawyer, qualified for the high position of judge, is entitled to receive.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I did not hear the amendment read, but I understand that it is a proposition to increase the salaries of the judges of the two districts of Missouri $500 each. I am opposed to that proposition, as I am to all propositions for increasing salaries. I am opposed to it upon the ground, first, that the Treasury is in no condition to pay increased salaries; and secondly, that if we are to make any increase of salaries, the increase should be general. I will state that the judge of the southern district of Illinois—a district which has a great deal of business, and which has increased largely since the breaking out of this rebellion—has only a salary of $2,500; and if there be any justice in increasing the salary of these two judges of Missouri, the salary of the judge of the southern district of Illinois should also be increased. But I object to that, too.

Mr. HOLMAN. My information that the judicial business of the State of Indiana is equal to that of the two judicial districts of Missouri is based upon the population of the two States and the extent of their maritime jurisdiction. I admit that in the eastern district of Missouri, owing to the position of a large city there, the business is larger than in any one locality in my own State; but I know that the business of the whole State is equal to that of the two districts of Missouri. But inasmuch as the bill is unobjectionable, except so far as the amendment is concerned, I will withdraw my motion to recommit; and with a view of allowing the House to take a vote upon the amendment I demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question was ordered to be put; and under the operation thereof the amendment was not agreed to. The bill was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. KING moved that the vote by which the bill was passed be reconsidered; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

THANKS OF CONGRESS TO ADMIRAL PORTER.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts, by unanimous consent, reported back from the Committee on Naval Affairs, with a recommendation that it do pass, a joint resolution (S. R. No. 99) tendering the thanks of Congress to Rear Admiral David D. Porter, and to the officers, petty officers, seamen, and marines under his command, for their gallantry and good conduct in the recent capture of Fort Fisher.

The resolution was ordered to be read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts, moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ADVANCE OF NAVAL RANK.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to take from the Speaker's table bill of the House No. 607, to provide for an advance of rank to officers of the Navy and Marine corps for distinguished merit, which has been returned from the Senate with an amendment.

No objection being made, the bill was taken up, and the amendment of the Senate was concurred in, as follows:

In section one, line five, strike out the word "fifty" and insert "thirty"; so that the clause will read:

"That any officer of the Navy or Marine corps, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, may be advanced not exceeding thirty numbers in rank, &c."

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts, moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment of the Senate was concurred in; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

TRADE WITH THE REBEL STATES.

Mr. DRIGGS. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to offer the following preamble and resolution:

Whereas it is reported that one G. N. Lane, of Baltimore, received a permit in December last from H. A. Risley, chief agent of the Treasury, to proceed to North Carolina and exchange provisions with the rebels for cotton: Therefore,

Resolved, That the committee on the conduct of the war be instructed to inquire into the facts, and to report to this House whether there is any authority vested in the Treasury Department to give the right to any one to furnish the rebels with supplies from our lines; and if not, to report such a bill or resolution as may be necessary to bring the guilty to justice and to protect the interests of the Government in the future, or to take such other action as may be deemed proper to secure the object in view.

Mr. STEVENS. I suggest to the gentleman that he modify his resolution by inserting the word "alleged" before "facts."

Mr. DRIGGS. I will accept that modification.

Mr. DAWES. I would suggest to the gentleman from Michigan that the committee on the conduct of the war is already so overwhelmed with business that he had better refer this subject to some other committee. I do not know what standing committee would be the proper one, but I am in favor of the investigation.

Mr. DRIGGS. It is suggested to me that the matter be referred to the Committee on Commerce, and I will so modify my resolution as to refer it to that committee.

Mr. DAWES. It occurs to me that the Committee on the Judiciary would be a better committee, but I do not wish to interfere with the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. DRIGGS. I modify my resolution so as to refer the matter to the Committee on Commerce, instead of to the committee on the conduct of the war.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I suggest to the gentleman from Michigan and to the House that the Committee on Military Affairs are now investigating this whole subject of trade with insurrectionary districts.

Mr. DRIGGS. I think the Committee on Commerce is the proper committee to examine into this subject.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. There is no use in referring this subject to the Committee on Commerce or any other committee, unless you arm the committee with some authority to examine the matter. I suggest to the gentleman that he add to his resolution the words, "with power to send for persons and papers."

Mr. DRIGGS. I accept that modification.

The resolution as modified was then agreed to.

Mr. DRIGGS moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

FRANKLIN INSURANCE COMPANY.

Mr. STEELE, of New York. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to take from the Speaker's table, for the purpose of putting it upon its passage at this time, bill of the Senate No. 384, to amend an act entitled "An act to amend and extend the charter of the Franklin Insurance Company," approved March 2, 1838.

No objection being made, the bill was taken up and read a first and second time. It proposes to extend and continue in force the amendatory act recited for twenty years from the 9th day of April, 1858, the time at which such amendatory act expired, and legalize the acts of the company between the period when said act expired and the date of this act.

Mr. WILSON. I suggest to the gentleman from New York that this bill ought to go to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

Mr. STEELE, of New York. I would state to the gentleman from Iowa that it is simply an extension of the charter of this insurance company. The charter expired by a mistake, and I cannot conceive that anybody can have any objection to the bill. The District Committee in the Senate reported it unanimously, and it passed the Senate unanimously.

Mr. WILSON. Has the Committee for the District of Columbia of this House passed on this bill?

Mr. STEELE, of New York. We have not considered it, but I do not think there is any necessity for its reference. This company has been in existence for forty years in Washington.

Mr. WILSON. I move that the bill be referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

Mr. STEELE, of New York. I do not think it necessary to refer it.

Mr. WILSON. I think it had better be examined by the committee, if they have not already examined it.

Mr. WILSON's motion was agreed to; and the bill was accordingly referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

UNITED STATES COURTS IN VIRGINIA.

Mr. BOUTWELL, by unanimous consent, reported back from the Committee on the Judiciary bill of the House No. 664, for changing the time of holding the circuit courts in the district of Virginia, with an amendment in the nature of a substitute.

The substitute was agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BOUTWELL moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

OATH OF OFFICE.

Mr. BOUTWELL also, by unanimous consent, and from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back, without amendment, bill of the Senate No. 72, supplementary to an act entitled "An act to prescribe an oath of office, and for other purposes," approved July 2, 1862.

The bill provides that no person, after the date of this act, shall be admitted to the bar of the Supreme Court of the United States, or at any time after the 4th of March next be admitted to the bar of any circuit court or district court of the United States, or the Court of Claims, as an attorney or counselor, or be allowed to appear by virtue of any previous admission, or any special powers of attorney, unless he first takes and subscribes the oath prescribed in the "act to prescribe an oath of office," approved July 2, 1862, which said oath so taken and subscribed shall be preserved among the files of such court, and that any person who shall falsely take said oath shall be guilty of perjury, and, on conviction, be liable to the pains and penalties of perjury, and the additional pains and penalties prescribed in the said act.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and was passed by a vote of—ayes 66, noes 26.

Mr. BOUTWELL moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. BOUTWELL, also by unanimous consent, the Committee on the Judiciary was discharged from the further consideration of bill of the House No. 578, prescribing an oath of loyalty to all persons practicing law in any of the States declared to be in rebellion, and the same was laid on the table.

TESTIMONY IN UNITED STATES COURTS.

Mr. KELLOGG, of New York, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire whether it is not expedient to enact further laws providing for perpetuating testimony of witnesses and taking the testimony of witnesses de bene esse in the Supreme Court and in the circuit courts of the United States; and report by bill or otherwise.

WILLIAM HANCOCK.

Mr. TRACY, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill for the relief of William Hancock; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

HUNDRED-DAY REGIMENTS.

Mr. SCHENCK, by unanimous consent, introduced the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to inform this House on what terms and understanding men were accepted from Ohio and other States during the year 1864, to serve in the Army for one hundred days, and whether there exists any reason why credit should not be given on any draft to be made to the several States or districts which furnished these men, in proportion to their terms of service.

COMMUTATION ILLEGALLY PAID.

Mr. NOBLE, by unanimous consent, offered the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to inform this House why the amounts paid for commutation by persons who were declared to have been illegally drafted, on a supplementary draft made after the 4th of July last, on a call made prior to that date, have not been refunded to them.

PRIVATE BUSINESS.

Mr. HALÉ. I ask the Chair whether the regular order of business to-day is not the consideration of private bills.

The SPEAKER. It would be if the House had not, by a suspension of the rules, made the loan bill a special order.

Mr. HALÉ. I suggest, then, that next Friday be set apart for the consideration of private business exclusively. We have had no day at all this session for that business. I ask unanimous consent for this proposition.

There being no objection, it was so ordered.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. NICOLAY, his Private Secretary, announced that the President had approved and signed an act (H. R. No. 203) for the relief of Jacob Weber; and

An act (H. R. No. 625) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for carrying the mails from the United States to foreign ports, and for other purposes," approved March 25, 1864.

WAYS AND MEANS.

Mr. STEVENS. I now insist upon the special order.

The SPEAKER. The special order is the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 677) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide ways and means for the support of the Government, and for other purposes," approved June 30, 1864.

The Chair will state that this bill is made a special order in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and it will require unanimous consent to consider it in the House.

Mr. HOLMAN. I suppose there will be no objection to considering the bill in the House as if in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union subject to the same rules.

The SPEAKER. Is there any objection to that proposition?

Mr. SPALDING. I object.

Mr. STEVENS. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

The rules were accordingly suspended, and the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. SPALDING in the chair,) and proceeded to the consideration, as a special order, of a bill (H. R. No. 677) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide ways and means for the support of the Government, and for other purposes," approved June 30, 1864.

The bill was read, as follows:

That in lieu of any bonds authorized to be issued by the first section of the act entitled "An act to provide ways and means for the support of the Government," approved June 30, 1864, that may remain unsold at the date of this act, the Secretary of the Treasury may issue, under the authority of said act, Treasury notes of the description and character authorized by the second section of said act: Provided, That the whole amount of bonds authorized as aforesaid, and Treasury notes issued and to be issued in lieu thereof, shall not exceed the sum of $400,000,000; and such Treasury notes may be disposed of for lawful money, or for any other Treasury notes or certificates of indebtedness or certificates of deposit issued under any previous act of Congress; and such notes shall be exempt from taxation by or under State or municipal authority.

Sec. 2. And he it further enacted, That any bonds known as five-twenties, issued under the act of 25th February, 1862, remaining unsold to an amount not exceeding $4,000,000, may be disposed of by the Secretary of the Treasury in the United States, or, if he shall find it expedient, in Europe, at any time, on such terms as he may deem most advisable. And the Secretary of the Treasury is further authorized to issue bonds of the description issued under the authority of the act of 23d June, 1860, in pursuance of the notice for "proposals for loan," dated 8th September, 1860, to subscribers to that loan for the one per cent. deposited under said notice and not repaid: Provided, That the bonds so issued shall bear not more than five per cent. interest: And provided further, That fractional amounts may be repaid in lawful money of the United States.

Mr. BROOKS. I desire to ask the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means for some explanation of this bill. The act itself, as it reads, is somewhat blind, and it requires a good deal of study in connection with other laws to understand it properly. I think that the House and country will be much obliged to the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means if he will put it in English. I do not mean to say that the bill is not English, but if he will translate the act into mercantile language, so that every one will be able to understand it, it will be very desirable.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. Chairman, it will be recollected that by the act of 30th June last Congress authorized the issue of a loan of $400,000,000, half of which the Secretary had a right to issue in seven-thirties, as they are called. He has gone on and issued to within sixty or seventy million dollars of that amount.

Mr. BROOKS. Making about how much issued?

Mr. STEVENS. About $130,000,000 issued. They seem to be a favorite form of loan. The Secretary is of opinion that if the whole $400,000,000 authorized by the act of June 30, 1864, were to be issued in this shape, it would be more acceptable than in the form of bonds; and he has requested the same permission for the one $200,000,000 that he has for the other. There is about $130,000,000 of that loan still undisposed of in any form; and the Secretary of the Treasury desires authority to issue that amount on the same principle on which he issued the seven-thirties. That is all that this bill proposes. But lest he might issue under this authority some legal-tender notes, interest-bearing, the Committee of Ways and Means has instructed me to offer at the end of the bill a further proviso that this act shall not be so construed as to give any authority for the issue of any legal-tender notes in any form beyond the amount heretofore authorized by law. We thought that, taking the two acts together, it might be doubtful whether the Secretary of the Treasury would not have that power unless we put in this proviso. We had no idea that he intended to do this; but, as the power might possibly exist, we deemed it best to insert the proviso.

Mr. KERNAN. Do I understand that the Secretary of the Treasury has issued the $200,000,000 of notes provided for by the act of June 30, 1864?

Mr. STEVENS. He has issued them in the shape of seven-thirty notes.

Mr. KERNAN. Are not those notes, of which the second section of this bill proposes to allow him to issue $130,000,000 more; a legal tender to every extent except that they cannot be used in the redemption of the currency used by the United States banks?

Mr. STEVENS. None of them are legal tenders. In that law authority was given to the Secretary of the Treasury to make those that were payable at maturity a legal tender for their face.

Mr. KERNAN. Precisely.

Mr. STEVENS. But no part of that has been executed; and by this proviso we propose to restrain that power and not allow him to make them legal tenders.

Mr. KERNAN. Those issued, as I understand, are not made payable at maturity?

Mr. STEVENS. No, sir; none of them.

Mr. ALLEY. As I understand this matter, no additional loan is to be created by this bill. It simply proposes to change the form of the five-twenty loan to a seven-thirty loan. That is the sum and substance of the whole proposition. Am I right?

Mr. STEVENS. That is exactly what it is intended to effect, with the further restraint which I have already mentioned.

Mr. ALLEY. I understand further that no part of this loan is intended to be a legal tender in any shape.

Mr. STEVENS. It cannot be if we pass the amendment proposed. No part of it has yet been issued in that form, and we do not intend to allow it to be.

Mr. BROOMALL. I desire to ask whether or not this issue is intended to be in the form of notes calculated for circulation?

Mr. STEVENS. It is intended to be in the form of seven-thirty notes, precisely in that form.

Mr. BROOMALL. I wish to ask also whether the $200,000,000 authorized by the act of June, 1864, are not now circulating to a considerable extent as currency?

Mr. STEVENS. I have no knowledge on that subject. They have been issued probably in the shape of bonds with coupons. They may circulate in the same way as promissory notes do.

Mr. BROOMALL. I see no provision in the law requiring them to be issued with coupons. May they not be issued under the law as compound-interest-bearing notes, such as are really in circulation?

Mr. STEVENS. No, sir; because by this proviso we propose to restrain the Secretary of the Treasury in that respect.

Mr. BROOMALL. The gentleman does not exactly understand my question.

Mr. STEVENS. There are notes running for three years, which bear compound interest, and are a legal tender for their face.

Mr. BROOMALL. Are there not also in circulation similar notes, made a legal tender, but bearing interest compounded at six per cent.?

Mr. STEVENS. I have not seen any. I have no knowledge of them.

Mr. BROOMALL. Is there anything in the law that prevents these notes from being issued simply in the shape of the compound-interest notes now in circulation, and without coupons?

Mr. STEVENS. As I stated before, the object of the proviso is to prevent that.

Mr. BROOMALL. The proviso, if I understand the gentleman aright, provides that they shall not be made a legal tender. I also understand the gentleman to say that the present issue, the $200,000,000, are not made legal tenders; that the Secretary of the Treasury did not see proper to exercise the power given to make them a legal tender. Am I right?

Mr. STEVENS. You are right.

Mr. BROOMALL. Then the $130,000,000 will be precisely like the present six per cent. compound-interest-bearing notes in circulation, lacking the element of legal tender?

Mr. STEVENS. No six per cent. compound-interest-bearing notes have been issued under this law; they have been issued under the law of 1863.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I wish to inquire of my colleague [Mr. STEVENS] whether under that act and the amendment he proposes the Secretary of the Treasury will not still have the power to issue about $70,000,000 more of legal-tender notes than have been issued hitherto?

Mr. STEVENS. We do not interfere with the first $200,000,000, but we do interfere with the balance, which we are now providing for.

Mr. SCOFIELD. My inquiry is this: if we pass this bill, then, with the proviso which the gentleman has proposed, will not the Secretary have the power to add to the volume of the legal-tender notes now in existence some $70,000,000?

Mr. STEVENS. The gentleman means by legal-tender notes compound-interest-bearing notes.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I mean the notes to pay duties, and which are usually known as legal-tender notes.

Mr. STEVENS. There is an express limit to the legal-tender notes of $450,000,000. That is the law now.

Mr. SCOFIELD. There are about $70,000,000 of notes which may be issued under this act, and when we authorize the Secretary to issue them in the form of seven-thirties he will then have power to make them legal-tender notes under the two acts, notwithstanding the proviso.

Mr. STEVENS. No, sir.

Mr. SCOFIELD. Then strike out all after the word "for," in the proviso, and say that he shall not have power to issue any more legal-tender notes in any form.

Mr. MORRILL. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. SCOFIELD. Certainly.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. Chairman, I will state to the committee what I understand to be the precise facts in connection with this matter. The Committee of Ways and Means do not propose to give to the Secretary any power to issue any legal-tender notes by the bill now before the committee. They do not propose to repeal any authority he now has in relation to that matter. Under the first section of that act that power is not yet exhausted, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania is correct in supposing that there is still the option on the part of the Secretary of the Treasury to issue some sixty or seventy million dollars more. We do not propose to interfere with the law as it now stands upon the statute-book. That is considered by the Secretary of the Treasury as exceedingly useful in the negotiation of loans as it now stands. So far it has only been used to issue compound-interest-bearing notes to take up previous notes issued bearing five per cent. interest. There have been no legal-tender notes issued, as I understand, under this act—not a dollar. We propose now simply to give authority to the Secretary to issue seven-thirty bonds or notes, as you may choose to call them, to the extent of $200,000,000. That is all there is of it, more or less.

Mr. PIKE. I wish to move an amendment to the first section of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is entitled to the floor.

Mr. STEVENS. I think that there is yet unexhausted, under the law giving to the Secretary of the Treasury the right to issue seven-thirty bonds, $70,000,000, and some $130,000,000 under the other. Under that section no legal-tender note in any shape, no compound-interest-bearing note, has been issued. They have all been issued simply in the form of seven-thirty bonds.

Mr. BROOMALL. Let me call the gentleman's attention to the law.

Mr. STEVENS. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. BROOMALL. I find in the act of Congress which this bill proposes to alter these words:

"And the said Treasury notes may be disposed of by the Secretary of the Treasury on the best terms that can be obtained, for lawful money; and such of them as shall be made payable, principal and interest, at maturity, shall be a legal tender to the same extent as United States notes for their face value, excluding interest, and may be paid to any creditor of the United States at their face value, excluding interest, or to any creditor willing to receive them at par, excluding interest; and any Treasury notes issued under the authority of this act may be made convertible, at the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury, into any bonds issued under the authority of this act."

How does the gentleman get over the provision of law making them legal tender?

Mr. STEVENS. They are only legal tender when they are made payable at certain times; and it is so expressed on their face. None of them have been issued, not a dollar. They have issued seven-thirty bonds, and none have been issued under the other power contained in that law.

Mr. PIKE. If the gentleman will allow me, I will offer an amendment.

Mr. STEVENS. I will hear the amendment. The amendment was read, as follows:

And provided further, That the Treasury notes hereby authorized shall be three-year notes with coupons, and may be convertible into bonds of the United States.

Mr. STEVENS. I cannot agree to that, because he may wish to issue one or two year notes. I think that discretion should not be taken away from the Secretary; but we do propose to take away from him the power of making the notes a legal tender.

Mr. PRICE. I am not particular about the time. I only wish to obviate the difficulty which exists in the minds of some gentlemen upon this floor, and therefore my proviso was designed to fix the fact that the notes shall be coupon notes, and shall stand upon the same footing as the coupon notes now authorized to be issued under existing acts. I am not particular about the time, whether it be one, two, or three years; but I desire to fix the fact that they shall be coupon notes; because it is no secret that these notes are intended to be used for banking capital. By making the notes coupon notes, and taking away the objection which exists in the minds of gentlemen, I presume the bill will pass without any objection.

Mr. PIKE. I desire to offer an amendment.

Mr. STEVENS. I desire to say what I have to present, and then I will yield the floor to others. The Secretary of the Treasury is of opinion that he ought to be left the same discretion which the former Secretary had, and he says it aids him very much in making loans. He is enabled with it to make loans when otherwise he could not; but the committee, so far as the $200,000,000 are concerned, are not willing to leave him quite that discretion. They have not thought proper to interfere with him in executing the law as it now stands. We did not think it expedient to do so. But it is well known that all notes he has issued have been issued in the shape I have mentioned. No one of them has been a compound note, or a legal tender. But as I said before, as we are enlarging the authority of the Secretary, it seems right to restrain, so far as we choose to do so, his power in regard to issuing legal-tender notes.

These notes are not intended as banking capital. I never heard of their being the foundation of banking capital. They are not of the kind used for that purpose. Registered bonds have to be used, and if others are offered they are not received, but are required to be converted into registered bonds. So I think there can be no kind of difficulty about this. As my colleague [Mr. MORRILL] has said, we do not propose to change the present law in regard to the seven-thirties; but when we give further power to issue seven-thirties we do propose to restrain the Secretary more than he is now. If the House does not think proper to give him the discretion to convert these bonds into seven-thirties, they will say so.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to amend by striking out the last clause of the bill.

Mr. PIKE. That is what I sought the floor to do.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope the gentleman will yet have an opportunity to present his views. I move to amend by striking out the last clause, as follows:

And such notes shall be exempt from taxation, by or under State or municipal authorities.

I do not see how we can well avoid conferring upon the Secretary of the Treasury the authority sought to be obtained by this section. I understand that the only effect is that whatever may remain of the $200,000,000 authorized by the act referred to, may be issued in the form of bonds or Treasury notes, bearing interest not to exceed seven and three tenths per cent., and having a period of not more than three years to run. Whatever gentlemen may say upon the subject, it is under this authority that the Secretary of the Treasury can issue—if he has not already issued—compound six per cent. Treasury notes. The object of my amendment is this: the whole benefit of this Treasury note feature of legal-tender notes bearing interest is to inure to the benefit of the bankers of the country. It does so in this way: the bankers of the country are required to keep on hand a given amount of money. Instead of keeping on hand legal-tender notes, not bearing interest, they throw them into circulation and place on deposit the six per cent. legal-tender notes authorized under this law. It is very true they cannot issue them over their counter, but they can use them for all other purposes the same as legal-tender notes, as men do in their ordinary transactions. The effect then is this, that the whole banking interests of the country are enabled to deposit in their banks a paper bearing interest, at least at the rate of six per cent., and compound interest at that, and at the same time be exempt from all taxation.

Now, while I do not well see how the authority to issue these notes can be withheld from the Secretary of the Treasury, because means must be obtained to carry on the Government, yet I do protest against conferring upon an interest already receiving such extraordinary favors under our system of finance, the power not only to receive interest on the money deposited in their vaults, and that too at enormous rates as compared with those of other nations, but, at the same time, exempt it from all taxation whatever. Sir, it is withdrawing from taxation for national purposes, for State purposes, for county purposes, for municipal purposes, millions and millions of our capital, and at the same time throwing upon the labor of the country, upon the producing interests of the country, increased burdens of taxation. It seems to me that nothing could be more unwise.

Gentlemen may say that this question has already been discussed in this House, and that the House by a small majority has decided in favor of exempting this species of property from taxation. But it will be remembered that when the question was before the House the argument was that the exemption only applied to the bonds; but now, by the express terms of this bill, the principle of exemption from taxation is to apply to the notes, and not only to the notes, but to the legal tenders to the amount of their face; and at the same time, bearing interest, those notes go into circulation; independently of the bond feature to which I have referred, they are found in the hands of our citizens everywhere, so that any man can exempt himself from his share in the burdens of taxation which the extraordinary expenditures of the times have imposed upon every town and township and county in the loyal portions of the country; he may exempt himself from the payment of a single dollar of taxes by simply investing his means in the six per cent. compound notes or the seven and three tenths authorized by this act.

It is not sufficient for gentlemen to say that under the second section of the original act "to provide ways and means for the support of the Government, and for other purposes," approved 30th June, 1864, no six per cent. compound notes have been issued, because, in point of fact, they can be issued under the second section of that act which has been already read upon this floor, and which clearly confers upon the Secretary of the Treasury the power to issue these notes at an interest not exceeding seven and three tenths per cent. per annum, and running three years, and makes them a legal tender to the amount of their face.

In view, therefore, of the effect of withholding this species of property from taxation, in view of its injustice, in view of the fact that by exempting this particular interest in favor of the capitalists of the country, you increase the taxation of those who are engaged in industrial pursuits, I must protest against it, and protest against it more especially as the Representative of an agricultural community who cannot receive the full financial benefit of a provision like this to the extent to which it will result to the commercial interests of the country.

Mr. KERNAN. I think that the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Indiana will not effect his object. Within a year and a half past the United States courts have held, reversing the decision of the courts of the State of New York, that the bonds, the security issued by the Government, are exempt from taxation by virtue of the Constitution of the United States without any law; and hence, if they are to be taxed, it is necessary that Congress shall expressly waive the privilege which the courts hold that the Government has under the Constitution of the United States. It will be necessary that we shall declare expressly that they shall be subject to taxation, or else under this decision they will be exempt by the Constitution itself. Hence I suggest to my friend from Indiana that if he desires to legislate upon this subject he must legislate in reference to that decision, assuming it, as I must do, to be right.

Mr. BROWN, of Wisconsin. The gentleman from Indiana will allow me to call his attention to another fact in reference to this question which, from remarks which have been made in this House, I think is not understood. This bill provides for the issue of so many millions of Treasury notes, according to the provisions of section two of the act approved June 30, 1864. Section two of that act authorized the issue of a certain amount of notes, which were legal tender, in lieu of the bonds authorized by section one, but it did not exempt those notes so issued from taxation. The provision of the bill now proposed is a new provision. The policy of exempting this class of securities from taxation is for the first time proposed this session.

Mr. BROOMALL. Mr. Chairman, I wish to call the attention of the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means to a note which I hold in my hand, and which purports to be issued under the act of June 30, 1864—the act proposed to be amended by the act now pending. This note is made, on its face, a legal tender to the extent of its principal, without interest. I find that the issue under that act is in the form of currency without coupons, if the note which I hold in my hand is a fair sample. I want to be understood, however, that I do not oppose this on account of the notes being a legal tender. On the contrary, if the currency is to be further increased, I prefer it to be uniform, and that all the notes should be made legal tenders, if any are. My objection is to the form of the note. If the Committee of Ways and Means will put this bill in a shape such that the issue under it shall not enter into the currency of the country and further inflate it, I will vote for it. But nothing but being satisfied that the condition of the Treasury absolutely demands the further issue of notes that can enter into the currency in any shape, will induce me to vote for such a measure. I think that the great mistake made heretofore is in having inflated the currency too much. I think it would be better to increase the rate of interest on bonds until sufficient money can be obtained in that form, than to inflate the currency further than it is inflated. If the matter can be so modified that no further inflation of the currency shall take place under the act, I will vote for it with pleasure.

Mr. STEVENS. I desire to say that with regard to the note produced by my colleague, [Mr. BROOMALL,] it was issued under a section which authorized them to be issued for the exchange of legal-tender notes. None of the $200,000,000 referred to in the act of June 30, 1864, was issued in the form of the note which my colleague has shown. That is one of a class of notes issued in exchange for other legal-tender notes.

Mr. HOLMAN. There can be no question, Mr. Chairman, that when the Secretary of the Treasury issued these compound-interest notes, he undoubtedly had the power to do so; for the express terms of the act are that he may issue, to the extent of $200,000,000, notes running for three years, and not exceeding a given rate of interest, seven and three tenths. It is subject to that authority that the balance of the other $200,000,000 is proposed to be issued. I believe the gentleman from Pennsylvania stated the balance at $130,000,000.

Mr. STEVENS. Yes, sir.

Mr. HOLMAN. I do not agree with gentlemen that we can avoid conferring this power on the Secretary of the Treasury. I would go as far as any gentleman to avoid a further expansion of the currency; but it seems to me that it is almost impossible to avoid authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to exercise some discretionary power in this matter, else in many instances you may subject him to the rapacity of the banks. The objection that I raise is mainly confined to the one fact, the exemption of these notes from taxation. My friend from Wisconsin [Mr. BROWN] suggests that by the act of 30th June, 1864, Treasury notes were not exempt from taxation; he may be correct. Yet when you examine this act you will find that the last clause of the first section provides "that all bonds, Treasury notes, and other obligations of the United States shall be exempt from taxation by or under any State or municipal authority." The gentleman argues that notes to be issued under the second section of that act are not embraced by that general provision. I am apprehensive that he is mistaken in this construction, although when the subject was before the House last session it was argued, with some degree of force, that the principle of exemption from taxation did not apply to the legal-tender notes bearing interest, but to the bonds only.

In reply to the gentleman from New York [Mr. KERNAN] who has referred to a decision of the Supreme Court, I understand that decision not to have been made with reference to the circulating medium of the country, but that, on the contrary, it was held that the principle applied only to the bonds issued by the Government of the United States. It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that there is a wide distinction between bonds issued by the Government and the circulating medium of the country; for if it be true that the whole circulating medium of the country, issued by authority of the Government, is exempt from taxation, then the whole body of the wealth of the country held by the banks and capitalists is exempt from the burdens of State and municipal taxation, leaving the burden on the tangible wealth and labor of the country. If such is the result it will be the most oppressive and disastrous result that ever sprang out of the misfortunes of war; not a temporary but a permanent evil, under which the labor of the country would bend for ages; a result almost fatal to free government, for labor then would be at the mercy of capital, the one stooping under taxation for the sole benefit of the other. This is inevitable if we do not resist this exemption of the many millions of Government securities from taxation. But, Mr. Chairman, to avoid any ambiguity about this matter, and in order that the purpose of Congress may be clearly declared, I adopt the suggestion of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. KERNAN,] and propose not only to strike out these words, but to substitute words expressly conferring upon the States and municipal authorities the power to tax these notes. I move to amend by striking out these words:

And such notes shall be exempt from taxation by or under State or municipal authority.

And inserting the following:

And the notes issued under this act shall be subject to State and municipal taxation as other property.

I suppose that the use of the words "as other property" would oblige the States to impose no greater tax upon this species of property than might be imposed upon other property of a similar character situate within their jurisdiction.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I desire to move an amendment; to add the following proviso:

Provided further, That no legal-tender notes shall be issued by authority of this act, or the act to which this is a supplement.

Mr. GRINNELL. Mr. Chairman, I am constrained to support the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN.] At the last session, when this subject was under discussion, I took ground in favor of exempting these notes from taxation. You remember, sir, that those were darker days than these. You remember, sir, that at that time there were doubts entertained by some in regard to the character of our securities. We wished to dissipate the doubts then existing in regard to the future of the Government, and to induce capitalists to take those securities. Hopefully, sir, they took them. They have proved extraordinary investments. Every one holding them is satisfied with them. You now find that those who own very large amounts of these securities declare that they can afford to be taxed. Of course, I do not propose that there shall be any ex post facto law on this subject; but we can provide now that the future issues of these notes shall be subject to taxation for State and municipal purposes.

We have been told, and will be told, that the surplus money of the country is stored away, and escapes the excessive taxation which must be felt by all classes of the country for years to come. Now, sir, I wish to obviate any objection of this sort. Our taxes will be heavy. Let them be levied judiciously; let them be borne equally; let them fall upon those who are able to pay them.

Mr. WILSON. I desire to ask my colleague whether he supposes that the Government of the United States can dispose of six per cent. bonds, if those bonds are subject to a State taxation of two or three per cent., as the case may be, and also to municipal taxation.

Mr. GRINNELL. I do not know what the tax may be. I do not know whether it will be so much as two or three per cent.

Mr. WILSON. If they are subject to State and municipal taxation it may be in some instances more than two per cent.

Mr. GRINNELL. I know that in the State which the gentleman and myself in part represent, the taxation is not so high as that. One per cent. is there deemed excessive taxation.

Mr. WILSON. I will suggest to my colleague that in some places the State and the municipal taxes will amount to three per cent.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Iowa. I would like to ask my colleague [Mr. GRINNELL] whether, in many of the counties of the State of Iowa, the taxes, State and municipal, do not amount to over three per cent.

Mr. GRINNELL. I am not acquainted with any such county.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Iowa. Well, I am acquainted with a good many counties of that character.

Mr. GRINNELL. Even if that be true, sir, I still maintain that it is right that this Congress should so legislate that there shall in the future be no occasion for remark as to class legislation. How is it now? Nineteen twentieths of the people of this country who pay taxes are those who are engaged in business. They belong to the middle classes. They are merchants, manufacturers, men engaged in commerce, or the smaller class of farmers. Now, sir, shall we say that those who are so fortunate as to live in great cities, and can lay by their surplus funds in these Government securities, because of their peculiar facilities for making money, shall be exempted from taxation on their investments? I believe that the adoption of the legislation now proposed, without some such amendment as that of the gentleman from Indiana, will cause many people to declare, and with some justice, that we have been legislating for a privileged class in this country. I desire that our taxation shall rest equitably upon all.

I know it will be said that, by making these notes liable to State and municipal taxation, we shall enhance the value of the securities already issued and taken. I cannot help that, sir. That increase of value will be the good fortune of those who regarded hopefully the prospects of the Government in darker days, who looked upon the bright side, who were willing to trust the Government, although there was a possibility that they might lose. Let them have this good fortune. Let them make this money, and not those who have continually talked as though the Government was to be put down, and its securities were to become worth nothing. I am not willing to favor any legislation which will bear heavily upon the industrial classes and upon the great masses of our people, and which will grant superior advantages and privileges to one class over another. But I do not wish to consume the time of the House.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. Chairman, I do not suppose that my friend intends it, but he is so elated with the good news that he thinks the war will now carry itself on, and that we need furnish no further supplies. No man supposes with such a provision, leaving these bonds open to every State and municipal taxation, that a dollar of them will be sold. No, sir, not one farthing of them would be sold to any man having common sense. I do not even believe that the gentleman himself is so elated that he would advocate that provision. The effect of this provision of the committee is to enhance the value of the bonds which have been sold already, and to place these bonds in the market upon a good footing. Now, sir, it would be an excellent thing for capitalists to have these bonds limited to the number that they have in their hands. I suppose that these bonds would then go up twenty per cent. I am convinced that it would be highly improper to subject these bonds to taxation when we still need money, and when we have not enough in the Treasury to pay the Army.

I move that the committee rise to close debate. The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SPALDING reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had the special order under consideration, being House bill No. 677, to amend an act entitled "An act to provide ways and means for the support of the Government, and for other purposes," approved June 30, 1864, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. STEVENS. I move that all general debate be closed in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union in one minute after the consideration of the bill shall be resumed.

The SPEAKER. That will leave five minutes debate.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. STEVENS moved to suspend the rules, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. SPALDING in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the special order.

The question recurred on Mr. HOLMAN's amendment.

Mr. HOLMAN demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. HOOPER and HOLMAN were appointed.

The amendment was rejected, the tellers having reported—ayes 39, noes 61.

Mr. FRANK moved the following amendment to the amendment:

And provided further, That the Treasury notes hereby authorized to be issued in pursuance of this section, may be used as a basis for the issue of circulating notes in the same manner as other United States securities are used under the provisions of the act entitled "An act to provide a national currency, secured by the pledge of United States bonds, and to provide for the circulation and redemption thereof," passed June 3, 1864.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. BROWN, of Wisconsin. I submit the following amendment:

And provided, That said Treasury notes shall not bear interest.

Mr. Chairman, I offer this amendment for the reason that the very worst form in which you can issue a legal-tender note is the one provided for in this section. The first blunder that was made in our financial system was in making a distinction by the Government itself between that class of money which it forces the people at large to take and another kind of money, gold, which it provided for special purposes and for a special class of individuals. The result was speculation in gold and depreciation of that currency which the Government had provided for the people. You now come and commit another fault of the same kind providing for an issue of another class of legal-tender notes which are to pass into circulation, in the first instance, and then to be locked up in the vaults of the banks while they will force out into the hands of the people at large that class of money which bears no interest. The result must inevitably be to depreciate that currency which we ordinarily use.

It appears to me, Mr. Chairman, that we have gone far enough in providing for the advantage of large capitalists. The whole system is one which exempts the rich who can invest large sums in the bonds of the Government, and places all the burdens of taxation upon the poorer classes. This goes even a step further. This enables the bankers to hold in their vaults legal-tender notes which bear interest, and no bill which the gentleman has introduced this season for the purpose of preventing speculation in gold will have the pernicious effect upon the gold market which this clause of the bill will have.

Mr. STEVENS. I presume the gentleman wishes to make these notes a legal tender, as he would have them bear no interest, and he must intend them for circulation. True, he has not expressed himself in so many words. If he intends them as a loan, and could get anybody to take them without interest, it would be advantageous to the Government, I admit; but the only doubt about it in my mind is—and it is a pretty strong doubt—whether capitalists will take the loan, especially for a long period, and without interest. That is the whole proposition of the gentleman.

The amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. PRICE. I offer the following amendment, to come in at the end of the section:

Provided, That the Treasury notes hereby authorized shall be one, two, or three years' notes, with coupons, and may be convertible into bonds of the United States, as provided in section two of the act to which this is an amendment.

The object I have in offering this amendment is simply this: we talk here every day of the session, whenever there is any currency or financial question before the House, about decreasing the volume of currency, and we allege that the price of gold is attributable to the fact that the currency of the country is too large. That is true; and my amendment is designed to obviate that difficulty. If you make these notes seven-thirtieths you do not swell the volume of currency. I do not think any gentleman will say that he has seen any seven-thirtieth bonds circulated as currency. I propose to put this matter beyond a doubt by requiring that they shall be seven-thirtieths; and that, therefore, they shall not enter into the circulation, thereby increasing the price of gold in the market. If you leave the matter open the notes may be issued in some other shape, and may enter into the volume of currency, and thereby increase the price of gold. I am in favor of the bill and its general provisions, and I offer this as an additional reason why the amendment should be adopted. Any other shape these notes may take may swell the volume of currency, which every gentleman knows is too large now, and while we talk about it every day, the sun sets every day upon a larger volume of currency than it rose upon in the morning.

Mr. KASSON. I do not wish to duplicate the arguments already made, or the facts stated. I have but a few words to say upon this whole subject, and they are these: that the power to inflate the currency, which was given by Congress, and has been in force more than six months, is, by this bill, amended as proposed by the Committee of Ways and Means, reduced more than fifty per cent. We are informed by the Secretary of the Treasury that some remaining power, although very much less than that granted to his predecessor in office, but not used by him, is necessary for the successful administration of that Department, although he himself, I may perhaps properly state, is firmly opposed to any increase of the currency except under an emergency not now foreseen, where the safety of the Government may possibly depend upon it. And although the power has never yet been used, I am not myself disposed to tamper with this delicate machinery of financial operations between the Treasury Department and the financial world by taking entirely from the Secretary the power which his predecessor had, and which he asks to be continued, and which he will have, only in a less degree, when the recommendation of the committee is adopted.

I believe this committee will clearly see the propriety of leaving this partial and restricted power over the unissued balance under the second section of the bill. The Secretary of the Treasury may have no occasion to use it, but still, as it has been before a power in the Department, and as it becomes day by day less important in amount, as the seven-thirtieths are put upon the market, I would not interfere with it. This seven-thirtieth loan is being absorbed to the great satisfaction of the friends of the Treasury and of the country, and any incumbrance now put upon the policy which has made it successful endangers the future success of the balance of that loan.

Mr. PRICE. I want to say that what I said with reference to the increase of the volume of currency does apply to issues made by the Treasury Department. Every person knows that every day, and almost every hour, during the last two years, national banks have been chartered, and those banks put notes into circulation. It matters not from what source the volume of the currency is increased; the fact is patent that it is increased. I propose to make this popular loan of seven-thirtieths still greater by my amendment, and that we shall have seven-thirtieths and nothing else.

Mr. KASSON. There is no question that the issues of the national banks are somewhat increasing, though not so very largely, the volume of the currency, because a great many of the national banks are mere substitutes for or conversions of the State banks established under the old laws, and the notes of these institutions have been withdrawn from circulation.

Mr. ALLEY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the first two words of the pending amendment. No one, I know, in this House can be more opposed to increasing the volume of the currency than I am. I concur fully in the remarks of the gentleman from Iowa farthest from me; [Mr. PRICE,] so far as the disastrous influence upon the currency which an increase of its volume produces; but I say further, that the evil does not lie entirely or mainly with the issues of the Government currency, but beyond that, as much, or more, with the issues of the State banks. I am not in favor of entirely restricting the power of the Government to issue its own currency, in a time of war, like the present, although I am entirely opposed to the exercise of that power by the Secretary of the Treasury, except upon the most urgent necessity. As the gentleman from Iowa nearest to me [Mr. KASSON] has well remarked, the time may arrive, as it has been in the past, when it may be absolutely and indispensably necessary for the carrying on of the finances of the Government that this power should not only be lodged in the hands of the Secretary of the Treasury, but occasionally and discreetly exercised. Mr. Chairman, I believe with him that the evils growing out of this expansion of the currency are incalculable. The high price of gold to-day rests upon two causes. The first cause is the increase of the volume of the currency, and the next the want of confidence in the ability of the Government to meet all its promises to pay. If all the capitalists of the country believed fully and beyond doubt that this rebellion would be suppressed and this Government reestablished, then, sir, you would not find gold more than twenty per cent. above the lawful money of the country. But as it is, sir, that absolute and entire confidence does not exist, partly from fear of non-success and partly from fear of the action of the Government in allowing an increase of the volume of the currency, both national and State—an increase much more fearful in its effects from the action of State banks, sanctioned by the State Legislatures of the land, than from any other cause; and I hope that this Congress, before it adjourns, will tax out of existence all the State bank circulation of the country, and I hope that the power will be vested in the Secretary of the Treasury to issue legal-tender notes when it shall become absolutely necessary to carry on the finances of the Government. But I hope and believe that the Secretary of the Treasury will never exercise that power except upon the most urgent necessity, for I have very great confidence in that gentleman's judgment and discretion, and so believing, I am opposed to the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. DAWES. Will my colleague inform me why $100,000,000 of national currency does not inflate the currency just as much as $100,000,000 of State currency? It may not be so, but I would like to know why.

Mr. ALLEY. I will answer my colleague by saying that it does inflate the currency to just the same amount, but there is this difference: the Government not only saves the interest but has the control of the whole thing in its own hands, and if it is indispensable to the salvation of the Government that it should issue $100,000,000 of legal-tender currency, as it has been obliged to do in the past, then I am in favor of it for the same reason that I was in favor of making the Government issues a legal tender as an uncontrollable necessity and choice of evils.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I want to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts if I understood him aright. If I understand his position, he is opposed to the issuing of any more legal-tender notes, but is in favor of a law to authorize their issue, just as our Democratic friends said here the other day on the constitutional amendment, they were all opposed to slavery but were equally opposed to its prohibition.

Mr. ALLEY. Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to the exercise, as I said, of this power except upon the most urgent necessity. I was in favor of the passage of the legal-tender act, as I have said, as a matter of uncontrollable necessity, and upon no other ground. I am in favor now of conferring this power, because the time may arise when the very salvation of the Government depends on its exercise, and I would hold the Secretary of the Treasury responsible for a rigid adherence to this policy of decreasing rather than increasing the volume of the currency, which he has proclaimed over and over again as being sound policy. I have the most undoubting confidence in the integrity and discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury, and do not believe that he would, with this power given him, issue one dollar additional unless a necessity existed which was all-controlling. And so believing, I am in favor of giving him the power; but I am not in favor of his exercising it except in the emergency and upon the conditions I have named, and which I trust and believe may never occur. If I can understand logic at all, there is no inconsistency in the two positions. As I merely moved it pro forma, I now withdraw my amendment.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I move to amend the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa by striking out the first two words. I am not certain, Mr. Chairman, that I precisely understand the effect of the bill proposed by the Committee of Ways and Means. There was a law passed last session, the first section of which authorized the issuing of bonds of a particular form. The second section allowed $200,000,000 of the amount authorized by the first section to assume the form of Treasury notes, differing in form, susceptible of being applied to different purposes, and of a form which permitted them, I believe, to constitute an additional circulating medium. I understand the proposal now to be—and if I am in error I will be very glad to be corrected—to enlarge the quantity of money, or of value, that is authorized to be issued under the second section of the act of June 30, 1864, in the form peculiar to that second section. In other words, it is to extend the amount of those notes beyond the $200,000,000 in the form which the second section allows.

Mr. KASSON. Mr. Chairman, in compliance with the request of the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. DAVIS,] I desire to correct that misapprehension of his. There were $200,000,000 authorized under the first section of the act of June 30, 1864, to be issued in the peculiar bonds which he has referred to. That power was partially, and only partially, exhausted by the Treasury Department. Under the second section they have proceeded with the issuance of seven-thirties, and are still proceeding with it, until there is but a small portion, less than half, of the amount authorized by the second section remaining unissued. The Department cannot return to the first section and issue the balance unissued under it, in seven-thirties, for the first section does not authorize it. The effect of this bill, therefore, with the proviso proposed by the committee, is, so far from enlarging the power of the Secretary, to confine the exercise of that power to the balance unissued under the second section, and does not permit the Secretary to go back to the issue of bonds under the first section.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. Mr. Chairman, I am still not clear as to the operation of this bill, or what is intended to be accomplished under it. The first section of the act of June 30, 1864, authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to borrow, on the credit of the United States, $400,000,000, for which he is to issue a particular form of bond. The second section says that the Secretary of the Treasury may issue on the credit of the United States, and in lieu of an equal amount of bonds authorized by the preceding section, Treasury notes not exceeding $200,000,000. I understand, now, that the purpose is to allow a sum additional to the $200,000,000 provided for in the second section to be issued in the form authorized in the text.

Mr. KASSON. I trust the gentleman will be allowed to proceed, as I have consumed part of his time.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I am endeavoring to get, if possible, some intelligence of the matter before the House. At this moment I am absolutely at sea. As to doing it in five minutes, I cannot do it.

Mr. KERNAN. Mr. Chairman, as I understand it, the effect of passing the law proposed will be to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to add $70,000,000 of legal-tender notes to the legal-tender notes now in circulation. In other words there is now $70,000,000 unissued of what was authorized to be issued by the second section of the law of last June. The Secretary is authorized to issue that, and, in addition, to issue $130,- 000,000—in ten dollar notes, if he chooses to do so—which he has power now to issue in bonds under the first section of the act of June 30, 1864. We therefore confirm his authority to issue $70,000,000 legal-tender notes, which he now has, and, in addition, if we pass this act, he may issue $130,000,000 more in circulating notes bearing interest, but which are not legal tender. In other words, we give him by law authority to issue $130,000,000 in notes which he may now, as the law stands, issue in bonds.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I withdraw my amendment, and offer another one—to strike out the last word, merely for the purpose of making further inquiry.

The first section of the law of last session authorizes the issuing of $400,000,000 of bonds. The second section provides that $200,000,000 of that amount may be put in the shape of Treasury notes. The bill now reported from the Committee of Ways and Means declares that, in lieu of the bonds authorized to be issued by the first section of that act, the amount remaining unsold at this date may be issued in the form of Treasury notes, under the second section; so that the effect of the bill is to transfer $200,000,000 from the first section to the second section, or so much of the $200,000,000 as may now remain unissued—stated, I believe, at $70,000,000 or some larger amount. The Treasury notes issued under the second section may be and have been issued in such a form and of such denominations as to enter into the circulating medium of the country. A gentleman in this House showed me awhile ago a fifty dollar note professing to be issued under that section.

Mr. STEVENS. Under a subsequent section, not under that section. These notes were issued in exchange for legal tenders, with a view to the destruction of the latter.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. There is, Mr. Chairman, nothing to prevent just such notes being issued under the second section. The gentleman who is at the head of the Committee of Ways and Means proposes to offer a proviso limiting to some extent the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury under the second section; that is, providing that no legal-tender notes shall be issued. But, sir, something more is required. Although a note be not a legal tender—that is, although a man may not be coercible to receive it—yet if it be in form and amount susceptible of being used in ordinary exchange, its value is the same as if it were an absolute legal tender. It will pass from hand to hand to the same purpose; it will be received upon the credit of the same Government; it will have exactly the same effect in increasing, and therefore inflating, the currency.

Now, sir, I am not willing to put in the hands of any officer the power to issue one more dollar, if it can be, under ordinary circumstances, treated or used as or converted into a circulating medium. The credit of the Government can supply itself, and must supply itself, by loans, on long date or short date, for regular investments here or in Europe, without disordering the currency of the country or making people pay two or three prices for the necessities of life, or reducing the fixed incomes of persons to one half or one third of what they really are. There is no state of circumstances that can justify such a thing; there is certainly none now probable; and I will act only in view of what is probable, and will cast no vote that directly or expressly or by implication authorizes such a thing in one shape or another. Now, if it is possible to put this bill in such a shape as to prevent that construction being put upon it, it shall have my vote; otherwise, I cannot vote for it.

Mr. PRICE. I must oppose the amendment of the gentleman from Maryland. I desire that he shall not strike out any part of my amendment. I am in favor of assisting the Committee of Ways and Means in this matter; and I am only sorry to find that my efforts to assist them have been so little appreciated. Now, sir, this cuts down the amount of bonds to be issued, and increases the amount of Treasury notes to be issued; and all I have to say, and all that need be said, in reference to it is simply this: I propose that the Secretary of the Treasury shall not have power to issue anything but seven-thirties. The seven-thirties are a good investment; everybody appears to be in favor of them; and I propose that the Secretary of the Treasury shall not issue anything but the seven-thirties.

In reference to the argument that he cannot issue anything else, let me say one word. I hold in my hand a fifty dollar note, issued on the 15th of August, 1864, and under the authority of the act of June 30, 1864, the very act which this bill proposes to amend. A gentleman near me has another note of the same kind, a ten dollar note. So you see, Mr. Chairman, that, under that act, the Treasury Department does issue notes which go to swell the volume of the currency; and I propose that this shall not be done under this bill when it becomes a law.

Mr. STEVENS. I thought I had already sufficiently explained that those notes were not issued under the first and second sections, but under a subsequent section, authorizing the issuing of them for the exchange of legal tenders, with a view to the destruction of the latter. All the notes in that form have been issued under that section of the act.

Mr. PRICE. That explanation is legitimate and correct; but I think the committee must see that if the Secretary of the Treasury could, under the original law, issue these bills, which are legal tenders, and which go to swell the volume of the currency, he can, under the amendatory act now proposed, do the same thing, provided we do not restrain him in that respect.

Now, if the seven-thirties are what the country wants—and all the gentlemen say that they are—then I do the country and the Secretary of the Treasury no injustice in offering my amendment, because I only propose that the Secretary of the Treasury shall issue just what the country says it wants, and what the gentlemen on this floor, including the Committee of Ways and Means, say is demanded. I propose to restrain the Secretary of the Treasury from doing just what everybody says he ought not to do. What objection, then, can there possibly be to my amendment? Certainly none whatever.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I withdraw my amendment, and move to strike out the last four words.

Mr. Chairman, there is still a little confusion on this subject. The gentleman at the head of the Committee of Ways and Means states, what I have no doubt he is perfectly accurate in stating, that, as a matter of fact, no new legal-tender notes have been issued under this section, and that the fifty dollar note shown me by my friend from Ohio and the ten dollar note shown me by my friend from Massachusetts were issued under a particular clause of this section giving to the Secretary of the Treasury the right to cancel and destroy any Treasury notes heretofore issued under the authority of this act, and substitute therefor an equal amount of Treasury notes such as are authorized by this act. While it is true in point of fact that the Secretary of the Treasury may not have exercised his discretion to issue all of them in a shape susceptible of being used as currency, yet the power, it seems to me, still there exists, and it was because the power existed he was authorized under this very section to redeem in another form of security and issue these very notes in lieu of them.

I am not complaining of the Secretary of the Treasury. I do not see that he has abused the confidence reposed in him. I do not say that he has issued a single dollar of the original $200,000,000; but I say that the language of the section authorizes him, and that authority I object to.

Mr. KASSON. I wish to state further, in answer to the gentleman from Maryland, that the purpose I at least, as one of the members of the Committee of Ways and Means, sought to accomplish will be shown by interpreting the amendment proposed by that committee. It is provided that this act shall not be so construed as to give any authority for the issue of any legal-tender notes in any form. So far I use the language of the committee. Now for my own: "Beyond the balance unissued of the amount authorized by the second section of the act to which this is an amendment." I state that to be the purport of the committee's amendment, and certainly what I intended to be the purport of it. I desire to have it fully expressed, as much so as any member of this House.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. Let me interrupt the gentleman. Why issue any more legal-tender notes? Why not stop where we are?

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland, rose.

Mr. KASSON. Let me answer the gentleman from Pennsylvania. I will say that I know of no reason or necessity for the issuing of them at this time.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. Let us stop them.

Mr. KASSON. If from some disaster in the money market our troops should be deprived of the payment necessary for the support of their families, and we should not have means to recover from that disaster, where is the member who would deny the power to furnish depreciated currency, if gentlemen choose to call it so, and supply the wants of the Government?

Mr. SCOTFIELD. Where is the capitalist in the country, if that emergency should arise, who would not furnish the means to pay the troops?

Mr. KASSON. Mr. Chairman, I am sorry to say that I agree with the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, that these capitalists are not willing to loan money without some compensation; and I also think that they will not loan it unless they believe they will do better in loaning it to the Government.

I will now hear the question the gentleman from Maryland desires to ask.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I ask my friend from Iowa why he will not accept this as an amendment to the section?

Provided, That no note issued under this law shall be a legal-tender note, and no note shall be issued of a less denomination than $100.

That prevents it, first, from becoming a legal-tender note; and secondly, of being of such a denomination as will circulate as currency. I propose to offer the amendment at some proper time.

Mr. KASSON. I have no objection to so much of the amendment as fixes the denomination of $100. Touching the other I have no authority from the committee.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland, by unanimous consent, withdrew his amendment.

Mr. MORRILL. I move to strike out the last two words to make a few remarks.

Mr. Chairman, if the Committee of Ways and Means had concluded to report a bill here merely authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to obtain loans according to the form of the second section of the act of June 30, 1864, I suppose that all the purposes of the Secretary of the Treasury would have been accomplished. That is all this act will do if we pass it as it has been reported from the Committee of Ways and Means, with the amendment subsequently proposed by the chairman. We did not think it wise at the present time to give any authority to the Secretary of the Treasury to issue legal-tender notes in any form. That power, under the law of June 30, 1864, has not been exercised except to issue notes for those which have been canceled, and under a former law varying the form, so as to issue six per cent. compound-interest notes. But there has been no absolute increase of currency, but rather a diminution of even that class of notes under the administration of the present Secretary of the Treasury.

Now, as the Secretary will be bound by law, if this act shall pass, he will have the authority which was conferred upon him by the act of June 30, 1864, to issue legal-tender notes to the extent of sixty or seventy million dollars. With that we do not propose to interfere at all. The Secretary of the Treasury says that power is indispensable to him, and that it will be indispensable to anybody who administers the power which he now has, that he shall have that option remaining in order to enable him to negotiate loans on fair terms. That he considers to be all that will be necessary, and he will be perfectly content if no more power be granted. I trust that under the present circumstances in reference to the power, now nearly exhausted, for the issuing of these seven-thirties, we shall not restrict him as to the particular form.

It has been said that the power should be limited to the issuing of notes not less in amount than $100. Why, many of our soldiers will be glad to obtain these bonds in small amounts, and so will many small capitalists.

Mr. GARFIELD. I am very anxious to have the gentleman answer a question or two. The first section of the act of June 30, 1864, authorized the issuing of $400,000,000 in bonds. The second section allowed $200,000,000 of that amount to be issued in Treasury notes, compound interest, semi-annually, or in other forms. Gentlemen tell us that of that $200,000,000 not a dollar has been issued under that clause; and therefore the Secretary of the Treasury has the whole range of that $200,000,000.

Mr. STEVENS. Some of it has been issued in the shape of seven-thirties.

Mr. GARFIELD. Now, the bill before us asks that the remaining bonds of the first section, which could not be issued in notes, may also be issued in notes. It seems to me therefore, if, as gentlemen say, the Secretary has not used the power conferred upon him under the first clause of the second section, they want to give him still more power than that which he has already.

On the 12th day of this month there had been issued at the Treasury Department $120,000,000 of compound-interest notes, like those which have been exhibited on the floor this morning, six per cent. compound notes, interest payable semi-annually. I took the information myself from the Treasury Department.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Does the gentleman mean that we shall understand that $120,000,000 of the six per cent. notes have been issued under the authority contained in the second section of the bill? Have they not been issued to redeem previous notes, called United States notes?

Mr. GARFIELD. I do not say they were all issued under the authority of the act referred to, but I do say that the whole issue of notes of that description was $120,000,000 on the 12th of this month; and that they, together with all other notes issued by the Government of the United States, not including national currency, amounted to a fraction over $707,000,000.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I would inquire whether the $120,000,000 were not issued to cancel legal-tender notes?

Mr. GARFIELD. I understand they were issued to take up legal-tender notes, and that it is a mere transfer of the currency before the country. But the $200,000,000 of notes of this description authorized by the second section of the act of June 30, 1864, have not been used, and it is proposed to extend the power in reference to them.

Mr. MORRILL. I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. STEVENS. I move to strike out the last word of the amendment for the purpose of saying, once for all, that gentlemen do not seem to understand that these compound notes referred to are to be issued under the second section of the act of 1863, which will be found upon page 710 of the Statutes, of which $400,000,000 were authorized to be issued upon the conditions therein contained. By the bill of 1864, the Secretary of the Treasury was allowed to issue the same kind of notes, but merely to exchange for those. It was done in that way, and no other.

Now, if gentlemen wish to embarrass the Department, when we have gone as far as we think it proper to go in the proposed amendment, that no legal-tender notes shall be issued; if they wish to take away all authority to issue seven-thirties, without which the Department cannot get along, let them do it. It is for our friends to say whether they intend to sustain this Government or not.

I move that the committee rise for the purpose of closing all debate upon this bill.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SPALDING reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had under consideration the special order, being a bill (H. R. No. 677) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide ways and means for the support of the Government, and for other purposes," approved June 30, 1864, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. STEVENS. I move that all debate in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the special order be closed in one minute after its consideration shall be resumed.

Mr. HOLMAN. I believe the debate can be closed upon only one section at a time.

The SPEAKER. Only upon one section.

Mr. STEVENS. Then I move to close all debate upon the first section and the amendments pending thereto.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. STEVENS. I move to suspend the rules, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

So the rules were suspended; and the House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and resumed the consideration of the special order, the pending question being on the amendment offered by Mr. PRICE.

The question was taken, and the amendment was disagreed to—ayes eleven, noes not counted.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I move to add to the first section of the bill the following proviso:

Provided, That no notes issued under the law shall be a legal tender, and no notes shall be issued of a less denomination than $100.

The question was taken, and there were—ayes 22, noes 45; no quorum voting.

Mr. WILSON called for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. HOOVER and Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland, were appointed.

The committee divided, and the tellers reported—ayes 54, noes 39.

So the amendment was agreed to.

There being no further amendments offered to the first section of the bill, the Clerk read the second section.

Mr. STEVENS. I move to amend the second section by striking out all after the word "advisable" in the seventh line down to the end of the section, as follows:

And the Secretary of the Treasury is further authorized to issue bonds of the description issued under the authority of the act of 23d June, 1863, in pursuance of the notice for "proposals for loans," dated 8th September, 1860, to subscribers to that loan for the one per cent. deposited under said notice and not repaid: Provided, That the bonds so issued shall bear not more than five per cent. interest: And provided further, That fractional amounts may be repaid in lawful money of the United States.

Mr. Chairman, I make this motion because I am not quite satisfied, from the evidence which we have, that these bonds ought to be issued. It may be that hereafter we shall be supplied with sufficient evidence to induce us to grant these bonds. During the last Administration, proposals were made for bonds payable, I believe, in 1871, and a deposit was required at the time that proposal was made of one per cent. A large number of those who made proposals paid up, but the loan fell in value according to my information. Some say that it was because the Secretary of the Treasury did not call for it, and others say that it was because the loan thus fell; but for some reason or other a portion of those who had bid did not go on and comply with their contracts. The loan went below par. Now it is above par, and they come in and ask that the deposit which they had made as a forfeiture shall be given to them in bonds.

As I said before, I am not satisfied that it was the fault of the Government that they were not paid. My information about that is various. The Treasury Department has heard that Mr. Cobb did not call for them. The information from other very respectable sources is that they declined to pay it up. Therefore I do not wish to express an absolute judgment on the question now, and would rather have further time to consider it. If it is proper we can put it into another appropriation bill.

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Chairman, that obviates the necessity of some inquiries that I was about to make of the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means; but there are one or two other points on which I desire information. The gentleman will excuse me, for I have no other means of obtaining information on the subject. The first point on which I desire to make an inquiry is in regard to the amount of $4,000,000 specified in the fourth line of the second section. Why is that special sum selected? I wish also to make an inquiry about the sixth line—"or, if he shall find it expedient, in Europe at any time" to dispose of these bonds he may do it. Is it worth while to put in these words? What is the object of them?

Mr. STEVENS. When these bonds were issued, $4,000,000 worth of them were sent to London for the purpose of being disposed of. They were never disposed of. They remain on hand now in Europe. This is to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to dispose of them either here or in Europe, and to receive either our own money or the money of Europe for them; that is, not only our own gold coin, but European gold coin. That is the only object.

Mr. BROOKS. One further inquiry. I should like to know from the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means in whose hands these bonds are in Europe.

Mr. STEVENS. The Secretary of the Treasury does not name the parties in whose hands they are. But I understand they are deposited in the hands of Baring.

Mr. BROOKS. Hypothecated there?

Mr. STEVENS. No, sir. Deposited there for sale.

The question was taken on the amendment offered by Mr. STEVENS, and it was adopted.

Mr. STEVENS. I intended to offer an amendment, but as that offered by the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. DAVIS] has been adopted, I am not sure whether we will ask the House to pass the bill. I move now that the committee rise and report the bill to the House.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SPALDING reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration, as a special order, a bill (H. R. No. 677) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide ways and means for the support of the Government, and for other purposes," approved June 30, 1864, and had directed him to report the same back to the House with two amendments.

Mr. STEVENS. I move the previous question on the bill and amendments.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I ask my colleague to withdraw the motion so as to let me offer an amendment.

Mr. STEVENS. What is it?

Mr. SCOFIELD. I wish to amend the amendment offered by the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. DAVIS,] by inserting after the words "this law" the words "nor the act to which this is a supplement."

Mr. STEVENS. I rather think that if the House agree to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Maryland we shall not ask for the passage of the bill. I cannot withdraw the motion for the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered, which was first on the first amendment reported by the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, as follows:

Add at the end of the first section:

Provided, That no note issued under this law shall be a legal tender, and no note shall be issued of a less denomination than $100.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland, demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. KASSON. I wish to inquire of the Chair whether that amendment is not susceptible of division.

The SPEAKER. It is not. An amendment reported by the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union must be voted on as a whole.

Mr. KASSON. There are two distinct propositions in it.

The SPEAKER. The rule is that an amendment reported from the Committee of the Whole as an entire amendment is not divisible. If the amendment were offered in the House as an independent proposition, it would be divisible; but, being reported from the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, it must be voted on as a whole.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 60, nays 63, not voting 60; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Ancona, Augustus C. Baldwin, Blaine, Brooks, Broomall, James S. Brown, Chanler, Clay, Cole, Cox, Creswell, Henry Winter Davis, Dawes, Denison, Driggs, Eden, Edgerton, Eldridge, Finck, Ganson, Charles M. Harris, William Johnson, Kalbfleisch, Orlando Kellogg, Kernan, Lazenby, Long, Mallory, McDowell, Middleton, Samuel F. Miller, Noble, Odell, John O'Neill, Pendleton, Perry, Price, Samuel J. Randall, Rogers, James S. Rollins, Ross, Schenck, Scofield, Sloan, Spalding, William G. Steele, Strouse, Townsend, Tracy, Wadsworth, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Wheeler, Chilton A. White, Joseph W. White, Williams, Wilder, and Wilson—60.

NAYS—Messrs. Ames, Arnold, Ashley, Baily, John D. Baldwin, Baxter, Beaman, Blow, Boutwell, Boyd, Ambrose W. Clark, Cobb, Denning, Dixon, Donnelly, Eckley, Elliot, English, Frank, Garfield, Gooch, Grinnell, Hale, Holman, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Philip Johnson, Julian, Kasson, Kelley, Knox, Littlejohn, Loan, Longyear, Marvin, McAllister, McBride, McClurg, McIntode, Moorhead, Morrill, Daniel Morris, Amos Myers, Norton, Orth, Perham, Pike, William H. Randall, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Edward H. Rollins, Scott, Shannon, Stevens, Stuart, Thayer, Thayer, Upson, and Van Valkenburgh—53.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. James C. Allen, William J. Allen, Alley, Anderson, Blair, Bliss, Brandegee, William G. Brown, Freeman Clarke, Coffroth, Cravens, Thomas T. Davis, Dumont, Farnsworth, Grider, Griswold, Hall, Harding, Harrington, Benjamin G. Harris, Herrick, Higby, Hulburd, Hutchins, Francis W. Kellogg, King, Knapp, Law, Le Blond, Marcy, McKinney, William H. Miller, James R. Morris, Morrison, Leonard Myers, Nelson, Charles O'Neill, Patterson, Pomeroy, Pruyn, Radford, Robinson, Smith, Smithers, Starr, John B. Steele, Stiles, Thomas Voorhees, Ward, Webster, Whaley, Windom, Winfield, Benjamin Wood, Fernando Wood, Woodbridge, Worthington, and Yeaman—60.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Pennsylvania. I move to reconsider the vote just taken.

Mr. STEVENS. I move that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Pennsylvania. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 65, nays 64, not voting 53; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ames, Arnold, Baily, John D. Baldwin, Baxter, Beaman, Blow, Boutwell, Boyd, Ambrose W. Clark, Cobb, Denning, Dixon, Donnelly, Eckley, Elliot, English, Farnsworth, Frank, Gooch, Grinnell, Hale, Benjamin G. Harris, Higby, Holman, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Julian, Kasson, Kelley, Knox, Littlejohn, Loan, Longyear, Marvin, McBride, McClurg, McIntode, Moorhead, Morrill, Daniel Morris, Amos Myers, Leonard Myers, Norton, Charles O'Neill, Orth, Perham, Pike, William H. Randall, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Edward H. Rollins, Schenck, Shannon, Sloan, Stevens, Stuart, Thayer, Upson, Van Valkenburgh, and Whaley—65.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Ancona, Augustus C. Baldwin, Blaine, Brooks, Broomall, James S. Brown, Chanler, Clay, Coffroth, Cole, Cox, Cravens, Creswell, Henry Winter Davis, Dawes, Dawson, Driggs, Eden, Edgerton, Eldridge, Finck, Ganson, Garfield, Grider, Harding, Harrington, Charles M. Harris, Philip Johnson, William Johnson, Kalbfleisch, Orlando Kellogg, Kernan, Law, Le Blond, Long, Mallory, Marcy, Middleton, Samuel F. Miller, Noble, Odell, John O'Neill, Pendleton, Perry, Price, Samuel J. Randall, James S. Rollins, Ross, Scofield, Spalding, William G. Steele, Strouse, Townsend, Tracy, Wadsworth, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Wheeler, Chilton A. White, Joseph W. White, Williams, Wilder, and Wilson—64.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. James C. Allen, William J. Allen, Alley, Anderson, Ashley, Blair, Bliss, Brandegee, William G. Brown, Freeman Clarke, Thomas T. Davis, Denison, Dumont, Griswold, Hall, Herrick, Hulburd, Hutchins, Francis W. Kellogg, King, Knapp, Lazenby, McAllister, McDowell, McKinney, William H. Miller, James R. Morris, Morrison, Nelson, Patterson, Pomeroy, Pruyn, Radford, Robinson, Rogers, Scott, Smith, Smithers, Starr, John B. Steele, Stiles, Sweet, Thomas Voorhees, Ward, Webster, Windom, Winfield, Benjamin Wood, Fernando Wood, Woodbridge, Worthington, and Yeaman—53.

So the motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

The next amendment adopted in Committee of the Whole was read, as follows:

Strike out in the second section all after the word "advisable," as follows:

And the Secretary of the Treasury is further authorized to issue bonds of the description issued under the authority of the act of 23d June, 1863, in pursuance of the notice for "proposals for loans," dated 8th September, 1860, to subscribers to that loan for the one per cent. deposited under said notice and not repaid: Provided, That the bonds so issued shall bear not more than five per cent. interest: And provided further, That fractional amounts may be repaid in lawful money of the United States.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STEVENS. I ask unanimous consent to offer an amendment.

There was no objection.

Mr. STEVENS. I move to amend by adding the following:

Provided, That this act shall not be so construed as to give any authority for the issue of any legal tender notes in any form, beyond the balance unused of the amount authorized by the second section of the act to which this is an amendment.

On this amendment I call the previous question.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I ask the gentleman to allow me to move an amendment to his amendment, providing that these notes shall not be of a less denomination than $100.

Mr. STEVENS. I cannot yield for that purpose. That is the very part of the gentleman's amendment to which I most objected.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered, and under the operation thereof the amendment of Mr. STEVENS was adopted.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. STEVENS demanded the previous question on the passage of the bill.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

Mr. HOLMAN demanded the yeas and nays, and tellers on the yeas and nays.

Tellers were not ordered, and the yeas and nays were not ordered.

The bill was then passed.

Mr. STEVENS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT OVER.

Mr. SCHENCK moved that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

The motion was agreed to.

POST OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. STEVENS. I move to take up House bill No. 639, making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department during the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1866, in order that it may be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Is it the ordinary Post Office appropriation bill?

Mr. STEVENS. It is.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Then I hope it will be taken up and passed.

The bill was taken up and read.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. STEVENS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ABOLITION OF SLAVERY.

Mr. ASHLEY, by unanimous consent, presented joint resolutions of the Legislature of Ohio directing the Senators and requesting the members from that State to vote for the amendment to the Constitution of the United States in relation to slavery; which were laid on the table and ordered to be printed.

APPORTIONMENT OF NAVAL RECRUITS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in compliance with a resolution of the House, a report in regard to the apportionment of naval recruits among the different enrollment districts; which, on motion of Mr. PIKE, was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

CHANGE OF VESSEL'S NAME.

Mr. ODELL, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill changing the name of the William F. Storck, owned by Charles H. Marshall, to the International; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

And then, on motion of Mr. STEVENS, (at five minutes to four o'clock, p. m.) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

Monday, January 23, 1865.

Prayer by Rev. THOMAS BOWMAN, D. D., Chaplain to the Senate.

The Journal of Thursday last was read, containing the following passage:

"Mr. WILSON, from the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. R. No. 98) tendering the thanks of Congress to Major General Alfred H. Terry, and to the officers and men under his command, for their gallantry and good conduct in the recent capture of Fort Fisher, reported it with an amendment."

PROPOSED CORRECTION OF THE JOURNAL.

Mr. WILSON. I desire to move a correction of the Journal. I see that it states that the joint resolution of thanks to General Terry was reported back with an amendment. There was no title to the resolution as it was originally introduced, and it was reported back in a new draft in order to perfect it. I propose to amend the Journal by saying that it was reported back without amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is a proposition not in accordance with the fact. The resolution was reported back with an amendment, according to the Senator's own statement, and the Journal is right.

Mr. WILSON. The form of the resolution as reported was precisely the same as the original resolution, with the exception of the title. It was not intended to amend the resolution except to make a new draft to render it more perfect.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Journal is in accordance with the fact, however.

Mr. DIXON. Do I understand the Chair to decide that the Journal cannot be corrected?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Certainly not. The Journal now stands precisely according to the facts in the case, if the Chair understands the Senator from Massachusetts. The Journal can be enlarged by stating the additional fact that the amendment was precisely the original resolution with a title, if that be the fact.

Mr. DIXON. With deference to the Chair, I will say that the amendment of the title was a different amendment, entirely, and subsequent to the first proposition. The chairman of the committee stated that he reported the resolution with an amendment, and he then sent to the Chair the identical resolution without the crossing of a t or a dotting of an i, and the Senate then proceeded to accept that as an amendment. Afterward the chairman also recommended that a title should be added, and that amendment was made. The Journal states that the resolution itself was reported with an amendment, striking out the whole resolution and inserting another, which I, with due deference to the Chair, submit was incorrect in point of fact. I submit this amendment to the Journal, to make it read—

"The Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, to whom was referred the joint resolution," * * * "reported it without amendment and recommended its passage."

The VICE PRESIDENT. If that is in accordance with the fact, the Journal can be so amended, but that is not in accordance with the statement of the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. WILSON. I desire simply to say that the resolution as it went to the committee had no title. The committee reported it back in a new draft, not intending to call that an amendment, but with a view of having a title and having the proposition perfect; but the body of the resolution as reported and passed was word for word as it was introduced.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If the Senator will state the transaction precisely as it took place in the Senate, the Journal will be made to correspond with the fact.

Mr. WILSON. I should like to have it corrected by inserting the additional words proposed, and that will make the whole matter right.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If the Senator will state that he meant to report the resolution without amendment, the Journal will be so corrected if there be no objection.

Mr. CLARK. I submit that it can be of no consequence in the world to amend the Journal after these explanations. It should stand as it is.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Connecticut was understood to offer a proposition.

Mr. DIXON. I understand that the Senator from Massachusetts does state, as the Chair has suggested, that the committee intended to report the resolution back without amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If the Senator from Massachusetts so states, the Journal will be so corrected.

Mr. WILSON. I do.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Journal will be so corrected, if there be no objection.

Mr. CLARK. What was said by the Senator from Massachusetts was entirely correct. I occupied the chair at the time. He reported back the resolution in a new draft, and it was taken up as in a new draft and amended and passed. The Journal is right as to the precise point of fact.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The proposed correction will be made, the Chair hearing no objection.

CREDENTIALS PRESENTED.

Mr. CHANDLER presented the credentials of Hon. JACOB M. HOWARD, chosen by the Legislature of the State of Michigan a Senator from that State for the term of six years commencing

March 4, 1865; which were read and ordered to be filed.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a report of the Secretary of War, stating that he will cause a prompt response by the Adjutant General to resolutions of the Senate of the 10th instant calling for information in relation to major and brigadier generals in the service of the United States and officers of the regular Army of the United States; which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also laid before the Senate a report of the Secretary of the Interior, communicating, in obedience to law, copies of the accounts of the superintendents and agents having in charge the refugee Creek, Choctaw, Chickasaw, and Seminole Indians, for the third quarter of 1864, which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

He also laid before the Senate a report of the Secretary of the Interior, communicating, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate of the 12th instant, information in relation to the amount paid by that Department for attorney and counsel fees from June 30, 1863, to January 1, 1865, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also laid before the Senate a report of the Secretary of War, in response to a resolution of the 5th instant calling for information as to the number of men enlisted in the naval service who have been credited on the military quotas of the respective States and the principle and evidence on which such credits were allowed; which was ordered to lie on the table.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. WADE presented the petition of citizens of Ohio, praying that provision may be made for the exchange of Union soldiers now in the hands of the rebels; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

He also presented the memorial of a committee appointed at a convention of the publishers of weekly newspapers in Ohio, held at Columbus, January 4, 1865, praying for a repeal of the duty on printing paper; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented thirty-four petitions of officers in the military service of the United States, praying for an increase of the pay of Army officers; which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

Mr. WILSON presented the petition of Brigadier General T. J. Wood and other officers in the military service of the United States, praying for an increase of the pay of Army officers; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

He also presented fifty-five other petitions of officers in the military service of the United States, praying for an increase of the pay of Army officers; which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

Mr. HARLAN presented the memorial of Robert B. Riell, lieutenant United States Navy, praying that he may be allowed his proper promotion in the grade of commanders, which has been denied him in consequence of the report of a medical board; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. HOWARD presented the memorial of the officers of the 4th Michigan infantry, asking for an increase of pay; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

He also presented a petition of clerks in the Treasury Department, praying for an increase of salary; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. SUMNER presented a petition of acting assistant surgeons United States Army, praying for an increase of compensation and that they may be exempt from draft, and that they may be reimbursed for all expenses necessarily incurred in the line of their duties; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

He also presented a petition of citizens of the United States residing in New York, praying for the enactment of a law to secure a republican form of government and abolish and forever prohibit slavery in the United States; which was referred to the select committee on slavery and freedmen.

Mr. MORGAN presented the petition of Thomas Murphy, praying that he may be relieved from any obligation to the Government under his contract of the 26th of June, 1864, to furnish two hundred thousand blankets at ninety cents per pound; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. VAN WINKLE presented a petition of citizens of Baltimore, praying for the adoption of the metric system of weights and measures; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. COWAN presented a petition of officers in the military service of the United States, praying for an increase of compensation; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. GRIMES, the memorial and papers of John Ericsson, praying compensation for services in the construction of the machinery and propeller of the United States steamer Princeton, were ordered to be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Claims.

AMENDMENT OF THE CONSTITUTION.

Mr. WADE. I desire to present a joint resolution from the Legislature of Ohio, instructing the members of Congress from that State in relation to amending the Constitution of the United States relative to slavery, which I ask to have read.

The Secretary read, as follows:

Joint resolution instructing the members of Congress from this State in relation to amending the Constitution of the United States relative to slavery.

Whereas the declaration "that all men are created equal; that they are endowed by their Creator with certain inalienable rights; that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness; that to secure these rights, governments are instituted among men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed," is as true and self-evident now as when first enunciated by the fathers and founders of the Republic; and whereas the Constitution of the United States was ordained and established "to form a more perfect union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquillity, provide for the common defense, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty" to the people of the United States; and whereas slavery, or involuntary servitude, except as a punishment for crime, is a violation of the inherent and inalienable rights of men, a crime against justice and humanity, a disturber of the Union and of domestic tranquillity, a hindrance to the common defense, a spoiler of the public liberties, has inaugurated civil war, and is the cause of our national calamities: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the General Assembly of the State of Ohio, That our Senators and Representatives in Congress be requested to use their influence and vote for the proposition now pending in Congress to amend the Constitution of the United States so that neither slavery nor involuntary servitude, except as a punishment for crime whereof the party shall have been duly convicted, shall exist within the United States, or any place subject to their jurisdiction, and giving to Congress power to enforce such prohibition by appropriate legislation.

Resolved, That the Governor be requested to forward to each of our Senators and Representatives in Congress a copy of these resolutions.

JOHN JOHNSTON,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.
CHARLES ANDERSON,
President of the Senate.

Mr. WADE. Inasmuch as that subject has been acted upon by the Senate, I move that the resolutions lie upon the table, and be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BROWN presented resolutions passed by the constitutional convention of the State of Missouri instructing the Senators and Representatives from that State to cast their influence to secure the passage of the constitutional amendment to abolish slavery throughout the United States; which were ordered to lie upon the table, and be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had concurred in the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 607) to provide for an advance of rank to officers of the Navy and Marine corps for distinguished merit; and the bill (H. R. No. 598) making appropriations for the consular and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the year ending the 30th of June, 1866.

The message further announced that the House had passed the following Senate bill and joint resolution, without amendment:

A bill (S. No. 72) supplementary to an act entitled "An act to prescribe an oath of office, and for other purposes," approved July 2, 1862; and

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 99) tendering the thanks of Congress to Rear Admiral David D.

Porter, and to the officers, petty officers, seamen, and marines under his command, for their gallantry and good conduct in the recent capture of Fort Fisher.

The message further announced that the House had passed the joint resolution (S. R. No. 98) tendering the thanks of Congress to Major General Alfred H. Terry, and the officers and men under his command, with an amendment, in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested.

The message further announced that the House had passed the following bills and joint resolutions, in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested:

A bill (H. R. No. 631) to provide for holding courts in the western district of Missouri, and to prescribe the times thereof;

A bill (H. R. No. 664) for changing the time for holding the circuit courts in the district of Virginia;

A bill (H. R. No. 659) making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department during the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1866;

A bill (H. R. No. 677) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide ways and means for the support of the Government, and for other purposes," approved June 30, 1864;

A bill (H. R. No. 692) in reference to prosecutions for libel in the District of Columbia;

A bill (H. R. No. 649) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending 30th June, 1866;

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 139) of thanks to Major General George H. Thomas and the army under his command; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 140) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to give the necessary notice stipulated, pending the intention of the United States to purchase the building known as the Merchants' Exchange, New York city, now used for custom-house purposes.

DEFICIENCY BILL.

Mr. SHERMAN. I desire to present a report from the committee of conference on what is called the deficiency bill. I ask that it be read, and then I desire to submit a motion in regard to it.

The Secretary read, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill of the House, No. 620, to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1865, having met, after full and free conference have been unable to agree.

THADDEUS STEVENS,
GEORGE E. PENDLETON,
EDWIN H. WEBSTER,
Managers on the part of the House.
JOHN SHERMAN,
JOHN CONNESS,
CHARLES R. BUCKALEW,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the report.

Mr. SHERMAN. I desire to submit a motion that the Senate insist upon its amendments disagreed to by the House of Representatives, and ask for another committee of conference. Before that motion is put, I wish to call the attention of the Senate to the question of difference on this bill, and I should like to have the attention of the Senate and a deliberate vote upon the question between the two Houses. It is very important that this bill should be passed to-day or to-morrow. Many of the appropriations are necessary for the support of the Army and Navy. The bill contains an appropriation of over one hundred million dollars, nearly all of which is for the Army and Navy. The point of controversy between the two Houses grows entirely out of this clause of the deficiency bill:

To enable the Clerk of the House of Representatives to execute the resolutions of the House of July 4, 1864, directing payment of additional compensation to its officers, clerks, and other employes, and to the House reporters for the Congressional Globe, a sum sufficient for that purpose, being $37,991 40, is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, and the same is hereby added to the contingent fund of the House of Representatives; but no payment shall be made under this provision to any other persons than the clerks, officers, or other employes of the House, and the reporters for the Congressional Globe.

The Senate struck out this clause containing an appropriation for twenty per cent. extra compensation to the employes of the House for the last session, by a unanimous vote of the Committee on Finance, and also by the unanimous vote of the Senate, there being no discussion in the Senate, however, and no vote by yeas and nays. The House now insists that we shall retain this provision in the deficiency bill. The other amendments of the Senate are not disagreed to. Although they are not yet concurred in, there is no disagreement in regard to any of them except this one; and now we must treat the question deliberately, whether or not we will consent to the increase demanded by the House of twenty per cent. to their employes for the last session. The conferees on the part of the House insist that it is discourteous to the House to refuse to allow them to make this appropriation, and they evince some feeling on the subject. The appropriation by the resolution of the 4th of July last is admitted to be illegal. They first proposed to pay this $37,000 out of the contingent fund of the House. The Clerk of the House of Representatives refused to pay the money without the sanction of the Comptroller. The question was submitted to the Comptroller, and he refused to pass the vouchers for the payment of this money. I have before me the letter of the Comptroller, referring to the law on this subject, from which it is perfectly clear that neither the House of Representatives nor the Senate could provide for such an appropriation as this without a law authorizing it.

Senators who have been here for some years will remember the controversy about extra compensation to the employes of the two Houses. Prior to 1854 it was usual for both Houses to allow their employes twenty per cent. extra compensation at the end of each session. In 1854, however, the increase was made permanent, and all further allowances of that kind were prohibited by law. But subsequently, between 1854 and 1858, the custom again sprang up of allowing the usual extra compensation of twenty per cent. In 1858, as it was supposed, Congress cut off all pretense of that kind in either House by this provision:

"That no part of the appropriations which may at any time be made for the contingent expenses of either House of Congress shall be applied to any other than the ordinary expenditures of the Senate and House of Representatives, nor as extra allowance to any clerk, messenger, or attendant of the said two Houses, or either of them, nor as payment or compensation to any clerk, messenger, or other attendant of the said two Houses, or either of them, unless such clerk, messenger, or other attendant be so employed by a resolution of one of said Houses."

Under this law, no extra compensation has been allowed to the employes of the two Houses since 1858, and it was believed that this fifth section cut off all power by either House to allow extra compensation. When the House, however, passed the resolution of last session, the question was submitted to the Comptroller. He quoted this law and decided that he was not authorized to pay the money demanded by the House of Representatives, and he has refused to pay it. Thereupon this provision was inserted in the deficiency bill, to legalize the payment by the Comptroller, and the question is whether we shall assent to it.

I may say on behalf of the Committee on Finance that we determined unanimously that we would not approach the question of the increase of the compensation in this way; that the House had no more power to increase the pay of their officers than the Senate, or the President, or the Executive Departments. The law expressly forbids it, and expressly provides that the contingent fund shall not be used for increasing the pay of the employes. The law is clear and plain. We had to meet this question, therefore, not as a question of privilege on the part of the House, because the House had no power to raise the compensation of their employes; but we had to meet it as a question of policy, whether we will now consent to increase the compensation of our own employes. Looking at the question in that light, when we came to examine the pay of the employes of the Senate and the House of Representatives, we found that it was already higher in proportion than the pay of corresponding officers in the Executive Departments. Besides that, as the employes of the two Houses only work during the session, and many of them are paid for the whole year, they have that advantage over the employes of the Executive Departments. We therefore could not justify an extra allowance to our own employes, to those who are around us and most attached to us, without at the same time allowing this extra compensation to extend to all the Executive Departments. No reason can be given for increasing the pay of our employes here that will not equally apply to all the Departments.

The proposition now before the Senate applies only to the employes of the House, and is confined to the House. Why should the pay of the employes of the House be increased and not those of the Senate? Why should the pay of the employes of Congress be increased and not those of the Departments? How could we approach this question of increase of compensation to our own employes alone, when we have petitions from thousands of officers, especially line officers of the Army, who are suffering from the deficiency of their pay owing to the condition of the currency? The Committee on Finance deemed that they could not in justice to the country, and in justice to their own reputations, increase the pay of the employes of Congress when we refuse to increase the pay of the Army and Navy. Under these circumstances we had but one course left, and that was to strike out the appropriation and to insist that it should be left out. Let us approach the question of the increase of the compensation of the officers of the Government as a separate and distinct proposition. If we are compelled by the circumstances of the time to increase the pay of any one, we certainly ought in the first instance to increase the pay of those who are suffering from an inadequacy of pay in the Army, the line officers of the Army; but to increase the pay of the employes of the House of Representatives alone, without providing for any other officers of the Government, seems to be unjust and improper; and therefore it was that the conferees on the part of the Senate insisted that this appropriation should be omitted. If, however, the Senate think differently, we have nothing to say. I submit the question now to the Senate, so that we may take a vote upon it. The motion I now submit is to still further insist and to allow the House of Representatives to have another vote. That does not defeat the bill, because the House may recede from this appropriation. I cannot say what the House may desire to do. It does seem to me that the House will not, in the face of the absolute want of the money appropriated in the bill for the benefit of the Army, insist on delaying the bill for this matter. The Secretary of War told me yesterday that one or two of these appropriations are now indispensable necessary, that he wants them to-day or to-morrow, and that the bill should be passed at once. The spectacle of hanging up this bill in order to secure the passage of twenty per cent. additional pay to a few civil employes of the Government is one certainly which I do not wish to regard. We may recede and pay these employes, but if we do so we enter upon a course which, in my judgment, will be injurious to the public service, and dangerous in the extreme in the present condition of our finances. I feel disposed, therefore, although the amount is comparatively small, to make a point of it and stand upon it.

There is another thing. Neither House ought to put upon an appropriation bill a measure that does not receive the free assent of the other. Every portion of the appropriation bill ought to be assented to freely by both Houses. Certainly after the Senate has deliberately acted on the question, we ought not to be required to take from the national Treasury this sum of money against our will merely to secure the passage of the deficiency bill. It seems to me that is the correct principle; it is one upon which I have always acted as a member of Congress, that where either House objects to any independent appropriation bill, to abandon it, because the appropriation bill ought not to be used as a medium to force through Congress an objectionable proposition to either House.

Mr. McDOUGALL. Mr. President, I do not think that one wrong justifies another, nor do I see the justice of the argument presented by the Senator from Ohio, which reasons that because the line officers of the Army are not properly compensated the clerks should not be properly compensated. I know very well that they are not receiving a compensation sufficient for their services. I know very well, so far as the officers of the Army are concerned, that a lieutenant in the service cannot pay his mess bill and his washing bill. That is a matter of fact. They are not properly compensated. We have been playing the demagogue in both Houses of Congress and voting high compensation to the privates and nothing to the officers, because there are a great many privates to every officer. I think the increase of compensation to the clerks is a matter of justice, as would be the increase of compensation to officers of the Army; but because one is right and the other is right, and one is presented first, that is no good reason why the first should be ignored. There is good reason why it should be done; and when the time comes for giving proper compensation to officers of the Army so that they may be able to live and not have to draw on their friends at home for necessary current expenses, I will vote for that.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Without at this time going into the question whether we should increase generally the salaries of officers of the Government in consequence of the depreciation of the currency in which they are paid, I think there are other reasons entirely sufficient why the Senate should not accede to a proposition to add twenty per cent. to the compensation of the House employes. I very well recollect since I have been in the Senate the difficulty that arose out of this species of legislation, and the action which gave rise to the passage of the law of 1858 referred to by the Senator from Ohio. In the closing hours of the session there would always be found some member of the body who, in the superabundance of his kindness to the employes about the Senate, (that have always since I have been here been very accommodating and kind and have ingratiated themselves into the good feelings of the members of the body,) would make a motion of this character, that twenty per cent. additional be paid them as a compensation. It was always exceedingly unpleasant on the part of any member of the Senate to object to such motions, and they were suffered to prevail at several sessions against the better judgment of members, because of the disinclination there was to interpose an objection in a small matter of that kind; but finally Congress, in 1858, determined to relieve itself of this legislation by providing that money should not be paid on a resolution of this character passed by either House. The salary of the officers was fixed at what was thought to be a proper sum, and it was determined to leave it there, and I believe that this body, and so far as I am aware the House of Representatives, for the last six or seven years, has refused, until the present occasion, to pass a vote of this character. Now, sir, if we concur in this provision of the bill adopted by the House of Representatives, we open the door again; and I do not care what you fix the pay of the employes of the two Houses at, there will, at the conclusion of a long session, when we all feel the services that have been rendered by the employes of the body, be somebody who, in his kindness, will move to give them extra compensation; and it would be done almost as a matter of course, done usually on the last night of the session, perhaps not half a dozen Senators present sometimes when it is done, and thus we should fall into the old practice again.

If it is necessary to raise the salaries it ought not to be done in this way. It is not in accordance with the law that it should be so done; and I rejoice that the Committee on Finance of this body has taken the position it has taken, and I am sure that the House of Representatives will not insist upon the defeat of a bill of importance to the country rather than lose an appropriation made in this particular way, because the appropriation may be brought up in a bill if it is thought desirable hereafter to increase the pay of the employes of the two Houses of Congress, or of either House. The refusal to concur in this provision of the bill will not prevent the passage of a law that shall give them additional pay if it is thought advisable to pass it; but I am quite sure that the House of Representatives will not insist upon a resolution being enacted into a law which all must admit who examine the legislation of the country was passed contrary to the law. I hope the vote of the Senate will be unanimous in sustaining the action of the committee of conference on the part of the Senate in refusing to agree to this proposition of the House of Representatives.

Mr. DAVIS. I am in favor of making this compensation to the officers, not only of the House of Representatives, but of the Senate. In addition to that I am in favor of making additional compensation to the members of the Senate and of the House of Representatives. I am in favor of paying a just and reasonable salary to every class of officers and every officer of the Government who does not receive such compensation. I have been in both Houses when the additional compensation at the close of the session referred to by the honorable Senator from Illinois has been usually voted; but that is totally a different case from the one under consideration.

There was then no depreciation of the money of the country in which those officers were paid, and the extra allowance that was made to the officers of the House of Representatives in such states of case as that referred to by the honorable Senator was simply a bounty or an act of special justice. Now, sir, I am in favor of an act not only of enlarged but of universal justice to every officer and every employe of the Government.

The honorable Senator from Ohio remarked that the officers of the Army were more poorly paid than any other class of officers or employes under the Government. I do not think so. I think the members of the two Houses of Congress, who can engage in no other business, all of whose time for the year is necessarily absorbed by their service in Congress, and who have families at home or here to support, are the most poorly compensated of all the officers or employes of the Government. I believe in charity, and I believe in the old proverb, that charity begins at home. I am in favor of an additional compensation to the members of the Senate for two reasons: first, because it is just; and second, because I feel that I am entitled to more money than I receive, and I am in need of it.

We were promised $3,000 compensation per annum in money, and there is nothing that is money but gold or silver, and all the legislation of Congress cannot make any other thing money than gold or silver, and the commercial world will not receive anything but gold or silver as money. Now, what have we been paid for the last two years for that compensation that is tendered by an act of Congress to the members of the two Houses? Between forty and fifty cents for each dollar. I say that that is an injustice to the members of Congress. I say that members of Congress cannot live upon that compensation. I say that that is a less rate of compensation than has been contracted by the Government to pay them, and I say that it is a less rate of compensation than the Government ought to pay.

Now, sir, for one, I am willing to vote justice to every class of officers, and, as I said before, to every officer and every employe under the Government. If you satisfy my reason that such a class or such an officer does not receive a fair compensation, I am always ready to vote for a sum that will make it a just and a reasonable compensation. The members of the two Houses of Congress who live within a short distance from the metropolis, and who get little or nothing in the way of mileage, are, I think, most unjustly dealt with by the present compensation which they receive. It is a matter of imperative justice and right to them that they should receive an additional rate of compensation. I believe that the officers of the House of Representatives ought not to have been grouped together, but that the members of the two Houses and the officers of the two Houses ought to have been put together in a joint resolution or a bill for that purpose, and that a fair and adequate compensation should have been provided collectively for them all. I prefer that the matter should take that course.

If the officers of the Army do not receive a fair and adequate compensation it is the duty of Congress to afford it. It is the right of the officers of the Army that they should have a fair compensation, one that will enable them to live and to support their families; but because the proposition does not embrace the officers of the Army it is no reason why justice when it may be done shall not be done to the officers of the House or of the Senate or to the members of the two Houses. I will vote myself that the Senate adhere to its position for the purpose of getting this question as it relates to the members of the two Houses of Congress and the officers of both Houses before the two Houses in a more legitimate mode, by a joint resolution or by an act to be passed for that purpose, which shall establish such a rate of compensation as shall be fair and reasonable. I am not going to vote against such a proposition because it does not include all the classes of officers that ought to be embraced by such a measure. I would vote to pass a measure in that form and then you might bring up all the residue of the officers of the Government, either by classes or in the aggregate, and I would vote for the same just measure of compensation to them all.

Mr. MORGAN. In order to test the sense of the Senate on the motion of the honorable Senator from Ohio, in which I fully concur, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. FOOT. Before the vote is taken, I deem it due to my colleague [Mr. COLLAMER] to say that he is detained from his seat and attendance in the Senate on account of sickness.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 35, nay 1; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Buckalew, Chandler, Clark, Conness, Davis, Dixon, Farwell, Foot, Foster, Grimes, Hale, Harlan, Harris, Henderson, Hendricks, Howe, Lane of Indiana, Morgan, Morrill, Nesmith, Pomeroy, Powell, Richardson, Riddle, Saulsbury, Sherman, Sprague, Sumner, Ten Eyck, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Wilkinson, Willey, and Wilson—35.

NAY—Mr. McDougall—1.

ABSENT—Messrs. Brown, Carlile, Collamer, Cowan, Doolittle, Harding, Hicks, Howard, Johnson, Lane of Kansas, Ramsey, Wade, and Wright—13.

So the motion of Mr. SHERMAN was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the Vice President was authorized to appoint the members of the second committee of conference on the part of the Senate; and Messrs. CLARK, TRUMBULL, and POWELL were appointed.

BILL RECOMMENDED.

Mr. WILKINSON. I move that the bill (S. No. 295) making additional grant of lands to the State of Minnesota, in alternate sections, to aid in the construction of a railroad in said State, which was introduced at the last session and referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and by that committee reported back, as I understand, without any action upon it, be taken up and recommended to the Committee on Public Lands.

The motion was agreed to.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana, from the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, to whom was referred the memorial of the Legislature of Oregon, in favor of the location of a national foundry, arsenal, and manufactory of arms at the falls of the Willamette, near Oregon City, in that State, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

Mr. TRUMBULL, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the memorial of William A. Hammond, late Surgeon General of the United States Army, praying that inquiry may be made into all the circumstances connected with his recent trial and dismissal, and that the Senate will suspend action in the matter of confirming his successor in office until such inquiry shall have been made, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 404) to secure impartiality in the administration of justice in the District of Columbia, reported adversely, and moved the indefinite postponement of the bill; which was agreed to.

Mr. DAVIS, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. R. No. 109) for the relief of Captain M. M. Hawes, submitted an adverse report; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. SHERMAN, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 689) to provide for Acting Assistant Treasurers and depositaries in certain cases, reported it with an amendment.

PRINTING OF A BILL.

On motion of Mr. SHERMAN, it was Ordered, That the bill (S. No. 493) to amend the act entitled "An act to encourage immigration," approved July 4, 1864, and the act entitled "An act to regulate the carriage of passengers in steamships and other vessels," approved March 3, 1855, and for other purposes, be printed for the use of the Senate.

CONDUCT OF GENERAL PAINE AT PADUCAH.

Mr. NESMITH. The Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, to whom was referred a resolution introduced by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. POWELL] calling for the report of a military commission appointed to investigate the conduct of Brigadier General Paine, have directed me to report it back with an amendment and recommend its passage, and I ask for its present consideration.

Mr. CLARK. I desire to inquire of the Senator from Oregon if that resolution is likely to lead to any debate?

Mr. NESMITH. I think not. There was a pretty general discussion on the subject a few days since, and it seemed to be conceded that the resolution should pass with proper amendments.

Mr. CLARK. I have no objection to its present consideration, provided it does not lead to debate, and with the understanding that if it does lead to debate it shall be laid aside.

Mr. NESMITH. I think it will not lead to debate.

By unanimous consent, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

The amendment of the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia was to strike out all after the word "resolved" and insert the following:

That the Secretary of War be directed, if not incompatible with the public interests, to transmit to the Senate the report and evidence taken by the military commission, of which Brigadier General Speed S. Fry was president, appointed to investigate the conduct of Brigadier General Paine, of the United States Army, in and about Paducah, Kentucky; the defense of Brigadier General Paine; the review of Judge Advocate Holt, and all the papers relating to the case.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POWELL. I think the resolution ought to be further amended by striking out the words "if not incompatible with the public interests," so as to make it in the usual form.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That amendment will be made, if there be no objection. The Chair hears none.

The resolution, as amended, was agreed to.

MINERAL LANDS.

Mr. HARLAN. A few days before the close of the last session a joint resolution (H. R. No. 99) "reserving mineral lands from the operation of all acts passed at the present session granting lands or extending the time of former grants," was passed by the Senate, but through some inadvertence was not sent back to the House of Representatives, so that it failed then to become a law. In order to secure the object now, some amendments are necessary, which I am authorized by the Committee on Public Lands to propose; and to reach that stage I move first to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HARLAN. I now move to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was ordered to a third reading.

The motion was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution is now open to amendment.

Mr. HARLAN. The committee propose to strike out the words "present session" and insert "first session of the Thirty-Eighth Congress," and to add to the resolution "unless otherwise specially provided in the act or acts making the grant," so as to make the resolution read:

That no act passed at the first session of the Thirty-Eighth Congress granting lands to States or corporations to aid in the construction of roads, and for other purposes, or to extend the time of grants heretofore made, shall be so construed as to embrace mineral lands, which in all cases shall be and are reserved exclusively to the United States, unless otherwise specially provided in the act or acts making the grant.

The amendments were agreed to.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the resolution to be read the third time.

The joint resolution was read the third time, and passed. Its title was amended by striking out the words "present session" and inserting "first session of the Thirty-Eighth Congress."

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills and joint resolution from the House of Representatives were severally read twice by their titles, and referred as indicated below:

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 139) of thanks to Major General George H. Thomas and the army under his command—to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

A bill (H. R. No. 631) to provide for holding courts in the western district of Missouri, and to prescribe the times thereof—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

A bill (H. R. No. 659) making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department during the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1866—to the Committee on Finance.

A bill (H. R. No. 664) for changing the time for holding circuit courts in the district of Virginia—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

A bill (H. R. No. 677) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide ways and means for the support of the Government, and for other purposes," approved June 30, 1864—to the Committee on Finance.

A bill (H. R. No. 692) in reference to prosecutions for libel in the District of Columbia—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

A bill (H. R. No. 649) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1866—to the Committee on Finance.

NEW YORK CUSTOM-HOUSE.

The joint resolution (H. R. No. 140) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to give the necessary notice stipulated pending the intention of the United States to purchase the building known as Merchants' Exchange, New York city, now used for custom-house purposes, was read twice by its title.

Mr. CLARK. I desire to say that the matter of that resolution was before the Committee on Finance this morning, and they were unanimously of opinion that it is desirable to purchase the property, and I ask the consent of the Senate to pass the resolution at once, as the time of giving the notice expires in the present month.

By unanimous consent the joint resolution was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

HENRY A. BRIGHAM.

Mr. DAVIS desiring to move a reconsideration of the vote by which the bill (S. No. 212) for the relief of Henry A. Brigham was passed, a message was directed to be sent to the House of Representatives requesting the return of the bill, and on its being returned, the motion to reconsider was made by Mr. Davis and entered.

SLAVES TAKEN INTO THE ARMY.

Mr. POWELL submitted the following resolution, and asked for its present consideration:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to inform the Senate why he has not appointed "a commission in each of the slave States represented in Congress charged to award to each loyal person to whom a colored volunteer may owe service a just compensation, not exceeding $300 for each colored volunteer," as he was directed to do by the twenty-fourth section of the act approved February 24, 1864, entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act for enrolling and calling out the national forces and for other purposes,'" approved March 3, 1863.

Mr. CONNESS objecting to the consideration of the resolution, it lies over under the rules.

CONTRACTS OF TREASURY AGENTS.

Mr. GRIMES submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to communicate to the Senate a full statement of all contracts executed by one Hanson A. Risley, an agent of the Treasury Department or of the United States Government, since the 4th day of July last, specifying the name or names of the parties with whom the contracts were made, the name or names of the persons at whose solicitation or upon whose recommendation the contracts were made, the date of each contract, the amount and description of goods, property, or material thus contracted for, where to be procured, or where represented to be situated at the date of the contract, when to be delivered to the agent of the Treasury, and at what price.

Resolved further, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to communicate to the Senate the same particulars in relation to any other contracts made by Treasury agents that have been returned to or that are known to the Department.

INTERNAL REVENUE COLLECTIONS.

Mr. WILSON submitted the following resolution:

tion; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and is hereby, directed to furnish the Senate, on or before the 15th day of February next, a statement showing the amount of collections in each internal revenue collection district, and the amount of moneys deposited in authorized depositories or paid to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue on drafts or otherwise by the collectors of each district from the date when the excise act went into operation to the 30th day of June, 1864, with the differences between the amounts collected and the amounts deposited or paid over as aforesaid by the collectors in each district, and the total differences in the amounts for said period.

GOVERNMENT DEPOSITS IN NATIONAL BANKS.

Mr. WILSON submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and is hereby, directed to furnish the Senate, on or before the 15th day of February next, separate and detailed statements showing the amount of public moneys deposited and the amount withdrawn from each of the national banks during each month from the date of their organization to June 30, 1864, with the difference between the sums deposited and withdrawn monthly, in each case, and the amount of the differences.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. WILSON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 406) for the benefit of officers of the Army in the field; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

Mr. MORRILL asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 407) for the relief of Lieutenant Commander Cilley, of the United States Navy; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. DIXON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 101) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States; which was read twice, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. The proposed amendment is to insert in lieu of the fifth paragraph of the ninth section of the first article of the Constitution this clause: "Congress shall have power to lay a tax or duty on articles exported from any State."

Mr. MORRILL asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 103) for the relief of A. G. Bodfish; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. CLARK asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 102) declaratory of the sense of Congress upon negotiations and terms of settlement with the rebels; which was read twice, and ordered to be printed. It declares that no negotiations, terms of settlement, concessions, or compromises should be entered into, proposed, yielded, or made with the rebels, directly or indirectly, until they have manifested their implicit and unconditional submission to the authority of the Government; and that, however much peace may be desired, the present war must be waged with all the energy and resources of the Government until such submission shall be secured, and the supremacy of the Constitution and laws established over the entire territory of the United States as heretofore claimed.

SPENCER AND HUBBARD.

On motion of Mr. TRUMBULL, the bill (S. No. 136) for the relief of A. T. Spencer and Gurdon S. Hubbard was read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to instruct the Postmaster General to audit and adjust the account of A. T. Spencer and Gurdon S. Hubbard, for carrying the United States mail from Chicago, Illinois, to Mackinac, Sault Ste. Marie, Marquette, Copper Harbor, Eagle Harbor, Eagle River, and Ontonagon, Michigan; La Pointe, and Superior, Wisconsin, during the years from 1854 to 1859, inclusive, and allow therefor such amount as to him shall appear just and equitable, not exceeding the amount allowed for the same service to the party who afterwards performed the same under contract; and the sum so found due is to be paid out of the Treasury.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ISAAC R. DILLER.

Mr. HALE. On Thursday last a private bill, which was reported by the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. DAVIS,] was, as he says, arrested by my act, the morning hour having expired while I was on the floor. I move now that that bill be taken up, so that it may be disposed of.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 94) for the relief of Isaac R. Diller, the pending question being on the amendment of the Committee on Claims to reduce the appropriation from $3,655 55 to $3,000.

Mr. HALE. I do not wish to say much about this bill. It is a bill to pay an old consul for services rendered prior to the coming in of this Administration. I was remarking when I was on the floor the other day that the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations had told us that there were applications, some of them very urgent and pressing, coming from all parts of the world where we have consuls, stating that their compensation is inadequate now; but the Senate, on a case brought before them, where there was a unanimous report from the Committee on Commerce, and the recommendation of the Secretary of State, refused to increase the salary of one of these officers, the consul at Halifax. It was understood then to be the general policy of the Senate not to increase compensation at this time. I simply want to say that as we have refused to pay for present services, I think that to go back and open an old account will be setting a worse precedent than would the increase of compensation in the future, and that all the gentlemen who make these applications now, when their compensation is confessed to be inadequate, will have a vastly better claim upon our successors than the present ones have upon us. I hope the bill will not be passed.

Mr. DAVIS. I hope this bill will be passed. I think it is much safer to legislate for the dead than for the living, and that there will be a much less amount put up as claims due the dead than to the living. But I will state one or two facts in connection with this claim. Mr. Diller was consul at Bremen; his consular duties there were very heavy and expensive. His rate of compensation was $2,000 a year. Since he went out of office the compensation for that consulship has been increased to $3,000. It is in proof in the case that the actual amount which he paid for clerk hire was over $3,300, and that this clerk service was indispensably necessary to enable him to get along with the duties of his office. This claim originated in the payment of clerk hire and in the advance of money by the consul to American sailors who were in a destitute condition and who applied to him for assistance to return to their native country. The other House passed this bill for his benefit, appropriating over $3,600. The Committee on Claims reduced the amount to $3,000. The case was before the Committee on Foreign Relations two years ago, and the chairman of that committee made a very elaborate report setting forth all the facts. It was submitted by that committee to the State Department, and the Secretary of State recommended an appropriation of $3,000 for extra compensation to this consul. The Committee on Foreign Relations considered the subject. The learned and laborious chairman examined it very attentively and made a very elaborate report, which was read a few days ago to the Senate, and that vigilant and able and economical chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations himself recommended an appropriation of $3,000 to satisfy the claims of all descriptions of Mr. Diller. In my own judgment, for clerk hire and for money advanced to indigent seamen, he is fully entitled to the $3,655 55 which the House of Representatives agreed by the bill which it passed to pay him. In obedience, however, to the instructions of the Committee on Claims, I reported the bill with an amendment reducing the amount to $3,000. In my judgment, that is considerably less than this man is entitled to upon the sheerest principles of justice. I hope the bill will pass.

Mr. HALE. I move that the bill be indefinitely postponed.

The motion was not agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment reported from the Committee on Claims reducing the sum from $3,655 55 to $3,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in and ordered to be engrossed.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time; and it was read the third time.

Mr. HALE. I ask for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. ANTHONY. I understand that this bill is to pay for disbursements actually made for destitute American seamen in the port where this man was consul, and I shall therefore vote for it.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 26, nays 9; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Buckalew, Carlile, Clark, Conness, Cowan, Davis, Harris, Henderson, Hendricks, Lane of Indiana, Morgan, Morrill, Hendricks, Pomeroy, Powell, Richardson, Riddle, Saulsbury, Sprague, Sumner, Ten Eyck, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Wilkinson, and Wiley—26.

NAYS—Messrs. Chandler, Dixon, Farwell, Foot, Foster, Grimes, Hale, Harlan, and Wilson—9.

ABSENT—Messrs. Brown, Collamer, Doolittle, Harding, Hicks, Howard, Howe, Johnson, Lane of Kansas, McDougall, Ramsey, Sherman, Wade, and Wright—14.

So the bill was passed.

THANKS TO GENERAL TERRY.

The Senate proceeded to consider the amendments of the House of Representatives to the joint resolution of the Senate (S. No. 98) to present the thanks of Congress to Major General Terry and the officers and men under his command, which were in line four before the words "major general" to insert the word "brevet," and to amend the title of the resolution by inserting the word "brevet" before the words "major general."

Mr. TRUMBULL. I should like to inquire of some member of the Committee on Military Affairs, as I do not see the chairman in his seat at present, whether that amendment is in accordance with the facts. I do not know whether it is or not. Perhaps the Senator from Indiana [Mr. LANE] can give the information.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. He is a full brigadier general in the regular Army, and a brevet major general of volunteers.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Then the amendment of the House is in accordance with the facts?

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. Yes sir.

Mr. SUMNER. Is it customary to insert those details?

Mr. DIXON. I think it is not. I think it is improper to insert the word "brevet."

Mr. SUMNER. I think so too.

Mr. DIXON. General Terry has the rank of a major general, but does not receive the pay.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. He has been confirmed as a brevet major general, and will go on the Army Register with that rank, and certainly in giving him a vote of thanks we should be precisely correct as to his title.

The amendments were concurred in.

CONFISCATION OF REBEL PROPERTY.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I desire to give notice that to-morrow I shall call up the joint resolution from the House of Representatives, No. 18, to amend a joint resolution explanatory of "An act to suppress insurrection, to punish treason and rebellion, to seize and confiscate the property of rebels, and for other purposes," approved July 17, 1862. That resolution was reported back from the Committee on the Judiciary adversely. When the resolution comes up to-morrow, if I can get the attention of the Senate to call it up, my object will be to offer an amendment to it to repeal so much of the joint resolution to which this refers, passed in 1862, as limits the confiscation of the real estate of rebels to the life estate, so that their estates may be absolutely confiscated. I give notice of it now, because there was a difference of opinion in the Committee on the Judiciary, a majority being opposed to the repeal of the joint resolution of 1862. When this House resolution shall come up I intend to move, as a substitute for it, a clause repealing the joint resolution of 1862.

Mr. SUMNER. I will remind the Senator that, on his motion, the Senate has already adopted that proposition and attached it to the bill known as the Freedmen's Bureau bill. That bill is at this moment before a committee of conference of the two Houses. That committee has had a session to-day, and one on Saturday and one on Friday, and we hope to be able to report at an early day; and in our report, I have no doubt, we shall preserve the proposition moved by the Senator.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I was not aware that a committee of conference was acting on that bill. It is immaterial to me how we attain the object. I will not press action upon this joint resolution under those circumstances until the committee shall have had time to act.

ST. LOUIS ARSENAL.

Mr. GRIMES. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 382, to provide for the better organization of the pay department of the Navy.

Mr. BROWN. If the Senator will permit me, I should like to call up a local bill, which it will not take more than a moment to pass.

Mr. GRIMES. This is a general bill.

Mr. BROWN. Mine is a special bill to repeal an old law in relation to the St. Louis arsenal, and it is desirable it should be passed at once. I do not wish to interfere with general legislation, but I do not think it will take more than a second to pass the bill.

Mr. GRIMES. Very well. I withdraw my motion for the present.

Mr. BROWN. I move to take up Senate bill No. 402.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill (S. No. 402) to repeal an act entitled "An act to remove the United States arsenal from the city of St. Louis, and to provide for the sale of the lands on which the same is located," was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. BROWN. I will simply state in explanation of this bill that, prior to the breaking out of the war, a law was passed at the instance of gentlemen who thought their property was more interested in getting rid of this arsenal than anything else, and, perhaps from some other motives, authorizing the sale of the ground and the removal of this arsenal. The law, however, has remained a dead letter; but it conflicts with certain arrangements and improvements that are necessary there, and I have been applied to by the officer in charge of the ordnance department at that place to have this law repealed, so that the arsenal may not be embarrassed in its operations by it. The bill meets with the unanimous concurrence of the Committee on Military Affairs, and I presume there will be no objection to it.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PAY DEPARTMENT OF THE NAVY.

On motion of Mr. GRIMES, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 382) to provide for the better organization of the pay department of the Navy.

The bill provides that, from and after its passage, the active list of the pay corps of the Navy shall consist of one hundred paymasters, fifty passed assistant paymasters, and fifty assistant paymasters. Paymasters are to be regularly promoted and commissioned from passed assistant paymasters, and passed assistant paymasters from assistant paymasters, subject to such examinations as are required by law and such as may be established by the Secretary of the Navy.

The second section provides that passed assistant paymasters shall give bonds for the faithful performance of their duties in the sum of $15,000, and that their annual pay shall be, at sea, $1,500; on other duty, $1,400; on leave or waiting orders, $1,100.

The third section provides that if any pay officer, or any other officer, or agent, or employé, or servant connected with or in the employment of the Navy Department at the time the offense was committed shall have defrauded, or attempted, or been privy to any attempt to defraud the Department in any manner whatever, he shall, upon conviction before a naval court-martial, be fined in any sum not exceeding $10,000, and be imprisoned in some penitentiary in the United States not exceeding ten years.

The Committee on Naval Affairs reported the bill with an amendment to strike out in section three, line five, the words "or attempted," and after the word "been" to insert the words "accessory or," and in line six to strike out the words "attempt to defraud" and to insert "fraud committed upon," so that the section will read:

"That if any pay officer, or any other officer or agent, or employé, or servant connected with or in the employment of the Navy Department at the time the offense was committed, shall have defrauded or been accessory or privy to any fraud committed upon said Department in any manner whatever, he shall, upon conviction thereof," &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended; and the amendment was concurred in.

Mr. GRIMES. Though there does not seem to be much attention paid to the bill, I think it is my duty to explain it to the Senate.

In the first place, in regard to the duties of a paymaster in the Navy, all those who are familiar with the subject, I suppose, understand that the duties are those which are performed in the Army by the paymaster, the quartermaster, and the commissary. He has charge of all the stores of every description that are put on board ship, and turns them out to the men, to the ward room, and to the different messes as they may be required. He is required to draw for money if it may be necessary in order to discharge the expenses of the ship, or to pay the men or officers their salaries, and to pay it over, and to keep his regular accounts.

There are in the service to-day, or were on the 1st of the present month, one hundred paymasters and assistant paymasters established by law. There were sixty-four paymasters and thirty-six assistant paymasters, and there are three hundred and ninety-six, or nearly four hundred acting assistant paymasters. It is proposed by this bill to enable the President, or the Secretary of the Navy, to select out from among these four hundred young men who are acting assistant paymasters one hundred of them who shall have best exhibited their capacity for the proper discharge of these duties, and attach them to the Navy proper as assistant and passed assistant paymasters, and for this reason: it is not supposed that there will be any time in the future when there will not be required at least two hundred paymasters. If we keep one hundred vessels in the service in commission, we shall require about two hundred paymasters, because we have established a rule now for the employment of paymasters in various places on shore. We have paymasters at Portsmouth, New Hampshire, Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington, District of Columbia, Norfolk, Newbern, Beaufort, North Carolina, Port Royal, Key West, Pensacola, New Orleans, Cairo, Mare Island, and Panama, New Grenada, which are naval depots of provisions, clothing, and small stores, making sixteen in all on shore. We then have a paymaster at Macao, in China, one at Callao, in Peru, and one in the Potomac flotilla. When you reserve the proper number of relays or reserves to take the place of paymasters when they come home from a cruise you will not have, according to the estimation of the Department, when you have increased the number to two hundred, more paymasters than will be necessary; certainly not if you maintain your Navy at the standard of one hundred vessels, while you have now got nearly seven hundred.

The bill also creates a new grade, that of passed assistant paymasters. The regulations and the law as it now stands require that every young man who is appointed an assistant paymaster shall undergo a thorough clerical examination, besides bringing testimonials as to his capacity and moral qualities. After having served a certain length of time, his returns to the Department having shown to be correct, and his capacity being guaranteed by the exhibition which he has made of himself, he is then to be sent before another board of examination, just as our surgeons and our engineers are now sent before boards, and if he passes that second examination, he is to be made a passed assistant paymaster with the pay of $1,500 and one ration, corresponding in rank and in title also with the passed assistant surgeon.

I believe that is the purport of the bill. I will say that the bill has come to the Committee on Naval Affairs with the approval of the Department.

Mr. POMEROY. I wish to inquire of the Senator from Iowa whether by this bill any reference is had to the age of the assistant paymasters for the acting assistant paymasters. The law now provides that assistant paymasters shall be under twenty-six, but acting assistant paymasters may be of any age. In appointing assistant paymasters from the list of acting assistant paymasters under this bill as it is now framed, can the appointments be made from those who are over twenty-six?

Mr. GRIMES. I do not understand that they can. This bill is merely cumulative, and authorizes the creation of a certain number more in the rank of assistant paymasters, and creates the grade of passed assistant paymasters.

Mr. POMEROY. The bill as it now stands says they shall be "subject to such examinations as are required by law and such as may be established by the Secretary of the Navy." That may perhaps be a sufficient guard that they shall not be over twenty-six years of age.

Mr. GRIMES. Do you mean the passed assistant paymasters?

Mr. POMEROY. Yes, sir.

Mr. GRIMES. When an assistant paymaster goes into the Navy, he is required to be of a certain specific age. This bill does not specify what the examinations of this officer shall be, for they are already established by law; but then, after speaking of the assistant paymasters, the bill says:

And passed assistant paymasters from assistant paymasters, subject to such examinations as are required by law and such as may be established by the Secretary of the Navy.

It is not possible for us to establish the age for passed assistant paymasters, and for this reason: we may have our grade full to-day, and peace be declared to-morrow. If so, promotion will be exceedingly slow in those grades, and the man now at the foot of the list as an assistant paymaster may be forty-five years old before he becomes a passed assistant paymaster. Hence it is not practicable for us to establish any age that the passed assistant paymaster shall attain at the time he is appointed.

Mr. POMEROY. I merely wanted to have the bill so guarded that the assistant paymasters, not the passed assistant paymasters, shall come within the law, that they shall not be over twenty-six years of age.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I desire to call the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs to the third section of this bill, which provides:

That if any pay officer, or any other officer, or agent, or employé, or servant connected with or in the employment of the Navy Department at the time the offense was committed, shall have defrauded or been accessory or privy to any fraud committed upon said Department in any manner whatever, he shall, upon conviction thereof before a naval court-martial, be fined in any sum not exceeding $10,000, and be imprisoned in some penitentiary in the United States not exceeding ten years.

I submit to the Senator from Iowa whether it is competent to do that. That would be punishing for a past offense. Ought not the language to be changed? The words, "shall have defrauded or been accessory or privy to any fraud committed upon said Department," would punish an act committed before the passage of this bill. The bill as it stands would, if passed, be an ex post facto law. If it meets the approbation of the Senator, I suggest that the word "have" be stricken out, and "defrauded" changed to "defraud," and the word "was" altered to "is." I make that motion, to strike out the word "was" in the fourth line, and in lieu of it to insert the word "is;" to strike out the word "have" at the end of the fourth line, and change the word "defrauded" to "defraud," and the word "been" in the fifth line to "be;" and after the word "fraud" in the sixth line, to insert the word "hereafter;" so that the section will read if amended as I propose:

That if any pay officer, or any other officer, or agent, or employé, or servant connected with or in the employment of the Navy Department at the time the offense is committed, shall defraud or be accessory or privy to any fraud hereafter committed upon said Department in any manner whatever, he shall, upon conviction thereof, &c.

These alterations will only make the bill prospective instead of retrospective.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I do not think there is any objection to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Illinois. The construction then of this section would be what it would be in its present phraseology. I do not think the amendment proposed will change the construction of the section, but perhaps it will make it a little clearer. I have no objection to it.

Mr. TRUMBULL. If I understand the section as it now stands, it is in the past tense, that if any officer "shall have defrauded" the Government he shall be liable to punishment. As I propose, it will read, "if any person shall defraud or be accessory or privy to any fraud committed upon said Department, he shall be punished." If the amendment I suggest does not accomplish the object, I think it should be further amended. It now clearly provides for the punishment of an offense heretofore committed, and would be manifestly unconstitutional.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Illinois.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. I confess that for one I do not see the necessity for this bill. When this war commenced we had no paymasters. They were then called pursers. I do not remember the precise number of them; I believe we had somewhere about sixty. Soon after the war commenced, we increased the corps from sixty to one hundred, but we increased it, I think, by making an addition of a new grade, to wit, assistant paymasters. That made them one hundred in number, and they have remained at that number from that day to this. This bill proposes to increase that number one hundred per cent. more. In the first place we made an addition of about fifty per cent., increasing the number to one hundred; and we now propose to make it one hundred per cent. more. And let it be remembered that this proposition increases the assistant paymasters sixteen, and makes an additional corps of fifty new officers, at an annual compensation which is named in the bill, and these are to be put upon the Navy as a permanent addition. I suppose there is no man who hopes, or expects, whatever may be the condition of the country after the war is over, that the number of these officers will ever be lessened if they are now attached permanently to the Navy. It seems to me that it is the part of wisdom not, under the pressure of a great emergency like that which we are now in, to make such a permanent increase as this to the officers of this particular branch of the naval service.

The chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs spoke of what was now required of paymasters in the Navy. According to my judgment a good many of the duties that are imposed upon them have been imposed by regulation and not by law; and the tendency of the action of the Naval Department is to increase the number and the scope of the subjects over which these officers have exclusive control. I do not know that I am correct in the matter, but I have been informed that the Navy Department within the past year have suspended several Navy agents from their places upon allegations of fraud, and have conferred their duties upon paymasters in the Navy. I believe that was the case at the navy-yard at Brooklyn and also at the navy-yard at Philadelphia. The Navy agents there were removed upon the ground of fraud, and their duties conferred upon these paymasters, who are now in the exercise of those duties.

However that may be, whether it is so or not, here is an addition of one hundred per cent., doubling this corps of officers which we have already increased fifty per cent. since the war commenced, and we are to fasten them upon the Navy for all time. I am not a convert to the doctrine that the way to put down this rebellion is to increase these officers and increase their compensation. I think it would be wise to wait before such an addition as this is made until this war is over, when there will be a revision and reduction both of the naval and land forces, and we can then fix a permanent peace establishment. It will be much more difficult to get rid of any officers than it is to put them in.

In addition to that, where is the necessity for this measure? The Secretary of the Navy now has an unlimited power of creating acting assistant paymasters just exactly to any extent that he thinks the public service requires, and he exercises it with a liberal hand. As he has this power, and the public service cannot suffer, where is the necessity at this time of creating this additional corps of officers, who will be fastened upon us forever? In my judgment it would be unwise and injudicious, and therefore I shall vote against the bill.

Mr. GRIMES. In answer to the last inquiry of the Senator from New Hampshire, as to the necessity for this measure, I will read the reply of the chief of the bureau:

"Forty-five acting assistant paymasters resigned during the last year, and many other resignations are on file which cannot properly be accepted until the officers shall have returned and rendered their accounts, as it is difficult and embarrassing to detach a paymaster while on a cruise. Many of these were excellent officers, who might have been retained, though their pay was small, ($1,300), had there been a reasonable expectation of obtaining permanent positions in the service."

It is true, as has been stated by the Senator, that various duties have been assigned to paymasters by regulation. As an example, it was not until the commencement of the present war that this country has ever had fleets. We had squadrons in foreign service, but we never had any of these large squadrons, and never operated in that capacity. It has been found expedient by the Navy Department to establish fleet paymasters. The purpose in appointing fleet paymasters is this: that there may be some man in each fleet to look after the service in that department, and see that all the paymasters properly discharge their duties, and make regular, monthly reports to the Department here. If there is any paymaster who does not properly turn over to the men the rations required, does not see that they regularly receive their pay, or does not keep his books in proper order, it is the business of the fleet paymaster to supersede him, and send him home.

Mr. HALE. That is already provided for by law.

Mr. GRIMES. That is a new class of officers that has been created since the war began when we had only sixty paymasters, as has been said by the Senator from New Hampshire. I have here a list of officers who are required to be taken from the number of paymasters:

"One chief of bureau; six fleet paymasters for the North and South Atlantic, the East and West Gulf, the Mississippi, and Pacific squadrons; six inspectors in charge of provisions and clothing at Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Norfolk, and Cairo; two superintendents of bread and flour at Boston and New York; one paymaster at Maro Island; two paymasters at Cairo for the station and receiving ship."

Making eighteen in all, in addition to those that I named when I was up before. I do not understand that anybody says it is not necessary that these paymasters should be assigned to this particular duty at these stations. I do not understand that anybody says it is not very essential that we should have these inspectors of provisions and clothing at these various yards. In consequence of having kept up this organization I am free to say—I think I say it with truth—that there has been no bureau of this Government where there has been so much money passed through it that has been so admirably managed and so accurately as the bureau of provisions and clothing. From the commencement of this war down to the present moment I have not heard a single complaint against it; and I apprehend it is in part because of the organization that has been made in it by the selection of the proper men for these various offices of inspectors and paymasters at these particular depots and by the selection of proper men as fleet paymasters to supervise all the subordinate acting paymasters that were within their particular jurisdiction, seeing that each one of them performed his duty.

It will be observed that of the one hundred paymasters now authorized by law under your present organization, some twenty-five or thirty of them are used in this way. Is it probable that we shall reduce our Navy below one hundred vessels? Is it probable that we are going to do it very speedily? If it is probable, if you propose to do it, do you not think it is advisable to hold out this inducement to these young men who are now in the service, and who are resigning, as we are told by the chief of the bureau, because the inducement of a permanent position is not held out to them, and when the war is over, if we have too many, we can then get rid of those who are most incompetent.

Mr. HALE. I agree to everything that the Senator has said about the administration of the bureau of provisions and clothing, and I think one great reason, and a very important and prominent reason, is, because there is at the head of that bureau an honest—and I want to speak that with all the emphasis that can be imagined—an honest, vigilant, and faithful man. I believe that; and I believe that he attends to his duties. If there has been under the present machinery and administration of the office no fault found, not a word of complaint, as the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs says, from any quarter, and there being no possible place in any Government where so much money has been distributed and none lost, it seems to me the urgency of the case cannot be so great as that we are required to multiply these officers one hundred fold at the present time, when the Department have unlimited power to appoint just as many acting assistant paymasters as they please.

Mr. President, it is a bad time to make these permanent additions to the Navy. The chairman of the Committee on Finance says they want all the money they can get. We have refused to increase, perhaps not the number, but the compensation of consuls who are constantly complaining. If this branch of the service has had resignations I do not know whether they are peculiar or not; but I should like to have the Secretary of the Navy, or whoever urges this bill, tell us what is the list of applicants well vouched for for business capacity and integrity for appointments to this very class of assistant paymasters. I happen to know something about how it was some time ago. There were men who had every qualification, so far as they could show it by recommendations, for the place, whose names were not reached for consideration for more than a year after they were put on the list; and I apprehend it is so to-day.

But, sir, I do not know that I can do any good or any hurt by talking about this bill. I have a duty to perform to myself, and I have done it in expressing the objection I entertain to this bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time.

Mr. HALE. I ask for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and being taken resulted—yeas 27, nays 4; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Carlile, Clark, Conness, Cowan, Dixon, Fool, Foster, Grimes, Harlan, Harris, Hendricks, Howe, Lane of Indiana, Morgan, Morrill, Nesmith, Pomeroy, Powell, Riddle, Sherman, Sprague, Sumner, Ten Eyck, Turnbull, Van Winkle, and Willey—27.

NAYS—Messrs. Buckalew, Davis, Farwell, and Hale—4. ABSENT—Messrs. Brown, Chandler, Colliamer, Do-little, Harding, Henderson, Hicks, Howard, Johnson, Lane of Kansas, McDougall, Ramsey, Richardson, Saulsbury, Wade, Wilkinson, Wilson, and Wright—18.

So the bill was passed.

RETALIATION ON REBEL PRISONERS.

Mr. WADE. I move to take up Senate resolution No. 97.

Mr. SUMNER. What is it about?

Mr. WADE. About retaliation.

Mr. SUMNER. I would not go on with that to-day.

Mr. WADE. You would if you were in prison. [Laughter.]

The motion was agreed to; and the joint resolution (S. R. No. 97) advising retaliation for the cruel treatment of prisoners by the insurgents was read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

As it has come to the knowledge of Congress that great numbers of our soldiers who have fallen as prisoners of war into the hands of the insurgents have been subjected to treatment unexampled for cruelty in the history of civilized war, and finding its parallels only in the conduct of savage tribes; a treatment resulting in the death of multitudes by the slow but designed process of starvation and by mortal diseases occasioned by insufficient and unhealthy food by wanton exposure of their persons to the inclemency of the weather, and by deliberate assassination of innocent and unoffending men, and the murder in cold blood of prisoners after surrender; and as a continuance of these barbarities, in contempt of the laws of war and in disregard of the remonstrances of the national authorities, has presented the alternative of suffering our brave soldiers thus to be destroyed, or to apply the principle of retaliation for their protection; the resolution declares that, in the judgment of Congress, it has become justifiable and necessary that the President should, in order to prevent the continuance and recurrence of such barbarities, and to insure the observance by the insurgents of the laws of civilized war, resort at once to measures of retaliation; that in the opinion of Congress such retaliation ought to be inflicted upon the insurgent officers now in our hands, or hereafter to fall into our hands as prisoners; that such officers ought to be subjected to like treatment practiced toward our officers or soldiers in the hands of the insurgents, in respect to quantity and quality of food, clothing, fuel, medicine, medical attendance, personal exposure, or other mode of dealing with them; that with a view to the same ends, the insurgent prisoners in our hands ought to be placed under the control and in the keeping of officers and men who have themselves been prisoners in the hands of the insurgents, and have thus acquired a knowledge of their mode of treating Union prisoners; that explicit instructions ought to be given to the forces having the charge of such insurgent prisoners, requiring them to carry out strictly and promptly the principles of this resolution in every case, until the President, having received satisfactory information of the abandonment by the insurgents of such barbarous practices, shall revoke or modify those instructions. Congress do not, however, intend by this resolution to limit or restrict the power of the President to the modes or principles of retaliation herein mentioned, but only to advise a resort to them as demanded by the occasion.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I think it was the intention of the Senator from Maryland [Mr. JOHNSON] to discuss this resolution. I am not sure about that, but I know he was looking into the question, and I should myself desire very much to hear his views and reasons on the subject. He is not in his seat to-day. I suppose he is necessarily detained from the Senate. I move that the further consideration of the resolution be postponed until to-morrow.

Mr. WADE. Did I understand the Senator from Indiana to say that the Senator from Maryland was anxious to debate this subject?

Mr. HENDRICKS. I said I thought it was the intention of the Senator from Maryland to discuss it. The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. POWELL] informs me that he heard him say so. This is an important subject. We all listen to that Senator with a great deal of interest, and myself with profit, and I should like to hear him on this subject. I therefore move the postponement, as I have suggested, until to-morrow.

Mr. WADE. I shall not resist the postponement until to-morrow on the suggestion that a Senator is anxious to debate this subject; and yet I feel that if the gentlemen who wish to debate it were in the condition of many of our prisoners, they would not want to hear long speeches on the subject, but they would want us to act at once. I feel that I am not really doing my duty when I agree to let it stand over until to-morrow, but I do it with the understanding that I shall press it at the very earliest opportunity.

Mr. HENDRICKS. One suggestion made by the Senator from Ohio perhaps demands a reply from me. Sir, I made a usual motion to accommodate a very distinguished member of this body, to accommodate myself in hearing him upon the question. A motion to postpone was not an unusual one, and did not call for debate except so far as I have suggested the reason. If the reason was not sufficient, then the Senator from Ohio ought to have objected to the postponement. If the reason was sufficient, then as a matter in the course of business in the Senate a postponement ought to take place.

The Senator saw fit to say that the Senator asking this postponement, if he were in the condition of some of our prisoners would not ask it, thereby implying perhaps that I did not feel that sympathy for the prisoners that I should feel. Perhaps, sir, there is no member of this body who feels more sensitively upon that subject than I do myself. I have a brother now in a southern prison who has been there since the 5th day of June last. The personal relation perhaps of no Senator to this subject can make him more sensitive than I am; but I am very free to say, without fully examining this subject, that the remedy for their unfortunate condition suggested by the Senator from Ohio in this joint resolution is not such a one as I had hoped to see come from him, and especially from the Administration. I think there is another remedy, and that is the exchange of our prisoners. We have nearly two to their one. I believe it is in the power of the Administration to bring our imprisoned soldiers home again, and in a very short time restore them to their friends and families.

I am free to say I do not feel that the condition of my friends in the southern prisons will be made any better, and they made any happier, by seeing some men in our prisons here in the North starved to death. If we could inflict the punishment that is suggested by the Senator, upon the officers in the southern army who have contributed to the misfortunes of which he complains, I would agree with him; but here in our northern prisons are many men who entered into this war in the southern army against their wish, conscripted, compelled to obey the demands of a government de facto, having no part nor lot, no connection whatever with the wrongs that are inflicted upon our soldiers in the southern prisons, and now we propose to retaliate upon them, individually, and starve them to death, because the Senator says some of our friends in southern prisons have been starved! Reach the men that are in fault; strike them if we can; but where is the propriety, where is the Christianity of starving a man to death against whom we can lay no fault except that perhaps he has been compelled to obey the demands of the rebel government, a government, as was illustrated with great power by the Senator from Vermont, not now in his seat, [Mr. COLLAMER,] de facto, which the people down there for the time being had to obey?

But, sir, I did not intend to discuss this resolution now, but simply to reply to what the Senator said, which I thought was unjust to myself, having made this motion for a reason very proper, as I believed. I hope to see this proposition so amended as to bring our soldiers home again. Let them come back to their families. We can make these exchanges; and while I am upon that point I will read from a statement of fact made by a distinguished member of the House of Representatives the other day, not of my political party, but a distinguished member of the House of the same political party with the Senator from Ohio. Mr. KASSON, of Iowa, speaking of the Secretary of War, said:

"One thing more: If he be the man he is charged with being, who could in June last have exchanged prisoners of war of the United States on terms recognized throughout all civilized nations, yet left ten or twenty thousand of our gallant men to perish in rebel pens during the last summer, again I find a reason why his administration of that Department should be investigated."

If this statement be true, there is a reason why it should be investigated. If months ago, as is stated by a distinguished member of the party to which the Senator from Ohio belongs, this Administration could have brought our friends home again, restored them to their places in their families, and prevented this starvation, I say it is the highest charge that can be brought against this Administration. I want to know if we cannot have a remedy that will save this suffering rather than a remedy which will increase the suffering, not upon our prisoners perhaps, and it may be upon them. Their condition may be made better, but I fear it will be made worse by the course suggested in this resolution. If we can adopt some action on the part of the Senate which will compel the Administration to do that which a distinguished member of the other House says the Administration for five months might have done, and bring them home, I shall feel that we have accomplished something.

Mr. WADE. The Senator has made his argument on the subject, and I doubt now whether we ought to delay the passage of the joint resolution. I think he has made as strong an argument as the Senator from Maryland or any one else could have done.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. POMEROY.) The question is on the postponement of the resolution.

Mr. WADE. I am opposed to the postponement. If this resolution will not tend to effect the purpose designed by us, it should not pass. No one is more sensible than I am that for mere vindictive purposes we ought not to pass a measure like this. My impression, however, is that it will have a very useful effect; it will have the effect to relieve thousands upon thousands who are now in southern prisons, and treated with such hardship that they are dying all over the southern country.

Retaliation has in all ages of the world been a means of bringing inhuman and savage foes to a sense of their duty, and has frequently had the effect to promote the objects of justice. It has been so in this war; we have tried it already successfully. There was a time when the enemy took our officers and placed them as a kind of protection against our assault on their fortifications. They placed our officers within the range of our guns, hoping thereby to protect themselves against our assaults. In order to prevent that we were compelled to retaliate in kind, and we selected a like number of their officers and placed them in like jeopardy; and the moment they saw that we sternly intended to do that, they did not persist in their barbarous course any longer; when they found we were inexorable upon that subject, and that we would place their officers in like jeopardy, the effect was very soon manifest; our officers were immediately released from their position, and the rebels sought to make peace upon that subject. So they would upon this.

Sir, I have no doubt on investigation of this subject that it is a deliberate purpose of theirs to destroy every prisoner that comes into their hands. They do not intend that he shall be returned to us in such a condition that he can ever again take the field. Their inhuman treatment is probably owing more to this consideration than to mere feelings of malice. It is a system of savage policy, and it has had a most powerful effect on our Army. Of the thousands of prisoners we have had in their hands scarcely one of them is ever returned to us in such a condition that he can take the field again; while on the other side the prisoners that come into our possession are treated precisely the same as our own soldiers are, and they go back refreshed, recuperated, and ready to take the field against us, every man of them. I have no doubt that a prompt and stern resort to this measure of retaliation will have as beneficial an effect as the measure to which I have referred had in the case to which it was applied.

The gentleman talks of Christianity. Sir, I do not understand that there is very much Christianity in war. If you go to war you have departed from the great principles laid down by Christ and His followers, as I understand them; and if you go to war you must not only depart from those principles, but you must follow out that departure, for it leads to other necessities that do not square precisely with the doctrines of Christianity. You commit a great offense when you go to war; but the world has not yet reached that need of perfection when war can be avoided. I say, then, you cannot invoke the principles of Christianity in vindication of all the incidents and doctrines that grow out of war. "They that take the sword shall perish by the sword," it is said. But, sir, I do not profess to be very familiar with these theological questions. I believe that when the Almighty imbued every man who receives an insult or an injury with a sense of resentment He intended that it should be used and manifested on proper occasions. You can hardly eradicate this idea from the human mind. I know that, like other passions, it may run too far; it may be stimulated to excess; but I say again I do not believe that the Almighty endowed a man with a sense of resentment for an injury with the idea that it should not be exercised. I think it is proper to resent injuries sometimes, and frequently proper to retaliate as a means of putting an end to acts of wrong and barbarity. I think it is rather a mawkish idea of humanity that fears to subject rebel prisoners to the same treatment that we know our own brave soldiers are daily subjected to.

I think the influence of such a measure as that now proposed will be to do away with bad treatment on both sides; for when the rebels see that you will resort to retaliation, that their men in our hands will be subjected to the same hardships to which they subject ours, it will be a reason why they should relieve our men. Milder arguments have been utterly ineffectual. I do not know now but that other measures will be effectual. If so, I would resort to them at once; but I have seen no attempt to do so; I have seen nowhere the attempt on the part of this Government to redress these wrongs that are inflicted on our soldiers. I feel that something should be done. My sense of humanity is not entirely on one side, and that the side of the rebellion. As I go through the hospitals, my sense of humanity will be no more harrowed up by seeing that rebels are subjected to these hardships than it is when I see our own men returned from their prisons mere skeletons, shadows of what they were. I have seen this; and if a man can go through our hospitals with composure and see our men who have been returned from southern prisons and not have his sense of resentment aroused, he is more or much less than human.

Now, sir, I think this measure will be effectual; it will have the effect to do away with this great inhumanity. I proposed it as a remedy, and I hope it will be a remedy. As to what the Senator says about the exchange of prisoners, I have only to declare that if our Government has allowed our soldiers to be retained in this barbarous keeping when it had full power in its own hands to make equitable exchanges, it cannot be excused for such conduct. I do not know how the fact is. I have always understood that there was something in the way of the fair exchange of prisoners, and I have never been able exactly to understand what it was. It may be that the Government here is greatly to blame. The Senator says there are no reasons against it. I do not know that there are, but I have always supposed that there was reason—

Mr. HENDRICKS. I did not express any opinion myself upon that question, but I read the statement of the fact, delivered under very responsible circumstances, that exchanges could have been made for months past upon terms consistent with the usages of nations.

Mr. WADE. I did not rise, Mr. President, with any intention of arguing this question. I want it decided by the Senate. If they are determined to see our prisoners subjected to these hardships without any endeavor to relieve them, be it so. If any one cavils at this measure and suggests no other, I think he is not in the way of doing much good. This proposition has been presented not only by me, but I understand that this resolution was reported with the approbation of the Committee on Military Affairs, I believe unanimously, though I do not know how that fact was.

Mr. HOWARD. There was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs a resolution which was presented by the honorable Senator from Ohio, [Mr. WADE]; also a memorial which was presented by the honorable Senator from Indiana, [Mr. LANE]; the Committee on Military Affairs took these measures into consideration, and instructed me to report a joint resolution to the Senate, which I did. It is joint resolution No. 97.

Mr. WADE. That is the one under consideration.

Mr. HOWARD. That is all I know about it. The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question before the Senate is on the motion to postpone the joint resolution until to-morrow.

Mr. HENDERSON. I have an amendment that I desire to offer to the resolution, that I wish to have printed. Will it be in order to present it now?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment can be offered.

Mr. HENDERSON. I now offer it that it may be printed, and I desire the action of the Senate upon it when the joint resolution shall be again taken up.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be received informally and ordered to be printed, if there be no objection. The Chair hears none.

Mr. HARLAN. I desire to offer an amendment also when this resolution shall come up for further discussion; but I wish to make a remark in connection with the subject as it has been presented to-day. Some three years ago I wrote a letter, and presented it to other Senators for their signatures, requesting the President to exchange prisoners with the rebels. I then believed that it was politic. Our condition has changed vastly since that time. The rebels are no longer able to meet us in the open field. Their armed soldiers fight us now almost exclusively behind their works and in strong fortifications. Military men tell us that it requires at least four men outside to take one inside of a fort. We have been expressing our thanks as a Congress to the commanders of the Army and the Navy that have taken a fort containing a garrison of about twenty-three hundred men. The Navy, I think, floated between six and seven hundred heavy guns; there was an army landed, we are told, of something like eight thousand men; it required the united strength of this immense naval power and eight thousand troops to take a fort defended by but twenty-three hundred men. Now the Senator from Indiana demands that we shall exchange a rebel prisoner held by us for each one of the prisoners of ours held by them. Suppose they hold thirty thousand Union prisoners of war, and we exchange for them at once thirty thousand rebel soldiers. These thirty thousand rebel soldiers will be thrown into strong works like Fort Fisher, and then you will be compelled to marshal an army of one hundred and twenty thousand strong to be able to meet that thirty thousand sent there by you. The thirty thousand Union soldiers you receive, and ninety thousand additional troops will be required to recapture them.

This is the present condition of the contest. The rebellion has been so far suppressed that they are no longer able to meet us in the open field; they are now ensconced behind the strongest works that human skill and energy can produce; we are the assailing party; we are compelled to fight them in those works, and to capture those garrisons by assault, or the tedious process of a siege in order to secure complete success. I think, therefore, it is very doubtful whether we are damaged by the refusal of the rebels to make a fair exchange; an exchange man for man will make the rebels relatively stronger. It is therefore doubtful, to say the least, whether a far-seeing, sagacious humanity would not induce this Government to refuse to exchange prisoners from this time forward. If this course should be adopted, then of course if the rebels treat Union troops held by them as prisoners of war with premeditated cruelty and inhumanity, it will furnish a just occasion for retaliation.

Such retaliatory measures should not be adopted rashly or needlessly, because it will always seem hard to compel the innocent to suffer for the guilty; on the surface it may seem cruel and inhuman, but only in the same sense in which it is cruel and inhuman to shoot a prisoner of war in retaliation for the murder of one of our own soldiers held by the enemy. Yet this is in accordance with the usage of all civilized nations. It is resorted to in order to compel the enemy to treat with humanity those whom they may capture in battle. There is nothing more cruel, it seems to me, in putting a rebel prisoner on lean fare, than there is in shooting a rebel prisoner in retaliation.

I desire that this resolution, if it is to pass, shall be amended somewhat so as to require the punishment to be strictly retaliatory; to be inflicted on officers and men of equal number and of the same rank; and so as to instruct the President to notify the rebel authorities that this punishment is inflicted in retaliation for the inhuman treatment of our troops held as prisoners by them, and will be continued only until they treat our prisoners with the humanity demanded by the usages of civilized nations.

I would rejoice to see every prisoner of ours held by the rebels released at once, but when I know that the release of a Union prisoner by the rebels requires the release of a rebel prisoner by our Government, and that he will be at once thrown into strongly fortified works, and that you will be compelled to recruit three other soldiers to unite with our returning prisoner to make the combat equal; that four lives are to be put in jeopardy to recapture the rebel whom we have released, I cannot criticize the Secretary of War if he should refuse to exchange prisoners from this time forward until the close of the war, even if a fair exchange could be secured; but I apprehend there are very few Senators here who believe that a fair exchange can be effected. They so analyze all prisoners that they hold of ours as to release those whose terms of service have expired or are about to expire. Their soldiers are mustered in practically during the war. Every southern citizen able to bear arms is enrolled as a soldier during the continuance of the war. Then when we release a rebel prisoner we put him into their army during the continuance of the war, while in nine cases out of ten, probably, the soldier received by us in return will be at once well fed and mustered out of service. In addition to this, we know from the facts that have been developed by the committee on the conduct of the war that they do not return to us able-bodied men, but only exchange the sick and dilapidated for those that are able-bodied and vigorous. We cannot, as I am informed, secure a fair exchange. If a fair exchange could be secured, I probably would accept it; but when a fair exchange cannot be had, I cannot complain of the Secretary for insisting on it with pertinacity when the delay is ruinous to the rebel cause and is hastening their ultimate overthrow.

Mr. CLARK. If the resolution is to be postponed, I have no objection to its being postponed now; but if the discussion is to go on, I want to say a word on the subject before the vote is taken. I have no desire to take up the time of the Senate now, if it is proposed to postpone the subject.

Mr. WADE. I propose to amend the motion to postpone, so as to make this joint resolution the special order for to-morrow at one o'clock.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is informed that there is a special order for to-morrow at one o'clock.

Mr. CLARK. I suggest to the Senator from Ohio merely to postpone it until to-morrow, and we can take it up at any time at the pleasure of the Senate.

Mr. WADE. Very well; but I shall move to take it up to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPherson, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a joint resolution (H. R. No. 141) reducing the duty on printing paper, unsized, used for books and newspapers exclusively, in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House of Representatives had signed the following enrolled bills, and they were thereupon signed by the Vice President:

A bill (H. R. No. 390) for the relief of Emily A. Lyon;

A bill (H. R. No. 598) making appropriations for the consular and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the year ending the 30th June, 1866; and

A bill (H. R. No. 607) to provide for an advance of rank to the officers of the Navy and Marine corps for distinguished merit.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The joint resolution (H. R. No. 141) reducing the duty on printing paper, unsized, used for books and newspapers exclusively, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

J. AND O. P. COBB AND CO.

Mr. CLARK. I move that the Senate now postpone all prior orders and proceed to the consideration of the joint resolution (H. R. No. 80) for the adjustment of the claim of J. and O. P. Cobb & Co. of Indiana, and I wish to say at this time that I desire to have it before the Senate for the action of the Senate, as this joint resolution will be a guide to the Committee on Claims in regard to several other claims which are before them, and the committee desire the action of the Senate on this for their information.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution. It proposes to direct the Quartermaster General to examine and adjust the claim of J. and O. P. Cobb & Co. of Indiana, for the loss sustained by them on the 11th and 12th days of July, 1863, by the destruction, by military order, of their barges and other vessels employed in the shipment of hay to Memphis, Tennessee, under a contract with the Government of the United States, and the hay on board of the vessels which was being shipped by the firm in the fulfillment of the contract, and other property connected with and being used in the fulfillment of the contract, the property having been burned and destroyed by the United States gunboat No. 33. The claimants are to be allowed the value of the property, not exceeding $11,000, to be paid out of any money heretofore or hereafter appropriated applicable to the payment of claims against the Quartermaster's bureau.

The amendment of the Committee on Claims was to strike out all of the resolution after the words "military order" in line eight, and in lieu of the words stricken out to insert:

Of a certain quantity of hay loaded by them on certain barge and flatboats, on the Ohio river, to be delivered at Memphis, Tennessee, under a contract with the Government of the United States; and that he allow the said claimants the contract price of said hay so destroyed, less the expense of transportation from the place where destroyed to the place of delivery, to be paid out of any money heretofore or hereafter appropriated applicable to the payment of claims against the Quartermaster's bureau.

Mr. CLARK. There is a report of the committee in this case which may be read if it is desired; but I think by a short statement I can bring the point to the attention of the Senators, if they will listen to me.

Cobb & Co. were merchants in Indiana. They contracted with the proper officer of the Government to deliver a certain number of tons of hay—a large number, I think five thousand tons of hay—at Memphis, Tennessee. They proceeded to execute that contract at a given price per ton, twenty-eight dollars and some cents, to be paid at Memphis. They procured their hay and loaded it on certain barges in the Ohio river. When the hay was thus loaded on the barges, General Boyle, in command of the department, gave an order to a gunboat to proceed up the river and seize all the boats and barges on the river and destroy them, for the purpose of preventing John Morgan, who was then in Indiana or Ohio, from crossing the river southward into Kentucky. The officer of the gunboat proceeded up the river and destroyed all the boats on which this hay was loaded, together with the hay.

These contractors show precisely the number of pounds they had upon the boat, and the House of Representatives have considered the case, and their committee having reported this resolution, it has passed that House and come here, directing the Quartermaster General to pay them for the hay and for the barges as well. So far we have considered no claim arising out of damages done by our forces in the war. The hay which was on board the barges the Government should pay for, upon the principle that where the promisee puts it out of the power of the promisor to perform his promise, he is excused from it; and these parties having the hay loaded to be delivered at Memphis, and it having been destroyed while it was upon the river by the Government, the Government should pay for it less the expense of transportation to Memphis. But following the action of the Senate, or rather the want of action of the Senate heretofore, the Committee on Claims have struck out the payment for the barges because there was no contract in regard to them; they stand exactly like any other property destroyed. There is a very large number of claims before the committee for pay for property which has been destroyed during the war. If it is the pleasure of the Senate that the committee should consider and report those claims to the body, the committee will do so; but if it be the pleasure of the Senate that they shall wait until the war is over, or nearly so, in order that we may see what the damages may be, or what is the course proper to be pursued by the Government, then the committee will not report more of those claims.

There has been an attempt in the Senate to establish a commission who should examine the value of the property destroyed. Senators will see that the testimony in regard to the value of the barges is all upon one side. The testimony in regard to the hay is exact, because the Government was to pay a given price for it. The parties show that they put on board just so many pounds at just such a price. That, therefore, can be arrived at exactly; but the committee had no evidence as to the value of the barges, except what was furnished by the claimants themselves.

But what the committee desire to know, and what they desire to accomplish by this amendment, is to ascertain the sense of the Senate in regard to claims for military damages. Many of them are very vast and they are very pressing; parties have lost large amounts of property; they are distressed for the pay for that property; and perhaps it may be said that property destroyed in that way should as justly be paid for by the Government as any other property; but the committee seek to know whether the Senate are of opinion that we should take up these claims seriatim, one after another, and act upon them on such testimony as we shall have, and report them to the Senate, or whether they shall be detained in the committee, and there shall be some provision made for a decision and adjustment of all of them. The committee have no choice about it; but if this amendment be adopted, the result will be to pay for the hay, and leave unsettled the question of payment for the barges. If it be not adopted, and the resolution be passed as it came from the House of Representatives, we shall pay for the hay and the barges both. They state their barges in round numbers to be worth $5,000. They have evidence to show that the valuation they put upon them is a just valuation, but that is from the opinion of persons who saw the barges. Other persons who might see them might say that they were not worth so much, but that testimony we have not. The price of the hay is fixed, and we think the Government should pay for that, at any rate, because it would have been delivered in a very few days if the Government had not destroyed it.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I should like to inquire of the Senator from New Hampshire whether this hay was delivered. Perhaps he stated how that was, but my attention was not called to it at the moment. My inquiry is whether the hay was received by the Government officer. Had delivery been made?

Mr. CLARK. That is the point; delivery had not been made fully. It was to be delivered at Memphis.

Mr. TRUMBULL. And it was destroyed on the Ohio river?

Mr. CLARK. Yes, sir. The Government prevented the delivery by their own act, and may be considered, perhaps, in that view to have accepted the hay.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Suppose this property had been burnt up accidentally where it was, would it have been the loss of the Government of the United States or the contractor's loss? Manifestly the contractor's.

Mr. CLARK. Certainly; the contractor's loss.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Then it had not been delivered; it had not been received by the Government. I am merely asking these questions for information, without expressing at this time any opinion in regard to a very large class of cases where a great many deserving individuals have such claims. I ask how does this case differ from the case of the destruction of property in Missouri, or across the river here in Virginia, where farms have been laid waste by our forces in the prosecution of this war? All over Kentucky property has been destroyed necessarily. It was deemed necessary by the military authorities in command that the property should be destroyed for military purposes. How shall we distinguish this case of property destroyed before it was delivered to the Government, and before the contract was completed, from the destruction of other property by the Army in other places?

Mr. CLARK. The committee thought there was this clear distinction between the two classes of property; here the Government had contracted with these parties to supply it with a certain amount of hay, the parties had gone and collected that hay on the Ohio river in pursuance of their contract, and were in fulfillment of their contract and would have delivered their hay if the Government, the other party contracting, and who was to take the hay, had not seized and burnt it. The principle, as I said before, is that where the promisee renders the promise impossible of execution, the promisor is excused. Suppose the Government had taken the hay right there and fed it out to its horses would it not have been responsible? It is a very different case, it seems to me, from that which the Senator from Illinois puts, because these parties were in the fulfillment of their contract with the Government and the Government, the promisee, destroyed the property. It is a very different case from that of property destroyed by accident. It was clearly at the risk of the parties getting the hay, until the Government interfered with it; but when the Government interfered with it, it took upon itself the risk. The committee had no question about payment for the hay, and no question about the justice of the claim to the barges to a certain amount, though the value of the barges is not proved as clearly as the other part of the case, and the committee desired the attention of the Senate to that point for the purpose of ascertaining how they should proceed.

Mr. COWAN. I should like to ask the chairman of the Committee on Claims whether the law is not as clear that the barges should be paid for as that the hay should be paid for.

Mr. CLARK. I think I may answer the Senator very readily, that the law is perhaps as clear. The question in my mind is not whether we shall eventually pay for the property, but whether we shall postpone the payment until we can fix some proper tribunal to ascertain the value of the property that we are bound to pay for. Here is entirely ex parte testimony in regard to the value of the barges. It is proved by opinion. A has got to go and look at a barge, and A says he knows what that barge is worth, and he thinks it is worth so much. There is nobody to show to the Senate that it was not worth so much. If we cut down the price we may do the man injustice; if we allow the price, we may do ourselves injustice, upon that insufficient testimony. My own judgment is that we must establish some tribunal that shall have the power of compelling witnesses, as perhaps the Senate might authorize the committee to do, of taking testimony aliunde at proper places, and hearing the parties and perhaps counsel on both sides in some cases. Otherwise we may pay where we ought not to pay, and in some cases twice as much as we ought to pay. There is great difficulty in the matter. It is not the desire or wish of the committee to delay or defer anybody who has a just claim. We only desire to ascertain from the Senate what may be their wish in regard to the subject, and we ask the Senate to express their opinion from what they see in these cases, that it is dangerous to proceed without some proper tribunal, and to turn their attention to the establishment of some sort of tribunal. We have not so far, I think, reported an individual case, waiting to see what would be the result. Whether we shall wait further and delay these applicants and claimants, or whether the Senate will take cognizance of them now, is what we desire to ascertain from the Senate.

Mr. TEN EYCK. I want to be informed and enlightened on this subject. I have listened attentively to the discussion, and I am not able to see any distinction between this case and the case of so much hay belonging to individuals who had no contract with the Government to deliver it at all, who may have had a contract to deliver hay in Memphis to some private individual, or who had no contract, but were seeking a market down the river. Now suppose under the order of General Boyle, hay thus belonging to private individuals had been destroyed in order to prevent the boats upon which it was loaded being seized by Morgan and his men in an attempt to escape across the river out of Ohio. If the hay had belonged to private individuals and there had been no contract with the Government, it would have presented a case of ten thousand other cases involving thousands of millions of dollars, where property has been destroyed since the commencement of this rebellion in Kentucky and in all the border States throughout this Union. If there is any distinction in principle and in law between property thus circumstanced and this property, my vision is too obtuse to discover it. I should like to be informed on that point for it will regulate the vote I shall give.

Mr. DAVIS. I should like to make an explanation on the point suggested by the Senator from New Jersey. Here is the case that is now before the Senate: Cobb & Co., of Indiana, contracted to deliver a certain quantity of hay to the Government at Memphis; they loaded the hay on board of boats and barges, and the hay was on its way to Memphis to be delivered in conformity to the contract. The Senator from Pennsylvania wants to know the distinction between the case of the hay and the barges, and the Senator from New Jersey wants to know the difference between this case and the common case of the destruction of property in any of the States. The difference is a very plain and palpable one. Here the contract was in the course of execution by the covenantor to deliver the hay. The Government is the covenantee, and the covenantee interposes, when the hay is in transitu to be delivered in the execution of the contract, and destroys the hay. Now, the question is whether the destruction of the hay by the covenantee does not conclude the covenantee from denying that the contract was executed on the part of the covenantor. There is no plainer principle of law; and it is a principle that is recognized and acted upon every day in our courts of justice. When there is a covenant, and one party is in the course of executing that covenant, and the other party interposes and defeats the execution of the covenant, the party who thus interposes and defeats the execution of the covenant cannot allege that the covenant is not performed on the part of the other party.

The reason that the committee made a difference between the boats and the barges and the hay was this: there was no contract on the part of Cobb & Co. to deliver the boats and the barges; it was simply a covenant to deliver hay, and the boats and barges were the vehicles or the means of transportation by which they were in the course of executing their covenant. It cannot be said, then, in relation to the boats and barges, that there was a covenant to deliver them by Cobb & Co. to the Government, and that the Government interposed and by its act defeated the delivery of the boats and barges which had been covenanted to be delivered, because there was no such covenant. The covenant was restricted to hay.

Mr. COWAN. Will the honorable Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. DAVIS. Certainly.

Mr. COWAN. It is whether Cobb & Co. could not have recovered for the hay without going upon the contract, on the same principle that they ask to recover for the barges, namely, that the Government officer in a moment of emergency had destroyed this property, and therefore the law was that they were entitled to pay for both, without saying anything about a contract.

Mr. DAVIS. I admit that to be true, but still there is a distinction. The one would be a case of trespass, a wrong. The destruction of the boats and barges would be a case of wrong, and the Government would be responsible for their destruction as a wrongdoer; but the responsibility of the Government for the hay is upon a different principle. It is upon a principle arising in a matter ex contractu, where one of the parties to the contract is the cause of the other not having executed it. It is a plain and universal principle of law, that where two parties make a contract and one is in the course of the execution of that contract, and its execution is defeated by the other, it does not lie in the mouth of the other to assume that the contract has not been executed by the opposite party. I admit that there is the same principle of right and of justice generally for payment for the boats and barges as for the hay, but it is upon a different principle of law, and the committee acted and reported in the case so as to keep separate and distinct the principle upon which the Government would be bound to pay for the hay.

Mr. COWAN. I ask the honorable Senator again whether the committee did not feel themselves as much bound to pay for damages on account of a tort of the Government as damages for a breach of contract?

Mr. DAVIS. I feel that obligation, and I suppose the committee do; but as the Senator from New Hampshire, the chairman of the committee, says, the number of claims of that character against the Government is infinite; their amount is indefinite; it would come up to hundreds and probably to thousands of millions of dollars. It would be greatly in its amount beyond any such claims arising ex contractu as the claim of Cobb & Co. on the Government for the value of this hay; and here was one reason that I agreed to the report of the committee in the form in which it has been made. I admit that those whose property has been destroyed by the Government and its agents are entitled to remuneration from the Government, and ought to receive it.

Mr. COWAN. I will ask the honorable Senator whether the distinction which he takes between the barges and the hay is not destroyed by the intervention of this particular fact, that not only the hay but the barges were invited to that particular point where they were destroyed by the contract of the Government? Non constat that the hay and the barges might not have been hundreds of miles away but for this contract; and does not that distinguish it from a case where property is destroyed by the Government or its officers in an emergency, where the Government has done nothing to invite the property to occupy that particular locality where it has been destroyed?

Mr. DAVIS. My honorable friend is an able lawyer, and it seems to me that nothing can be plainer to a legal mind than the palpable distinction between the hay and the barges. It is not only because hay is not a barge nor a barge hay, but it is simply for this reason: Cobb & Co. contracted to deliver the hay, and they did not contract to deliver the barges and the boats to the Government. They could have wagoned the hay, or they could have taken it upon the railroad cars, or by any other mode of transportation. Therefore the passage of the barges and boats toward Memphis was not in the course of the execution of any contract by Cobb & Co. with the Government, but the passage of the hay to Memphis was in the course of the execution of a contract by that firm to deliver the hay to the Government. The Government arrested the hay that was being transported in the execution of this contract, by its general officer, and destroyed it.

Mr. COWAN. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him another question?

Mr. DAVIS. Certainly.

Mr. COWAN. It is whether Cobb & Co. would be able to distinguish between the loss they suffered from the destruction of the hay, and the loss they suffered from the destruction of the barges? Whether they do not feel that they have the same right precisely to be compensated for the loss of the one that they have to be compensated for the loss of the other? And if there is no distinction in morals, how can there be such a distinction as is taken by the committee in law?

Mr. DAVIS. I admit the general principle of the Senator; but I was going to state another consideration upon which the committee had made the distinction between the hay and the barges. If it be the policy and present purpose of the Senate and of Congress, as I conceive it ought to be, to make full compensation for all property that may be destroyed by the armies of the United States belonging to loyal citizens, the committee are of opinion that all this responsibility ought not to be met by private, individual, single claims as they arise, but that there ought to be a general law establishing a commission or a board, before which all these claims should be presented and established by proof, and instead of a few active claimants who have friends in the Senate or in the House of Representatives getting ahead of all the others in the nation who have as good a claim and as just a claim as themselves, by their private bills, Congress ought to provide for that whole class of cases by the establishment of a general commission, and require all these claims to be presented there for proof.

As the chairman of the committee says, there are a great many claims precisely of the same nature and depending upon the same principles of justice and law as that of Cobb & Co. for the value of their barges and their boats against the Government. The committee want to be instructed by the Senate whether it is their purpose to satisfy that order of claims or not. If it is the purpose of the Senate now to satisfy that class of claims, the committee are ready to be instructed by the Senate and to report all that are now depending upon that principle, and to report for the full satisfaction of the destruction of any and of all property by the armies of the United States, whether that property was about to be delivered in the execution of contracts or not. But the committee think, at least I do, that as a matter of justice and of policy, instead of permitting all these claims, that amount to a countless sum of money, almost to, no doubt, thousands of millions of dollars, to come up in detail, each claim by itself, and each claim to be heard upon the amount of proof that the claimant may bring before Congress to sustain him, Congress ought, on the contrary, to establish a general commission which should hear all the proof in relation to such claims and to report upon them to Congress, that Congress should then pay the whole class of these claims together.

If I have made myself understood, that is the distinction of principle and the consideration upon which my conduct as a member of the committee was determined in consenting to this report.

Mr. CLARK. The question presented to the Senate is of more importance than the mere joint resolution itself. I do not wish to press its passage at this time; I desired simply to accomplish the purpose of bringing it to the notice of Senators, so that they might be considering this great question which must come before the Senate. These claims will be continually pressing, and the Senate and House of Representatives will be obliged, in my judgment, to provide some method of ascertaining them. Now, let me state a claim which is before the committee at the present time. Certain parties of Tennessee allege that they were the owners of a large plantation down in Arkansas; that they were Union men always; stood by the Government; that they had upon that plantation seventy negroes; one hundred mules; so many hogs; so much fodder of this kind, and so much fodder of that kind; and that the army came and destroyed a part, and somebody else destroyed a part; that a portion of their negroes came back, and a part got free papers and went to Ohio. They present a claim to us and ask us to adjudicate upon it and award them so much damages. I pray you, sir, how is the committee ever to determine the value of that claim? Here certain parties come and say that they think the seventy negroes were worth so much, and certain other parties come and say they think the mules were worth so much, and certain other parties say they think the hogs were worth so much; and the army destroyed about so many of the hogs, and so on. It is entirely indefinite. It is impossible for the committee to decide on a claim of that kind; and even if the testimony were definite as far as it goes, it would create injustice to decide the case upon ex parte testimony.

It is suggested to me by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. Foot] that in that event we must do as a court of justice would do, reject the claim; but then, for the want of a proper jurisdiction, the parties will come again. You reject again, and they come again, and so by continually coming, the Senate at last becomes weary, and the danger is that the claim will pass at some time without a proper adjudication. We desire to submit to the Senate whether it would not be better in the outset, if it can be done, to turn our attention to providing a tribunal who shall ascertain upon one side and the other what is the proper measure of damages.

There is another question arising in this case of Cobb & Company. The committee present the joint resolution to the Senate with an amendment. If the Senate agree to the amendment, which is to strike out the allowance for the barges, the hay is left for the action of the body, and the committee would understand that the Senate did not intend at the present time to consider claims for such damages where there was no contract. They may then afterwards, if they choose, refuse to pay either branch of the claim, on the ground that it is all a war claim, and then the committee would have ascertained what they want to ascertain, that the Senate does not at the present time intend to act on that class of claims; and then we propose to leave Cobb & Company to their remedy at law. If this were a contract between two private parties, between A and B, if B had contracted to deliver hay to A which A destroyed in transitu, could not B go into court and sue A for the value of that hay on his contract? I think very clearly he could; but here is the Government on one side, and the question is whether it is not under the same obligation.

I desired to bring this case to the attention of the Senate. Perhaps Senators may wish to reflect upon it. I will now move that the joint resolution be postponed until to-morrow, and at some future time I shall call it up again. I have accomplished my purpose in bringing it to the attention of the Senate at the present time.

Mr. HOWE. I shall offer no opposition to the postponement, but I want to say just on this occasion that this amendment by some means or other got through the Committee on Claims without attracting my attention. I do not know whether I was present during the meeting at which it was considered or not. At any rate it did not attract my attention.

Mr. CLARK. My impression is that it was agreed upon in committee before the Senator came in, but I am not certain.

Mr. HOWE. That is very likely. I make that remark as preparatory to this: that for my single self I make no sort of distinction between the obligation of the Government of the United States to pay for these barges and its obligation to pay for the hay. I am entirely satisfied that if the Government of the United States destroyed either the hay or the barges for the purpose of the national defense, the United States ought to pay for them. If the committee moved this amendment for the reason that they were entirely satisfied with the proofs upon the question of the hay, but were not satisfied with the proofs upon the question of the barges, that is a good reason.

Mr. CLARK. If the Senator will allow me, I will say that the committee were mainly influenced in moving the amendment by two reasons: one was to ascertain what would be the opinion of the Senate in regard to claims of that nature, and to bring the question distinctly before the Senate.

Mr. HOWE. If that be one of the purposes, or the leading purpose, then I could only meet the views of the committee by voting against the adoption of the amendment, because, so far as my vote can influence the action of the Senate, I mean that it never shall make any such distinction; I mean that the Senate never shall intimate to the country that they intend to repudiate one of these obligations.

Mr. CLARK. We do not intimate any such thing.

Mr. GRIMES. Do I understand the Senator from Wisconsin to say that it is the theory of the Committee on Claims that we are bound by the laws of war and of nations to make good all losses that may have been sustained by individuals in the public defense?

Mr. HOWE. I do not understand the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. GRIMES. Do I understand the Senator from Wisconsin to say that it is the idea and opinion of the Committee on Claims, of which he is a member, that this Government is bound by the laws of nations and of war to make good to every individual any loss that he may have sustained in promoting the public defense? I understood the Senator to make a statement as broad as that.

Mr. HOWE. The Senator misunderstood me in two particulars. In the first place, he misunderstood me, if he understood me to speak for the Committee on Claims at all. If I understand my own position here, I am speaking in opposition to the Committee on Claims. In the second place, if he understood me to speak of the laws of nations or the laws of war, he misunderstood me. Now he will understand me correctly if he understands me to be speaking for myself, and to say for myself that it is my own opinion, irrespective of the laws of war or the laws of nations, that the Government of the United States is bound, by its own laws, and by every principle of equity and of good conscience, to pay for every dollar of property that it appropriates or destroys for the public defense.

That is my position, and I do not resort to the laws of war or to the laws of nations for my defense of it, and such being my opinion, I take this early opportunity to declare it. It is the opinion that has guided me so far in my action upon the Committee on Claims, and so far in my action in the Senate.

I should not have acquiesced in this amendment to the pending resolution for any reason in the world, unless I found upon the examination of the proofs that the measure of damages was clearly established in reference to the hay, and was not clearly established in reference to the barges.

Now it is said that the idea prevails among some members of the committee, and perhaps elsewhere, that it is not safe for Congress to act upon these claims individually, that the Treasury would be better protected by the creation of one tribunal, one committee, if you please, or one commission to proceed to hear all these cases. My own judgment is, and I say it now, that I think the Treasury will be vastly safer if you wait for these claims to come here rather than if you establish a commission to go and look them up.

Mr. CLARK. Nothing of that kind has been said.

Mr. HOWE. I understood it to be thrown out as the other course.

Mr. CLARK. I have not heard a word here about a commission going to hunt them up.

Mr. HOWE. No, but if you establish a commission, I suppose it is with a view of going into the localities and hearing testimony.

Mr. CLARK. The Senator will pardon me; I had not any such idea. My main difficulty is, that cases of this kind before a committee of Congress are tried only upon one side. I want some tribunal to have an opportunity of trying both sides, not a peripatetic commission to go around the country and hunt up claims to be tried and allowed; but I desire something that shall ascertain for the Government, as well as for the individual, what loss has been sustained.

If the Senator will permit me here, as I am now up, I desire to say, for the sake of being guarded, that the committee do not propose to repudiate any such claim as that of the Messrs. Cobb. I should be sorry to have such an impression prevail from the remarks of the Senator, he being upon the committee, because that remark coming from him might come with more force than it would from a person off the committee, as leading the public to suppose that the committee entertained the idea. The committee acknowledge the justice of many of these claims, and they acknowledge, too, that Congress, in their judgment, must pay for them when some way shall be ascertained for determining the amount of the damages.

Mr. HOWE. What I said in reference to repudiation was not predicated on anything I had heard in the committee. It was induced by remarks I had heard on the floor of the Senate and during this debate. So much on that point.

Now, in reference to this suggested commission rather than proposed commission, let me say that I understand the difficulty in the way of getting at the exact truth in reference to these claims perhaps as well as the Senator from New Hampshire, the chairman of the committee; but I do not understand why we cannot clothe your Committee on Claims with all the power in reference to obtaining evidence and examining witnesses that you can any other tribunal. We may, I believe, in the matter of proof, guard the public interests just as well as any tribunal that you can establish. I think it would be decidedly better for us to make no distinction, to assume at once what is conceded to be the law of the land, that all these claims are equally to be respected, and proceed to hear them as the evidence is adduced, and to report upon them only when the evidence adduced satisfied us of the justice of the claim.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from New Hampshire, to postpone the further consideration of this joint resolution until to-morrow.

Mr. COWAN. I am willing to postpone this resolution, but at the same time I desire to say a word on the argument offered by the committee, that there was no evidence before them on the part of the Government to show the value of these barges.

Mr. CLARK. The Senator misunderstood me if he understood me to say there was no evidence.

Mr. COWAN. I certainly understood the honorable chairman to say that the evidence they had before the committee as to the value of the barges was ex parte, and he thought it dangerous to report it on such evidence.

Mr. CLARK. Exactly.

Mr. COWAN. Then if it was ex parte, it must be on the part of the owners of the barges, and not on the part of the Government. I suppose that in appearing before a committee here, representing to a certain extent the Government, it was not necessary that formal notice should be given to the General Government to appear before the committee when a claimant came before Congress to have his just dues paid.

For my own part, I think that the obligation to pay for this hay is perfect and complete, because in either event the Government was guilty of a tort toward the owner, or of a breach of contract. The obligation to pay for the barges is equally complete, because it destroyed, in an emergency, the property of the citizen for the common defense of the whole, and it is well known that in such cases the whole always feel themselves obliged to pay. How far we are able to pay now for damages which arise from torts done by the Government to the citizen is another question, and, as I understand the committee, that is the question which they desired to raise by this amendment. If we adopt this amendment now, it is to be taken that we will pay whatever damages we are bound to pay for the breach of our contracts, but that we postpone all the damages which have accrued to individuals on account of our torts. That will be the result of it; and perhaps the committee are right in desiring a clear, fair understanding as to the course we intend to pursue with regard to this question, although I am free to say that I cannot see the slightest difference in the world between the force of the obligation which rests upon us in the one case and in the other.

If there is any difference in the force of this obligation, how are we to justify ourselves to one who has suffered by saying to him, "Although the obligation of the law rests upon us in your case as strongly as it does in the case of another, we cannot afford you relief?" How are we to say to the Government contractor who has agreed to deliver to the Government five thousand tons of hay upon a given day and it is destroyed in transitu for the defense of the whole, that we will pay him the amount we contracted to pay, and yet to another man equally meritorious, and equally loyal, with an equal amount of hay, and destroyed equally in defense of the whole, "We cannot pay you?" Will not the citizen be likely to ask, under circumstances of that kind, why you make a difference between a man who contracts with you and one who does not contract? You destroy his property for the defense of the whole and you pay him; you destroy mine for the defense of the whole, and you do not pay me; and why? Because I am not a Government contractor. I confess that I do not see this distinction, which certainly exists without a difference so far as the citizen is concerned. Whether there is policy in postponing the claims of those who are not Government contractors, because of their enormous magnitude, is another question; but if one is to be postponed, I do not see why the other ought not to be, for the benefit of the exchequer, unless it may be, perhaps, that if we postpone the claims of contractors we shall have no contractors; if we decline to pay those who have contracted to furnish us goods by a day certain, which we are obliged to destroy in transitu, perhaps nobody will contract with us; but that is another question.

All these questions I understand are raised by this amendment, and I have no objection that the bill be postponed in order that the Senate may act advisedly upon it, because it is a question of graver importance than would appear at first sight—one upon which, perhaps, the fate of the country may depend, because the fate of the country may depend upon the exchequer, and if its coffers are drained to pay these damages we may not be able to replenish them in time to carry to a successful conclusion the enterprise we have undertaken.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Perhaps it is proper that I should say one or two words in behalf of my constituents who are interested in this joint resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question before the Senate is on postponing the resolution until to-morrow.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I believe the debate has extended slightly beyond that technical question. I do not desire to occupy the attention of the Senate more than a moment. I shall not object to the postponement, but I hope this resolution will not be postponed so as finally to be lost in the Senate if the amendment should be made.

Mr. CLARK. I assure the Senator that I intend to call it up again.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I rely upon that. If the amendment shall be made eventually, of course the resolution will have to go to the House of Representatives again for consideration of the amendment there; and Senators are aware of the difficulty of securing the consideration of that body to private bills. When I was a member of the Committee on Claims at the last session, I think there was a difference between the two classes of obligations on the part of the Government. We must pay contractors, else we cannot get supplies; and we cannot postpone the claims of contractors until after the war is closed without impairing the faith of the Government to such an extent as to make it difficult to get supplies. So we ought to pay these contractors as if the hay were actually delivered. But I desire to say that according to my understanding in committee, the question was not so much whether the Government is bound to pay for property which she herself has destroyed, as whether Congress shall make an appropriation in each particular case, or provide by a board or in some other way for ascertaining the claims generally.

I do not think there was very much difference touching the obligation of the Government to pay for property that was destroyed by the Army to prevent its falling into the hands of the enemy, or to prevent its being used as a matter of defense to the enemy. But I want to make this suggestion to the chairman: inasmuch as by the act of the Government these claims are united, and inasmuch as the full investigation of the Senate and House of Representatives has been given to them, is it not better to let both go together as a whole? There is no question about the right of the case; and may we not pass this joint resolution as it came from the other House without establishing a precedent that will govern us hereafter? We do not want to take up each claim and decide it now; but these necessarily came together; we have examined them, and I think we may as well pass this resolution as it came from the House of Representatives, and then this case will never come before Congress or a commission again.

Mr. CLARK. I desire to say to the Senator from Indiana that I have not the least objection to allowing the whole claim if the Senate so decide; and he is entirely right, I think, when he says that there was but very little difference among the Senators composing the committee in regard to the justice of this class of claims; but as they pressed upon the committee in large numbers, the committee determined at an early day to bring a knowledge of that fact to the Senate so that they might have some indication which they may regard, and that is all they desire to accomplish by this amendment.

Mr. GRIMES. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business. The motion was agreed to; and after some time spent in executive session, the doors were reopened, and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Monday, January 23, 1865.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. CHANNING.

The Journal of Friday last was read and approved.

APPOINTMENT OF MEMBER OF COMMITTEE.

The SPEAKER announced that he had appointed Mr. STEELE, of New York, to fill the vacancy on the committee of investigation on certain charges against Hon. LUCIEN J. ANDERSON, in place of Mr. J. C. ALLEN, excused.

THANKS TO MAJOR GENERAL SHERIDAN.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, is it now in order to offer a resolution of thanks to Major General Philip H. Sheridan?

The SPEAKER. Not until after the morning hour. The Chair only enforces the construction of the rules made by the Committee on Rules at the last session.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Then I give notice that after the morning hour I shall submit such a resolution.

CALL OF COMMITTEES.

The SPEAKER stated the first business in order to be the call of committees for reports to be referred and not to be brought back by a motion to reconsider.

BENJAMIN ROACH.

Mr. HALE, from the Committee of Claims, reported a joint resolution for the relief of Benjamin Roach; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and ordered to be printed.

COURT OF CLAIMS.

Mr. HALE. I am instructed to report from the same committee an act supplementary to an act entitled "An act to restrict the jurisdiction of the Court of Claims," &c., and to ask that it be considered now.

The SPEAKER. That cannot be done at this time.

Mr. HALE. Then I ask that the bill be re-committed to the Committee of Claims.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will have the rule read. It is a question whether the objection does not apply. The rule is imperative.

The Clerk read the rule, (a portion of rule 51,) as follows:

"On the call for reports from committees on each alternate Monday, which shall commence as soon as the Journal is read, all bills reported during the first hour after the Journal is read shall be committed, without debate, to the Committee of the Whole, and, together with their accompanying reports, printed; and if during the hour all the committees are not called, then, on the next alternate Monday, the Speakers shall commence where such call was suspended: Provided, That no bill reported under the call on alternate Mondays and committed shall be again brought before the House by a motion to reconsider."

Mr. HALE. I withdraw the report.

Mr. HOLMAN. I suggest to the gentleman that he pursue the same course in reference to the joint resolution first reported by him.

Mr. HALE. I withdraw that also.

The SPEAKER. That can only be done by unanimous consent.

No objection was made.

Mr. SCHENCK. Do I understand that reports made under this call must go upon the Calendar without debate?

The SPEAKER. That is the rule, and they cannot be brought back by motions to reconsider.

CALL OF STATES FOR RESOLUTIONS.

The call of the committees having been concluded, and no further reports being made, the Speaker proceeded, as the next business in order, to call the States and Territories for resolutions and bills on leave, commencing, where the call was last suspended, with the State of Ohio.

Mr. SPALDING. I desire to offer a resolution.

The SPEAKER. Only one bill or resolution can be offered by any member upon this call. The gentleman offered one last Monday; but if there be no objection, he can offer another now.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I must insist upon the regular order. I want the State of Illinois to be reached.

The SPEAKER proceeded with the call.

DUTY ON PAPER.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I offer the following joint resolution:

Be it resolved, &c., That in lieu of the duty on printing paper, unsized, used for books and newspapers exclusively, now levied by law, there shall be levied, collected, and paid, a duty of three per cent. ad valorem.

The joint resolution was read a first and second time.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I demand the previous question on the engrossment and third reading of the joint resolution.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I hope that resolution will not pass without some discussion upon it. It is too important to be decided under the previous question in this summary manner.

The SPEAKER. The demand for the previous question cuts off debate.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I hope the previous question will not be sustained. This is a very important question.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I suppose debate is not in order. I take it the House understands the question fully, and we may as well try the question now.

Mr. BROOMALL. Is it in order to have this resolution considered to-day?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. BROOMALL. Being a joint resolution?

The SPEAKER. It is in order.

Mr. SPALDING. I move to lay the joint resolution on the table.

Mr. MOORHEAD. Is it in order to move to refer the resolution to the Committee of Ways and Means?

The SPEAKER. It will be in order if both the pending motions, for the previous question and to lay on the table, shall be voted down.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I appeal to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SPALDING] to withdraw his motion and let us refer the resolution to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. SPALDING. I withdraw my motion, and shall vote against sustaining the previous question.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I move to refer the joint resolution to the Committee of Ways and Means.

The SPEAKER. The motion is not in order pending the demand for the previous question.

The House divided on the demand for the previous question, and there were—ayes 31, noes 34; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. WASHBURN, of Illinois, and GANSON, were appointed.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Pennsylvania. I would like to inquire what is the present duty on paper?

The SPEAKER. The Chair cannot answer that question. It is in the nature of debate.

The House again divided, and the tellers reported—ayes 56, noes 47.

So the previous question was seconded.

The question recurred upon ordering the main question to be now put.

Mr. DAWES. I demand the yeas and nays.

We want an opportunity to discuss this question.

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I move to lay the joint resolution upon the table.

Mr. COX. On that motion I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. MORRILL. I would like to inquire whether it would be in order to ask to be excused from voting on this measure on the ground that the question is now pending before the Committee of Ways and Means. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The Chair will direct the rule to be read, if the gentleman desires it.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. To relieve the gentleman, I will, if he desires it, move that he be excused from voting.

The SPEAKER. The question is now on the motion that the joint resolution be laid on the table, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 43, nays 84, not voting 53; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alley, Ames, Ashley, Bally, Boutwell, Broomall, William G. Brown, Cole, Creswell, Henry Winter Davis, Thomas T. Davis, Dawes, Dixon, Elliot, Farnsworth, Frank, Garfield, Griswold, Hale, Higby, Hooper, Jenckes, Kelley, Orlando Kellogg, Knox, Marvin, McBride, McClurg, Moorhead, Morrill, Amos Myers, Leonard Myers, Charles O'Neill, Peiham, Pike, Alexander H. Rice, John R. Rice, Shannon, Spaulding, Stevens, Thayer, Tracy, and William B. Washburn—43.

NAYS—Messrs. James C. Allen, Allison, Ancona, Anderson, Arnold, Augustus C. Baldwin, Baxter, Beaman, Blaine, Boyd, Brooks, James S. Brown, Ambrose W. Clark, Cobb, Coffroth, Cox, Cravens, Dawson, Denning, Denison, Donnelly, Eckley, Eden, Edgerton, Eldridge, Flinn, Ganson, Grider, Harding, Harrington, Charles M. Harris, Herick, Holman, Asabel W. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Ingersoll, Philip Johnson, Kasson, Francis W. Kellogg, Kernan, King, Law, Lazarus, Le Blond, Long, Longyear, Malory, McDowell, McIndoe, Middleton, Samuel F. Miller, Morrison, Noble, Norton, John O'Neill, Orth, Patterson, Pendleton, Price, Samuel J. Randall, William H. Randall, Robinson, Edward H. Rollins, Ross, Schenck, Scofield, Scott, Sloan, John B. Steele, William G. Steele, Strouse, Sweat, Townsend, Upson, Wadsworth, Elithu B. Washburn, Whaley, Wheeler, Clifton A. White, Joseph W. White, Wilder, Wilson, Windom, and Yeaman—84.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. William J. Allen, John B. Baldwin, Blair, Bliss, Blow, Brandegee, Chamber, Freeman Clarke, Clay, Driggs, Dumont, English, Gooch, Grinnell, Hall, Benjamin G. Harris, Hotchkiss, Hubbard, Hutchins, William Johnson, Julian, Kibbleschick, Knapp, Littlejohn, Loan, Marey, McAllister, McKimney, William H. Miller, Daniel Morris, James R. Morris, Nelson, Odell, Perry, Pomroy, Pruyn, Radford, Rogers, James S. Rollins, Smith, Smithers, Starr, Sutes, Stuart, Thomas, Van Valkenburgh, Voorhees, Ward, Webster, Williams, Winfield, Benjamin Wood, Fernando Wood, Woodbridge, and Worthington—53.

So the House refused to lay the resolution on the table.

THE SPEAKER. The question now recurs on ordering the main question to be now put, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The question was taken, and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 88, nays 44, not voting 48; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. James C. Allen, Allison, Ancona, Anderson, Arnold, Ashley, Augustus C. Baldwin, Baxter, Beaman, Blaine, Bliss, Boyd, Brooks, James S. Brown, Ambrose W. Clark, Cobb, Coffroth, Cox, Cravens, Dawson, Denison, Donnelly, Driggs, Eckley, Eden, Edgerton, Eldridge, Finck, Ganson, Grider, Grinnell, Harding, Harrington, Charles H. Harris, Herrick, Holman, Asahel W. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Ingersoll, Philip Johnson, Julian, Kasson, Kernan, King, Law, Lazear, Le Blond, Long, Longyear, Mallory, McDowell, McIndoe, Middleton, Samuel F. Miller, Morrison, Noble, Norton, Odell, John O'Neill, Orth, Patterson, Pendleton, Price, Samuel J. Randall, William H. Randall, John H. Rice, Robinson, Edward H. Rollins, James S. Rollins, Ross, Schofield, Scott, Sloan, John B. Steele, William G. Steele, Strouse, Sweet, Townsend, Upson, Wadsworth, Elihu B. Washburne, Whaley, Wheeler, Chilton A. White, Joseph W. White, Wilder, Wilson, and Yeaman—88.

NAYS—Messrs. Ames, Baily, Boutwell, Broomall, William G. Brown, Cole, Creswell, Henry Winter Davis, Thomas T. Davis, Dawes, Deming, Dixon, Eliot, Farnsworth, Frank, Garfield, Gooch, Griswold, Hale, Higby, Hooper, Jenckes, Kelley, Orlando Kellogg, Marvin, McBride, McClurg, Moorhead, Morrill, Daniel Morris, Amos Myers, Leonard Myers, Charles O'Neill, Perham, Pike, Alexander H. Rice, Shannon, Spalding, Stevens, Thayer, Tracy, William B. Washburn, and Williams—44.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. William J. Allen, Alley, John D. Baldwin, Blair, Blow, Brandegee, Chanler, Freeman Clarke, Clay, Dumont, English, Hall, Benjamin G. Harris, Hotchkiss, Hulburd, Hutchins, William Johnson, Kalbfleisch, Francis W. Kellogg, Knapp, Knox, Loan, Marcy, McAllister, McKimney, William H. Miller, James R. Morris, Nelson, Perry, Pomeroy, Pruyn, Radford, Rogers, Schenck, Smith, Smithers, Starr, Stiles, Stuart, Thomas, Van Valkenburgh, Voorhees, Ward, Webster, Windom, Winfield, Benjamin Wood, Fernando Wood, Woodbridge, and Worthington—48.

When the call of the roll had been concluded, Mr. ALLEY, who was not within the bar when his name was called, asked leave to vote.

Mr. HARRINGTON objected.

The result was then announced as above stated.

So the main question was ordered, which was on ordering the joint resolution to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. SPALDING. I move that the House adjourn; and on that motion I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. BROOMALL. I was just going to make the same motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. Speaker, I rise for the purpose of asking unanimous consent to make a suggestion to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I do not object, provided I am permitted to reply.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I object, unless we all have a chance to be heard.

The question recurred on the motion to adjourn.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 13, nays 115, not voting 54; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Baily, Cox, Henry Winter Davis, Thomas T. Davis, Dawes, Hale, Jenckes, Law, Moorhead, Alexander H. Rice, Spalding, Thayer, and William B. Washburn—13.

NAYS—Messrs. James C. Allen, Allison, Ames, Ancona, Anderson, Arnold, Ashley, Augustus C. Baldwin, John D. Baldwin, Baxter, Beaman, Blaine, Blair, Bliss, Blow, Boutwell, Boyd, Brooks, Broomall, James S. Brown, William G. Brown, Ambrose W. Clark, Clay, Cobb, Coffroth, Cole, Cravens, Creswell, Dawson, Deming, Denison, Dixon, Donnelly, Driggs, Eckley, Eden, Edgerton, Eliot, Farnsworth, Frank, Garfield, Gooch, Harding, Harrington, Charles H. Harris, Herrick, Higby, Holman, John H. Hubbard, Ingersoll, Philip Johnson, Julian, Kasson, Kelley, Francis W. Kellogg, Orlando Kellogg, Kernan, King, Le Blond, Littlejohn, Long, Longyear, Marvin, McClurg, McDowell, McIndoe, Middleton, Samuel F. Miller, Morrill, Daniel Morris, Morrison, Amos Myers, Leonard Myers, Noble, Norton, Odell, Charles O'Neill, John O'Neill, Orth, Patterson, Perham, Perry, Pike, Price, Samuel J. Randall, William H. Randall, John H. Rice, Robinson, Rogers, Edward H. Rollins, James S. Rollins, Ross, Schofield, Scofield, Scott, Sloan, John B. Steele, William G. Steele, Stevens, Strouse, Townsend, Tracy, Upson, Van Valkenburgh, Wadsworth, Elihu B. Washburne, Wheeler, Chilton A. White, Joseph W. White, Williams, Wilder, Wilson, Windom, and Yeaman—115.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. William J. Allen, Alley, Brandegee, Chanler, Freeman Clarke, Dumont, Eldridge, English, Ganson, Garfield, Grider, Grinnell, Griswold, Hall, Benjamin G. Harris, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, Hulburd, Hutchins, William Johnson, Kalbfleisch, Knapp, Knox, Lazear, Loan, Mallory, Marcy, McAllister, McBride, McKimney, William H. Miller, James R. Morris, Nelson, Pendleton, Pomeroy, Pruyn, Radford, Smith, Smithers, Starr, Stiles, Stuart, Sweet, Thomas, Voorhees, Ward, Webster, Whaley, Winfield, Benjamin Wood, Fernando Wood, Woodbridge, and Worthington—54.

So the House refused to adjourn.

During the vote,

Mr. JOHNSON, of Pennsylvania, stated that his colleague, Mr. STILES, was absent from the city, and that he had no doubt if he were present he would vote for the adjournment.

Mr. HERRICK stated that his colleague was detained from the House by illness.

Mr. SLOAN moved that the reading of the list be dispensed with.

Mr. SPALDING objected.

Mr. VAN VALKENBURGH stated that his colleague, Mr. POMEROY, was absent on account of illness.

Mr. MORRILL stated that his colleague, Mr. WOODBRIDGE, was detained from the House by sickness in his family.

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. BROOMALL moved that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Wednesday next, and on that motion demanded the yeas and nays.

Mr. MORRILL. I hope the gentleman from Pennsylvania will withdraw that motion.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I object to debate.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The motion was then disagreed to.

Mr. BROOMALL moved that the House do now adjourn; and on that motion demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered; and the motion was then disagreed to.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, demanded the previous question on the passage of the joint resolution.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts, moved that the resolution be laid upon the table.

Mr. HOLMAN demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 42, nays 91, not voting 49; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alley, Ames, Baily, John D. Baldwin, Boutwell, Broomall, William G. Brown, Freeman Clarke, Cole, Creswell, Henry Winter Davis, Thomas T. Davis, Dawes, Dixon, Eliot, Farnsworth, Garfield, Hale, Higby, Hooper, Jenckes, Kelley, Orlando Kellogg, Marvin, McBride, McClurg, Moorhead, Morrill, Daniel Morris, Amos Myers, Leonard Myers, Charles O'Neill, Perham, Pike, Alexander H. Rice, Shannon, Spalding, Stevens, Thayer, Tracy, William B. Washburn, and Williams—42.

NAYS—Messrs. James C. Allen, Allison, Ancona, Anderson, Arnold, Ashley, Augustus C. Baldwin, Baxter, Beaman, Blaine, Blair, Bliss, Blow, Boyd, James S. Brown, Ambrose W. Clark, Clay, Cobb, Coffroth, Cox, Cravens, Dawson, Denison, Donnelly, Driggs, Eckley, Eden, Edgerton, Eldridge, Finck, Frank, Ganson, Grider, Harding, Harrington, Charles H. Steele, Stevens, Strouse, Townsend, Tracy, Upson, Van Valkenburgh, Wadsworth, Elihu B. Washburne, Wheeler, Chilton A. White, Joseph W. White, Williams, Wilder, Wilson, Windom, and Yeaman—49.

The question recurring on the passage of the resolution—

Mr. JENCKES demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was put; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 98, nays 40, not voting 44; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. James C. Allen, Allison, Ancona, Arnold, Augustus C. Baldwin, Baxter, Beaman, Blaine, Blair, Bliss, Blow, Boyd, Brooks, James S. Brown, Chanler, Ambrose W. Morris, Nelson, Noble, Pike, Pomeroy, Pruyn, Radford, Smith, Smithers, Starr, Stiles, Stuart, Thomas, Voorhees, Ward, Winfield, Benjamin Wood, Fernando Wood, Woodbridge, and Worthington—44.

So the resolution was passed.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, moved that the vote by which the resolution was passed be reconsidered; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

THANKS OF CONGRESS TO GENERAL SHERIDAN.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I ask unanimous consent to introduce a joint resolution.

Mr. BROOMALL. I object.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I move to suspend the rules. It is a resolution of thanks to General Sheridan.

Mr. BROOMALL. Then I withdraw my objection.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, then, by unanimous consent, introduced a joint resolution tendering the thanks of Congress to Major General Philip Sheridan, and the officers and men under his command; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

AMENDMENT OF THE CONSTITUTION.

Mr. FRANK, by unanimous consent, presented a concurrent resolution of the Legislature of New York, proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States so as to abolish slavery; which was laid on the table and ordered to be printed.

Mr. COX. I suppose such resolutions can be referred under the rule.

The SPEAKER. Resolutions from State Legislatures are generally received in the House and ordered to be printed. But the Chair is informed by the Journal Clerk that this resolution has already been printed.

Mr. FRANK. I think not.

The SPEAKER. If it has been printed, it will not be printed again.

Mr. SCHENCK. I rise to a question of privilege.

PRINTING OF AGRICULTURAL REPORT.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Connecticut. I ask the gentleman from Ohio to yield to me a moment.

Mr. SCHENCK. I will yield.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Connecticut. I ask unanimous consent to introduce the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Printing be directed to inquire into the cause of the delay in printing the agricultural and mechanical report for the year 1863, and make a report thereon.

Mr. Speaker, it has been announced by a portion of the press that these valuable reports have been printed and prepared for distribution, by reason of which, the farmers of the country are constantly calling for copies, and we are unable to respond. I was informed on Saturday by the superintendent of the folding-room, that the members of the House were entitled only to ten copies each, to that time, and that the balance would not be ready for distribution till some time in June next. I have offered the resolution to ascertain the reason of the delay, and that correct information may go to the country on the subject.

By unanimous consent the resolution was admitted, read, and agreed to.

USE OF THE HALL OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Will the gentleman from Ohio yield to me to present a resolution?

Mr. SCHENCK. I will; but I cannot yield any further.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I ask unanimous consent to introduce the following resolution:

Resolved, That the use of the Hall of this House be given to Bishop Simpson, for the purpose of a lecture, on Wednesday evening next, the 25th instant.

Mr. COX. I object to using the Hall for any purpose except that of legislation.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I move to suspend the rules.

Mr. ROSS. What kind of a lecture is it to be?

Mr. FARNSWORTH. It is to be a moral lecture, and therefore I hope my colleague will not object. [Laughter.]

On the motion to suspend the rules, the House divided; and there being—ayes 54, noes 51,

Mr. ECKLEY demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

So the rules were not suspended, two thirds not voting in favor thereof.

ENROLLED BILLS.

Mr. COBB, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles:

An act (H. R. No. 607) to provide for an advance of rank to officers of the Navy and Marine corps for distinguished merit; and

An act (H. R. No. 598) making appropriations for the consular and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the year ending the 30th of June, 1866; when the Speaker signed the same.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Department of the Interior transmitting an account of the superintendent and agent of the southern superintendency having charge of refugee Indians; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

EXCHANGE OF PRISONERS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House an answer of the Secretary of War to a resolution offered on the 21st of December last, in regard to the exchange of prisoners; which was read, ordered to be printed, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. SCHENCK. I am instructed by the Committee on Military Affairs to ask the unanimous consent of the House to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be authorized to send for persons and papers, and to examine witnesses, in their investigation as to the exchange and treatment of prisoners of war under former resolutions of this House.

There being no objection, the resolution was considered and agreed to.

BREACH OF PRIVILEGE.

Mr. SCHENCK. I now rise to a question of privilege, and I ask first to have read at the Clerk's desk the proceedings before a police court in this city, as published in a newspaper of Washington yesterday morning, in relation to a member of this House.

The Clerk proceeded to read an article from the Sunday Chronicle.

Mr. MALLORY. I rise to a question of order. Can that be regarded as a question of privilege in this House?

The SPEAKER. The Chair cannot yet ascertain whether it is a question of privilege or not.

Mr. SCHENCK. After the reading of the proceedings I propose to offer a resolution.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would state to the gentleman from Ohio that the proper mode would be to offer the resolution first.

Mr. MALLORY. I should say so.

The SPEAKER. The Chair can then decide whether it is a question of privilege or not.

Mr. SCHENCK. I can do that; but I supposed that, as a statement by a member is sometimes made accompanying the resolution, this publication might be received as such statement, but as that is objected to I will offer the resolution first.

Mr. MALLORY. If I could understand that it was a question of privilege I would not object to the manner of its introduction.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Whereas it is understood that on the evening of Friday, the 20th instant, A. P. Field, a citizen of Louisiana, did attempt by language of intimidation, and by bullying, to deter

William D. Kelley, a Representative in this House from the fourth district of the State of Pennsylvania, from the free and fearless exercise of his rights and duties as a member of Congress, and voting and deciding upon a pending subject of legislation, and did follow up the said attempt at intimidation and bullying by an assault upon the person of the said Representative Kelley, thus committing a breach of the privilege of this House: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That a select committee of five members be appointed by the Speaker to inquire into the said alleged breach of privilege; that the said committee have power to send for persons and papers, and to examine witnesses; and that the committee report as soon as possible all the facts and circumstances of the affair, and what order, if any, it is proper for this House to take for the vindication of its privilege, and right, and duty of free legislation and judgment.

Mr. MALLORY. I raise the question of order that the case set forth by the gentleman from Ohio does not bring the matter within the question of privilege.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would refer the gentleman from Kentucky to the 145th page of the Digest. In the Twenty-Second and Twenty-Third Congresses it was decided that an assault upon a member was a breach of privilege, and even the use of menacing language toward a member out of the House. The Chair has looked at it since the point was raised by the gentleman from Kentucky, and the various precedents have been there cited by the Journal Clerk of the House.

Mr. MALLORY. I am happy to hear that we are surrounded with more safeguards for our protection than I had supposed.

The Clerk then read the statement, as follows:

THE ASSAULT AND BATTERY UPON JUDGE KELLEY.—The case of A. P. Field, charged with assault and battery on Judge W. D. Kelley, member of Congress from the fourth district of Pennsylvania, was brought before Police Justice F. A. Boswell, at his office on E street, near Thirtieth street, at three p. m. yesterday.

Hon. Thomas Corwin, of Ohio, appeared as counsel for Field. Most of the congressional delegation from Louisiana were present.

Judge W. D. Kelley was sworn, and testified as follows: I was spending the evening of yesterday with Hon. Charles O'Neill, at his rooms on F street, where I met several friends. After a while we proceeded to Willard's Hotel to supper. At first I did not recognize what persons were at the table. Soon Judge Field asked, "Why do you keep us out in the cold? Why don't you admit us, like a man?" Rather than appear rude, I simply said, "I have nothing to do with admitting you; the question is in the committee, and is not yet before the House." Then he said, with an oath, "Why do you not come up like a man and toe the line?" I then remarked in subdued tones, "Judge Field, if you will inquire of my friends, you will find I am in the habit of toeing the mark; of marching up to the line." He then broke out more violently, "You dare not go home and face your constituency; you would quail before them." I replied, "Judge Field, my constituency will not rebuke me for excluding a man like you, who, before ladies, can act as you are doing." He then, uttering another oath, quitted the room, remarking as he did so, "I will hold you responsible; you shall feel me for that." I left the supper room in about fifteen or twenty minutes thereafter, and on passing into the hall saw Judge Field conversing with other gentlemen. On purpose to avoid him I endeavored to pass out the other way, but he saw me, and running to me, seized the collar of my coat with his left hand, while with his right hand he struck me, exclaiming as he did so, with an oath, "You shall give me satisfaction." The blow appeared to strike to the bone, and clear across it. I said, "You are an old man, and I wish you would go away; I do not want to strike you." He then made a second effort to strike me, but Major Harper seized his arm. Meanwhile I felt the blood trickling down, [witness here exhibited the wound; it was about one and a half inch long, on the back part of the hand, near the wrist.] People gathered around, and some at the tables of the hotel insisted on my going away. I told them I was not the culprit; they should take the other man away; he was the disturber. Judge Field went on the platform and talked with other gentlemen, saying he was armed, and he could take care of himself.

Judge Field. Did you not tell me at the table to go back and tell the people of Louisiana to send a more decent man there?

Answer. I uttered no such words; what I said was, my constituency will not rebuke me for excluding a man as you are, who behaves in the presence of ladies as you do.

Major Harper testified as follows: In the company of Judge Kelley and Hon. Leonard Myers, I went to the rooms of Hon. Charles O'Neill, about nine o'clock; left at half past ten or eleven o'clock, and went to supper at Willard's; I sat next to Judge Field, and Judge Kelley sat on my right; Judge Field leaned over and said, "Judge, why do you keep us out in the cold?" Judge Kelley replied that the delegation business was in committee, and had not come before the House; Judge Field then said Judge Kelley ought to toe the mark; a lady was sitting near, when Judge Field with an oath, said, "You dare not go before your constituency; you would quail before them;" he then left the table, saying he would see them before he was responsible. Suspecting there would be trouble, I came out first to see where Field was, and if possible prevent a collision; noticing the Judge sitting on the heater, I returned, and told Judge Kelley he had better go out by the side door; as he was passing out, I observed Judge Field advancing rapidly toward Judge Kelley, and as I came up he struck with his right hand and grappled with his left; on his attempt to strike the second blow, I saw the knife and arrested his arm; he wanted me to let go, but I would not; a clerk belonging to the hotel wished Judge Kelley to go away; the Judge replied that he was the injured man, and that the other should be taken care of; I went with Judge Kelley to get his wound dressed; when we returned Judge Field was walking up and down very much excited; I went with Judge Kelley to his room, and when I returned I found Judge Field had been arrested.

The knife he used was a dark-handled one with a small blade.

Judge Field. Did not Judge Kelley tell me to go and tell my constituency to send a more decent man there?

Answer. I sat between you, and I say Judge Kelley made no such remark as that. Such words did not issue from his mouth. You said you would hold him responsible, and have satisfaction.

Judge Field, with an oath, said the witness lied.

The court reminded the accused that such language could not be tolerated.

[Despite this reminder of the court, Judge Field continued, in the same style of language, to interrupt the witness with questions and remarks, which we deem it proper to exclude from our columns.]

Judge Kelley said: I have other witnesses, but I suppose their examination might be dispensed with. In view of the fact that Judge Field has told many persons that he would take my life, I ask that the bail be of so substantial a character that I can feel I have protection while going about my public duties.

Justice Boswell said he should require Judge Field to find bail in the sum of $500 to answer the charge of assault and battery at the next term of court, and a further bail of $1,000 to keep the peace toward Judge Kelley for the space of six months.

Mr. John D. Hammack became his bail for the sums named.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I offer the following amendment, to come in at the end of the resolution:

And until the report of such committee shall be made, the said A. P. Field shall be excluded from the privileges of this floor.

I understand that at present, by order of the House, he is entitled to the privilege of the floor; and that should be denied him.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Pennsylvania. I think we had better have him tried first. The committee will probably be able to report by to-morrow. We had better give this gentleman a fair opportunity of making his defense.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I think the facts are sufficiently verified already for us to take this action. Until the report of the investigating committee can be made, this man ought to be excluded from the floor.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Pennsylvania. I do not like to see the precedent established that upon the mere reading of a newspaper article the House should take such action as this. Let us have a full investigation of the matter, and I will go as far as any gentleman will in making any order which may be necessary to protect any member from any threat or violence from any blackguard either inside the House or outside of the House, whether it be upon this side of the House or upon the other side.

Mr. MOORHEAD. I desire to know from the Chair whether an amendment to the amendment is in order.

The SPEAKER. It would be if it were germane.

Mr. MOORHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I dislike the appearance of the Pennsylvania delegation or of any member of it coming here invoking the protection of the House. I dislike the asking of a committee to investigate this matter.

Mr. COX. I would like to inquire whether the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FARNSWORTH] has been accepted by the mover of the original resolution.

Mr. SCHENCK. I have no objection to it; but I do not accept it. I leave it to the House.

Mr. COX. Is it in order to debate it?

The SPEAKER. It is; and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORHEAD] is on the floor debating it.

Mr. MOORHEAD. I think that this was so gross an outrage, without any provocation, without any cause, that this House should adopt the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. FARNSWORTH], and exclude Mr. Field from the privileges of the floor. I hope that will be done promptly and by a unanimous vote of the House. I do not think there is any member here who would wish to be associated with a man who would be guilty of so gross an outrage. But I do not wish to have the thing magnified. The question as to whether this man has a claim to a seat here has not been examined; but I would have him immediately excluded from the privileges of the House. I hope, therefore, that the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois will be adopted in place of the original resolution. I do not want to have any report from a committee.

I want to have this man excluded from the floor, and there have done with the matter. I move that as a substitute for the original resolution.

Mr. SCHENCK. Mr. Speaker, I am sorry to hear the remarks of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORHEAD] in reference to the character of this proceeding. I hold that you cannot magnify this proceeding in regard to its character. Whether Mr. KELLEY, a member of the House, has been assaulted, or whether Mr. Field or any one else has been admitted to the privileges of the floor, is a matter of the least possible consideration, as is also the question whether Mr. KELLEY comes from Pennsylvania or from Ohio, as compared with the great question which underlies this whole proceeding which I propose to the House.

Mr. Speaker, I know how able my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORHEAD] is to protect himself. I have not spoken in this resolution of this man Field as having been admitted, by any former resolution of the House, to the privileges of the floor. I studiously excluded that, wishing to present to the House the simple question whether any citizen, of any State or of any country, can undertake to intimidate or prevent from the free exercise of judgment and action on questions of legislation a member of Congress of the United States. I knew that that question had been distinctly raised in the case of Stanbery and Houston in 1831-32, and that the House, against its political character—it being then largely Democratic—maintained the ground that an attack made upon a member for words spoken in debate on this floor was such a breach of the privileges of the House as should be visited by punishment. After a long investigation at the bar of the House, Houston was brought before the bar of the House of Representatives and publicly reprimanded for his conduct by Mr. Stevenson, the Speaker, according to the order which the House had made. In that reprimand, which I commend to the consideration of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. MOORHEAD,] Mr. Stevenson, with all his political affinities and prejudices in favor of the culprit, took occasion, nevertheless, to speak in noble terms of the immense importance of protecting and defending free speech and free legislation in the House of Representatives against any attempt at intimidation from any citizen or other person.

Mr. DAWES. If the gentleman from Ohio will yield to me I will cite another instance that occurred in the other branch of Congress. When the late Senator Shields was elected, as he claimed, Senator from the State of Illinois, and when his seat was contested on the ground that he was not naturalized within the constitutional period, some one wrote a threatening letter to him and the Senate took action on it similar to that proposed here.

Mr. SCHENCK. The precedent to which I have referred is not by any means the only one; but it is one dating as far back as 1831-32, to which I believe every other since that time has conformed.

Now, it is true, perhaps, that this man, A. P. Field, who has made the assault upon a member, has been admitted to some privilege upon this floor, as one claiming a seat here as himself a Representative of the people. I have taken care not to mention that in the resolution, because I desire that, if such should be disclosed as a part of the history of the case and of the relation of that individual to this House, it should come in by way of aggravation of his offense, just as, in the case of Houston, the fact that he had been himself a member of Congress before the time of his making this assault upon one who was then a member, was cited by Mr. Stevenson, the Speaker, as a reason why he particularly had incurred the just censure of the House, being a man who ought better to have understood the privileges of the legislative body.

I beg leave to read, in reply mainly to the suggestion made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, some of the remarks made by Mr. Stevenson, of Virginia, Speaker of the House, (afterward minister to England,) in reprimanding Houston:

"If, in fulfilling the order of the House, I were called upon, as its Presiding Officer, to reprimand an individual uneducated and uninformed, it might be expected that I should endeavor, as far as I was able, to impress upon him the importance and propriety of sedulously guarding from violation the rights and privileges secured to the members of this House by our invaluable Constitution; but when addressing a citizen of your character and intelligence, and one who has himself been honored by the people with a seat in this House, it cannot be necessary that I should add to the duty enjoined upon me by dwelling upon the character or consequences of the offense with which you have been charged and found guilty. Whatever has a tendency to impair the freedom of debate in this House, a freedom no less sacred than the authority of the Constitution itself, or to detract from the independence of the Representatives of the people in the rightful discharge of their high functions, you are, no doubt, sensible, must, in the same proportion, weaken and degrade not only the Legislature of the nation itself, but the character of our free institutions."

It is therefore, I say, a matter of very little consequence who has been assaulted, so far as he himself is concerned; a matter of very little consequence who is the person who has made the assault; a matter of very little consequence whether the person assaulted or others in this House may or may not be able and willing to defend themselves against personal attacks. I trust there is no one here who would be craven enough to permit himself to be drubbed at pleasure by anybody outside for what he had done here while waiting for the House to act; but over and beyond that, and beyond the action of the police courts of the country, arises this question towering above all others, how far this House, as a part of the legislative department of the Government, will sit quietly by and permit anybody to interfere with members and assault them or undertake to intimidate and bully them and deter them from the free course of legislation here, and the part which they have taken, and which it is their duty to take, in that legislation.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, there is, I think, no one upon this side of the House who does not believe that this is a question of privilege. There is no one upon this side of the House, so far as I am aware, who would object to the motion as made by my colleague from Ohio; and I think that the compliments of the House are due to the gentleman for having presented this matter in the proper shape and with its proper dignity. But I think that the motion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FARNSWORTH] will tend to embarrass the matter somewhat, because it prejudices the case; it debars a quasi member, or a man who seeks privileges upon this floor, already granted to some extent, from coming here to present the claims of his constituency and the claims of his State. I would not, sir, be instrumental in debarring any one from presenting a case like that to be presented from the State of Louisiana. Whatever may be my opinion in the matter, I would not so far prejudice or prejudge the case as to rule out this man merely on the testimony as presented. First let us have this examination; let us know just what is the grievance complained of; let us know how far this man has violated the privilege of this House, either by intimidation or otherwise, and then the House will be prepared to take action upon the case. The man who is inculcated should also be heard, not on his own account, but on account of the constituency that he claims to represent. I think that the gentleman from Illinois will see the propriety of withdrawing his amendment and allowing the resolution of my colleague to be passed, so that an examination may be made and a fair hearing given to the man inculcated. Every man is entitled to be heard fairly before adjudged or convicted; and the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FARNSWORTH] goes upon the idea that this man is already guilty. Perhaps he is; but let us first have an examination into that, and then we will be prepared to vindicate the privileges of the House.

Mr. Speaker, I do not know that I would bring my case, if I had one, before the members of this body. I think that I would be prepared, owing to my physical capacity, to defend myself under the circumstances. [Laughter.]

But that is not the question before us. The gentleman from Pennsylvania over there—I refer to the gentleman from Pittsburg [Mr. MOORHEAD]—having a ponderous frame, having the ability to defend himself, does not feel the case as it comes home to me and other members upon this floor. There is a dispute as to the facts apparent already on the first reading. The gentleman from Pennsylvania claims that there was intimidation of him and his action upon this floor. The party inculcated says that he did not intend to intimidate the action of the gentleman from Pennsylvania. Let us have the issue fairly understood, and then the House will be prepared to act on the subject. But I will not prejudge the case by voting for the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message was received from the Senate, by Mr. FORNEY, its Secretary, notifying the House that that body further insisted upon its amendments to House bill No. 620, to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1865, disagreed to by the House, asked a further conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Messrs. CLARK, TRUMBULL, and POWELL the committee of conference on the part of that body;

That it had passed bills of the following titles, in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House:

An act (S. No. 402) to repeal an act entitled "An act to remove the United States arsenal from the city of St. Louis, and to provide for the sale of the lands on which the same is located;" and

An act (S. No. 136) for the relief of A. T. Spencer and Gurdon S. Hubbard;

That it had passed House bill No. 94, for the relief of Isaac R. Diller, with amendments, in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House;

That it had passed House joint resolution No. 140, authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to give the necessary notice stipulated pending the intention of the United States to purchase the building known as the Merchants' Exchange, New York city, now used for custom-house purposes, without amendment;

That it had agreed to the amendment of the House to Senate joint resolution No. 98, to present the thanks of Congress to Major General Alfred H. Terry, and the officers and men under his command; and

That it requested the return of Senate bill No. 212, for the relief of Henry A. Brigham.

BREACH OF PRIVILEGE—AGAIN.

Mr. THAYER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call the attention of the House to the fact that in Houston's case, which has been referred to by the gentleman from Ohio who introduced this resolution, immediately on the communication being presented to the House from Mr. Stanbery, member of Congress from Ohio, Mr. Vance, one of the Representatives from the State of Ohio, moved the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the Speaker do issue his warrant, directed to the Sergeant-at-Arms attending this House, commanding him to take in custody, wherever to be found, the body of Samuel Houston, and the same in his custody to keep, subject to the further order and direction of this House."

The resolution was read; and after debate thereon a motion was made by Mr. Speight to amend the same by striking out all after the word "resolved," and inserting the following:

"That a select committee be appointed, to whom shall be referred the communication of Hon. William Stanbery, a member of this House from the State of Ohio, in relation to an assault and battery committed on him by Samuel Houston, with power to take such steps as will insure a thorough investigation of the transaction."

After further debate, the question was put on Mr. Vance's original resolution, and it was adopted on the mere communication from a member of this House who had been assaulted. This House, by a large majority, adopted the resolution of Mr. Vance, and commanded the Speaker of this House to issue his warrant for the immediate arrest of the offender, and his compulsory attendance before the House to answer for a high breach of its privileges.

There is another case which occurred at the second session of the Twenty-Third Congress, in which Mr. John Ewing, a member of this House, was assaulted by John F. Lane, a lieutenant of the United States Navy, and on the communication of the fact to the House, the House immediately asserted its jurisdiction and took all the proceedings in the premises.

Now, sir, it is objected by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Cox] that the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois presupposes the guilt of the defendant. The principle upon which this House has heretofore acted in cases of this kind is this: that where a prima facie case has been shown to the House of a breach of its privileges, this House will act immediately by an arrest of the offender, and bringing him to the bar of the House to answer for his high offense. That was done in the Houston case. He was immediately brought to the bar of the House.

A VOICE. He was a member.

Mr. THAYER. No, sir; I beg the gentleman's pardon; he was not a member of the House, but he had been a member. And, sir, I suppose that the case of a man who is here asking for admission to this House presents quite as strong a case for the action of this House as that of a man who had been a member of the House.

But the action of the House has never been confined to cases of assaults committed by a member upon a member. The cases are numerous on the Journal of the House in which the House has asserted its determination to maintain its privileges and its dignity by arresting and bringing to its bar, and trying and punishing anybody, it makes no difference who, who is guilty of a breach of the privileges of this House. There can be no greater breach of the privilege of this House than an assault upon a member of the House for his political action.

Now, I suggest to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Cox] if the House of Representatives was justified in Houston's case, upon the simple statement of Mr. Stanbery, a member of the House, in ordering its Sergeant-at-Arms to take Mr. Houston into custody, and bring him immediately to its bar for trial, where he was tried and punished, that we do not go beyond the precedent simply in passing a resolution that the gentleman who is accused of having committed this breach of privilege shall be excluded from the privileges of the floor of this House during the examination which is contemplated by the resolution before the House.

Mr. COX. Do I understand the gentleman to say that he would vote for this amendment as a punishment, without giving the gentleman from Louisiana a hearing upon this floor?

Mr. THAYER. Not at all.

Mr. COX. Then you are not in favor of the amendment?

Mr. THAYER. I favor it upon this ground: I think that no man against whom a prima facie case is made out by a member of this House of an assault upon him in the exercise of his representative privileges, is fit to come into this House while he rests under that charge. If the investigation shall prove that the charge is groundless, that there has been an error of fact, I will be as quick as anybody to vote to restore the gentleman to the privileges of which he is deprived. But I maintain that a proper assertion of the dignity and self-respect of this House requires, when a prima facie case is made against a man of an assault committed upon a member of this House for the exercise of his privilege as a Representative, that that man shall not be permitted to come into this House until he has cleared his skirts of the charge preferred against him.

I have only to add that the present circumstances place this case in as strong a light as the case of Houston. Although no communication has been addressed to this House by my colleague, who was subjected to this gross and brutal insult, yet the testimony of that gentleman, given before the tribunal which examined into the charge, has been read within the hearing of my colleague, and he has not denied its correctness, and, by remaining silent, he has given his acquiescence to the correctness of the report. Members of the House, then, in my opinion, are bound to take the statement which has been read within the hearing of the gentleman from the fourth district of Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] as the statement of the gentleman himself. It is the record of his own testimony; it is a record which, by listening to here, he indorses as correct; and therefore it stands before the House in as strong a light as if the gentleman from the fourth district of Pennsylvania had sent a written communication to this House, informing this House of all the circumstances of the assault—the manner in which it was done by Stanbery in the Houston case.

The House cannot be too jealous of its dignity and its rights. We do not inquire in regard to a private injury. It is upon no such idea that the action of this House is predicated. It goes upon higher grounds, and those grounds are that the rights of the people in the keeping of their Representatives here upon the floor of this Hall, as well as the untrammelled liberty of the Representative to act according to his best conscience in regard to the rights and interests of his constituents on political questions which come before the House, are of so sacred a character that the House will rebuke the first intimation of an invasion of them in attempting to influence the conduct of a member of this House by an appeal to violence. It is upon this principle that this House has always acted. It is upon this principle, I trust, that the House will act now; and I hope that the House will not show by its action in the present case that it is behind the Twenty-Second Congress in its appreciation of its own dignity and self-respect, and in the assertion of its determination to bring to immediate justice anybody who outrages the rights of the people in the person of the Representative. Sir, I hold that while this inquiry is going on, and in the face of the prima facie case which has been presented to the House, the person who has been charged with this offense should be excluded from the privileges of the floor of this House.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I wish to add only a word or two. I think my colleague [Mr. SCHENCK] has followed the precedents laid down in the Houston and Stanbery case, and that he intends to give a fair chance for an examination of this case before he proceeds to affix a penalty. That case of Houston and Stanbery was a case that excited a great deal of interest at the time. It is well known, and especially in my own district, for Stanbery happened to be a predecessor of mine in the district which I formerly represented, and he never came back to Congress because he submitted to this flogging by Houston. But the resolution offered by Mr. Davis, of Massachusetts, in that case looked to a fair hearing before punishment. An order was made that Houston should be placed at the bar of the House and that the letter of Stanbery should be read to him; after which the Speaker put to him certain interrogatories. Here is one of them: "Do you deny or admit that you assaulted and beat the said Stanbery, as he has represented in the letter which has been read, a copy of which has been delivered to you by the order of the House?" This was preliminary to punishment. But the gentleman proposes to hang the man first and try him afterward. That is not fair; it is not according to the rules of criminal jurisprudence.

Mr. THAYER. The gentleman will allow me to say that I do not propose to do any such thing. I do not propose to punish this man until he be duly convicted; but I do propose, after a prima facie case is made out against him, to exclude him from the floor of the House until investigation shall prove him innocent.

Mr. COX. Well, I look upon that as a penalty, as a punishment, and perhaps the only punishment that this House can inflict upon him. The only connection he has with the House is the privilege of the floor which the House has granted him.

Mr. SCHENCK. Will my colleague yield to me for a moment?

Mr. COX. Certainly, sir.

Mr. SCHENCK. Mr. Speaker, I have made myself familiar with this Stanbery case, and indeed I had a pretty lively recollection of that case from its political aspect; for, although then a very young man, I was connected with one of the members here who was very active in the course of this proceeding, in seeing that proper action of the House was had against Houston.

The member from Pennsylvania [Mr. THAYER] is right in this, that in that case, instead of appointing a committee in the first place to investigate and report to the House, a warrant was immediately issued, and Houston was brought to the bar of the House. I have no objection at all to that course being pursued now. I thought that perhaps the one which I have proposed might save time and accomplish the end as well. That was my only reason for deviating from that particular precedent. After Houston had been brought to the bar of the House, however, a committee was appointed, at the head of which was Mr. Davis, of Massachusetts, to report what proceedings the House would take in the case. That committee reported that Houston, who had been sent from the bar while the matter was being discussed, should be again brought to the bar and certain questions put to him in succession, touching his admission or denial of the charge made by Mr. Stanbery; and after a full examination of Houston, himself, at the bar, he was again withdrawn, and the House proceeded to consider what they would do.

Now, it so happened that Houston, having been a member of the House, had the privilege of the floor at that time. There was a proposition to exclude him from the privileges of the floor pending the consideration of his case; but after the case had been fully heard a motion was made that he be punished in this form: first, that he be brought to the bar of the House, and reprimanded by the Speaker for the assault made on a member of the House; and second, that he be deprived of the privileges of the floor under—I think it was—the 13th rule. The House, it being in high party times, voted down that part of the punishment which excluded him from the floor; but it did adopt the resolution directing the Speaker to reprimand him, and he was punished accordingly. So that not only did the House not exclude Houston from the floor during the progress of the inquiry, but when that was proposed as a form of punishment it was voted down. That happens to be the fact in regard to Houston's case, who himself had the privilege of the floor as an ex-member, just as Field has now the privilege of the floor by an express resolution of the House. It was for that reason that I left out everything relating to Field's having the privilege of the floor, intending to leave that part of it for a future proceeding. If it be thought that part of the punishment should be to deprive him of the privilege of the floor, I, for one, shall think it a proper mode of punishment, and a very small part of what should be extended to him. But I did not propose that that should be done in the first instance.

Again, the gentleman is mistaken in this; but it is only to be accounted for by the fact that it was in high party times. Mr. Stanbery communicated by letter to the House that an assault had been made upon him by Mr. Houston, a citizen, near his lodgings on Pennsylvania avenue. On the motion being made to arrest Houston, a discussion arose, and it was questioned whether there was sufficient showing for the action of the House in the written statement of the member; and some of the colleagues and friends of Mr. Stanbery yielded a point which I think I never would have yielded, and in the midst of the discussion they sent out Mr. Stanbery and had an affidavit made of the truth of the facts stated in the letter. All that is obviated here, however, because the testimony which I have introduced is already sworn to. I do not think that any member has objected to it on the ground of its not being sufficient. I think I should prefer that Mr. Field should be brought to the bar of the House by the Sergeant-at-Arms, as was done in Houston's case; but, on consideration, I supposed that the other was a better mode. I should not object to an amendment proposing that Field should be brought to the bar of the House instead of what is proposed by my resolution; but in regard to the other matter of excluding him from the floor now, it is not only, as my colleague [Mr. Cox] has said, anticipating the decision and giving punishment before inquiry, but it is, so far as Houston's case is concerned, directly in face of the precedent where the House refused to take away from him the privileges of the floor.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Mr. Speaker, if this were a proceeding like the proceeding in the case of Houston, where the Speaker was directed to issue his warrant for the immediate arrest of the offender, there would be, of course, no propriety in refusing the individual the privilege of the floor, because, in such case, he could only come on the floor under arrest. The resolution offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] is for the appointment of a committee to investigate the case and report upon it to the House. This individual is not entitled, by right, to the privileges of the floor; nor is there any rule of the House entitling him to it. There is only an order of the House giving him that courtesy. It does seem to me that where a prima facie case like this is made out by the statement of the aggrieved party from Pennsylvania, it is eminently proper that this courtesy, heretofore extended to the culprit, should be withdrawn until the case shall have been investigated.

I do not propose to reply to the argument of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Cox] in regard to the rights of this man's constituents. He is not on the floor of the House as a member representing a constituency. He has no right here to engage in debate, or to vote. He is only entitled, under the order of the House, to the courtesy of appearing on the floor until his case is decided, and to debate that particular case, and nothing else.

Waiving all discussion as to the question whether this man's presence in the House, or his absence from it, under existing circumstances, would be most prejudicial to the rights and interests of Louisiana, I think it is due to ourselves, due to our dignity, due to the propriety of the House, and to the rights of members, that a man who has committed so gross and unprovoked an assault as that should be denied the courtesy of appearing on the floor, especially as the interests of Louisiana will not be injured by his absence.

HENRY A. BRIGHAM.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House the following message from the Senate, which was read:

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,
January 23, 1865.

Ordered, That the Secretary be directed to request the House of Representatives to return to the Senate the bill (S. No. 212) entitled "An act for the relief of Henry A. Brigham," passed by the Senate and sent to the House for its concurrence on the 19th instant.

Attest: J. W. FORNEY,
Secretary.

The SPEAKER. If there is no objection, the bill will be returned as requested.

There was no objection.

BREACH OF PRIVILEGE—AGAIN.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I would not have undertaken to trouble the House in relation to this matter but for the fact that all these questions may hereafter be drawn into a precedent. They may be quoted hereafter under other circumstances, not so aggravated as the present; and what may now seem almost nothing may some time become a monstrous outrage, of which the House will have to take cognizance.

I do not propose, in saying what I have said, to defend the conduct of this quasi member from Louisiana. He may be all that is charged, both a bully and a blackguard; but as he comes before us with the privileges, granted to him by this House, of appearing here for the purpose of sustaining the great right of representation in the popular branch of the national Legislature, he is entitled to more consideration than was Mr. Houston, whose term as a member of Congress had expired, and who had no such business and no such privilege in that highest sense. Now, sir, it will appear from this precedent that the House of Representatives, before undertaking to punish Mr. Houston for this attack upon a member, was more careful even than our courts of justice are in the trial of criminals. The House did not punish simply upon the prima facie case, as the gentleman calls it—the case sustained by affidavit and the communication of Mr. Stanbery sent in writing to the Speaker; but after the arrest, the House proceeded to pass resolutions, reported to the House by a committee that was raised, proposing questions to be put to the accused—questions in relation to the assault, questions in relation to the motive of the assault, and finally requiring all the testimony to be reduced to writing; and then, before any punishment, before any deprivation of privilege, the House resolved to give Mr. Houston a chance to be heard by himself and by counsel, according to the old rules of the common law.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I desire to ask the gentleman whether the House did not deny Mr. Houston a privilege by ordering him to be placed under arrest and by keeping him under arrest, and whether that was not as great a punishment as it would be to refuse a man the courtesy of the floor.

Mr. COX. It has never been considered as a punishment to bring a man up before a court of justice; that is preliminary to the punishment. If the gentleman will bring in a resolution to arrest this man Field and bring him here, and give him then a hearing, I will vote for it. I care nothing for him. All I want is that we shall not establish any precedent inconsistent with the right of every one to a fair trial.

Mr. THAYER. I desire to ask the gentleman whether in the case referred to, the defendant did not remain in the custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms, either actually or constructively, from the very moment of his arrest until the final action of the House in his trial and the sentence of the Speaker.

Mr. COX. And I would have no objection now to have Mr. Field brought here and placed in charge of the Sergeant-at-Arms, and put, as we have put witnesses, away down among the crypts of this Capitol, with nobody but the Speaker to have the privilege of looking at him. I might be willing to punish him even in that way, sir.

Mr. THAYER. The gentleman will allow me one moment. If I am correct in my statement that Houston remained in the custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms from the moment when he was taken into custody, by virtue of the Speaker's warrant, up to the time when his trial concluded before the House and the Speaker passed sentence upon him, then, of course, it is manifest that he could not have enjoyed the privilege of this floor during that time; and therefore the argument of the gentleman from Ohio, so far as it is founded upon any analogy to Houston's case, must, it seems to me, fail.

Mr. COX. Well, Mr. Speaker, suppose it to have been the fact that Mr. Houston was constructively in the custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms, he no doubt was upon the floor of the House during all the time. Besides, as I have already suggested, it has never been reckoned a punishment to arrest a man. That is only a preliminary to the trial; and the punishment is consequent upon the trial. And in the case of Houston we have the very analogy for this special case, because, so far as he had the privileges of the House, he was not punished by taking from him those privileges until his own testimony had been heard and reduced to writing, until he had been heard by counsel, and the House had judged upon his case; and then they punished him, and punished him in the manner which is in this case proposed in advance by the proposition of my friend from Illinois.

Mr. J. C. ALLEN. Mr. Speaker, there is one consideration which will settle my vote on this resolution of my colleague from Illinois, [Mr. FARNSWORTH,] and it is this: the whole case is presented by the resolution of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SCHENCK,] and I expect to vote for it. I repeat that I expect to give that resolution my vote; but while we are trying this man Field for an assault, I am willing to grant to him the privilege granted to every criminal in every court of being present and heard by himself or counsel in reference to the charges preferred against him. My colleague's resolution would not only deprive Mr. Field of the privilege of the floor, but would make this a sort of Star Chamber proceeding.

Mr. L. MYERS. Mr. Speaker, I did not expect at this time to have said anything about the subject before the House, and I should not now do so but for some remarks which fell from the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Cox] on the other side of the House. I wish to say to him and to the country, on behalf of my colleague from the fourth district, [Mr. KELLEY,] that he neither presented this case here, nor did he prosecute it before the police court. When this man Field was arrested my colleague was sent for as a witness, and gave his testimony as in duty bound. The subject has been presented here, and with great propriety, by the distinguished gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SCHENCK,] Still further; I witnessed the cowardly and brutal assault upon my colleague. I saw the whole proceeding from beginning to end, and without desiring to give evidence in the matter, I must add that while the language of this Mr. Field was as uncalled for, unprovoked, and insolent as his conduct was violent and outrageous, my colleague's replies to him were most proper and becoming, and when assaulted he was amply able to defend himself, held Field at a disadvantage, stating that his age alone protected him, and in fact exercised the greatest forbearance.

So much for the remarks of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. Cox.]

Mr. COX. I made no charge of that kind against the gentleman's colleague.

Mr. L. MYERS. There was an intimation which went upon the records; I know that it seemed to be made jocularly, but upon the record it appears serious. The gentleman [Mr. Cox] said that he doubted whether he would have come here to defend himself.

Mr. COX. That was a playful remark referring to my physical ability. [Laughter.]

Mr. L. MYERS. I understood the comic as well as the serious portion of the remark, but do not choose to leave anything to inference hereafter.

Now to another matter. The Journal of the proceedings of the House will show that the first day of this session, among others, this man Field presented himself here for admission with others claiming to be Representatives from the State of Louisiana. A resolution entitling them to seats in the House pending their application was offered—this is in answer to my friend from Illinois [Mr. J. C. ALLEN]—and was modified and passed, entitling them only to the privileges of the Hall of the House. Yet, sir, the gentleman would now go further and permit this Mr. Field to occupy a seat here by my colleague, whom he has so foully assailed, with privilege to discuss his case here.

Mr. J. C. ALLEN. I ask my friend from Pennsylvania whether a man should be denied the privilege of being present when he is being tried for grave offenses, and when, if guilty, it is proposed to punish him?

Mr. L. MYERS. Certainly not, sir; I would permit a criminal to be present when he is being tried.

Mr. J. C. ALLEN. The very thing it is now proposed to deny.

Mr. L. MYERS. Not at all, sir; the gentleman is begging the question, unless he wants this man brought to the bar of the House as a criminal—a course which, although eminently a proper one, is not now proposed. The resolution refers the case to a committee, so that testimony may be taken as to the character of the assault, and the facts be reported to the House for its action. The amendment offered adds that the privileges of the Hall heretofore granted to this A. P. Field shall be rescinded. That privilege, Mr. Speaker, was entirely a matter of courtesy, and certainly there is evidence enough before us, undisputed, to justify its withdrawal, without entering into the question of criminal intent.

There cannot be a doubt that the language used to my colleague was for the purpose of intimidating him from the discharge of what he might deem his duty as a member of this House, and if possible to influence his action and vote in regard to the admission of those claiming seats here from Louisiana. The attack followed close upon that language, leaving time only for a deliberation which but aggravates the case. Now, sir, it matters very little to me whether the amendment of my friend and colleague [Mr. MOORHEAD] shall take the place of the original resolution, or whether the amendment of my friend from Illinois [Mr. FARNSWORTH] be agreed to instead. I prefer the latter, however, as an addition to the resolution. What I desire is that the House shall take immediate action upon the matter as presented, and I trust it will assert its own dignity and exercise its undoubted prerogative by excluding this Mr. Field at once from the privileges of the floor, and then let his case be acted upon before the committee, where he may be heard if he sees fit.

Mr. HARRINGTON. I ask that the resolution, amendment, and substitute may be read.

They were read accordingly.

Mr. HARRINGTON. It seems, then, that the charge before the House is that a member of this House has been assaulted by one who claims to be a member-elect, upon certain grounds which are a breach of the privileges of this House. For one, I am opposed to the amendment. There is no evidence before the House, unless it be that taken before a police court, that there has been any violation of the privileges of the House. I would be as ready as any gentleman to punish a violation of such privileges under the provisions which are applicable to this body; but it seems to me that the exclusion of a man who is charged with this violation of privilege in itself is unwarranted and utterly at variance with every principle which has been recognized in these investigations. I do not know why the House should exclude a man from being heard in his defense because a member has been assaulted, any more than that a court should exclude a criminal or a supposed criminal for his offense because he has been indicted.

I do not know the cause which resulted in this encounter between the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] and the member-elect from Louisiana. It may have been a personal matter. If it was a matter of insult which the gentleman from Pennsylvania gave to the gentleman from Louisiana, it is a matter entirely between themselves. If it arose out of a personal insult, I would abide by the law and submit to the punishment, and I would resent it wherever it was given.

It is said here that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] has not asked for these proceedings. His sitting silent in his seat during these proceedings shows that he approves of and asks them, as he asked sureties for the peace before the magistrate in Washington, by the declaration that he was in fear of personal injury from Field. I would not do that if a thousand Fields were arrayed against me.

I insist, then, that the gentleman from Louisiana should be heard, unless you desire to declare, as the French Chamber declared, that every member of this assembly and his person is inviolate, whatever insults he may offer to the populace. I do not say that the gentleman from Pennsylvania insulted Mr. Field. I do not know how the matter was. If he did insult him, and Field had integrity and manhood, the gentleman should have been met and punished. But if Mr. Field, on account of something which transpired in the House only, attacked the gentleman from Pennsylvania, then the question of privilege applies.

For one, I am against the amendment, because to refuse to give to the gentleman from Louisiana a hearing upon this floor would do honor simply to the time of Jeffreys; would do honor to principles inapplicable to the jurisprudence of this country, at least. I do not believe the House of Representatives ought to belittle itself in such a manner as to declare that a man shall not be heard here because he happened to insult some gentleman upon this floor. I have heard the gentleman from Pennsylvania hurl his anathemas at this side of the House, in legitimate debate, in such a manner and spirit that had it been done elsewhere than in this House he would have been called to immediate account. And if he used such language to Field outside of this House he ought to have been called to account, and no man who laid any claim to manhood would have hesitated one moment to call him to account.

But, as I said before, I do not know the facts of the difficulty between these men, and I wish to hear the evidence. I wish to know what transpired between them, whether the gentleman from Pennsylvania did use toward the gentleman from Louisiana the same language with which he has insulted heretofore members upon this side of the House under shield of the privileges of the House. If he did, then I say his chastisement was just, and no man who had a spark of manhood would hesitate to visit it upon him. If he did not, if the assault was simply for something which he had done in the House, and it shall so appear upon the investigation, I will vote cheerfully to punish the offender, as having violated the privileges of the House.

Mr. THAYER. I do not see, the gentleman will excuse me for saying, much argument in what has fallen from him, and I regret that he should have amused himself by putting hypothetical cases to the House reflecting upon the character of the gentleman injured, rather than upon the aggressor.

But I do not want to take up the time of the House with that matter. I simply rose for the purpose of calling the attention of the House to the fact which appears upon the Journals of the House—it will be found on page 600 of the Journal of the first session of the Twenty-Second Congress—that Houston, who made an attack upon Stanbery, of Ohio, was in the custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms from the period of arrest upon the Speaker's warrant up to the time of his conviction and punishment by the House.

On page 600, for example, I find:
“Mr. DAVIS, of Massachusetts, from the committee appointed yesterday to report a mode of procedure in the case of Samuel Houston, who is now in custody by virtue of an order of the House, made a report,” &c.

The reported case in the Journals of this House shows conclusively that he was in custody from the time of his arrest under the Speaker's warrant until his case was disposed of.

Now we propose a much more lenient mode of dealing with the alleged aggressor in the present instance. I suppose that the method of proceeding which was adopted by the House in the Houston case would be more proper and more in accordance with the dignity and authority of this House; but, sir, inasmuch as if we were to proceed, as the House proceeded in that case, to arrest the defendant and bring him to the bar of the House, it would be necessary for the House to proceed with his trial, and in that event he could not be tried by a committee of the House, but must be tried in the face of the House by the members of the House; and inasmuch as that would consume a great amount of the public time which there is a pressing necessity to apply to the business of the Government, it is better that the course should be adopted which is contemplated by the resolution of the gentlemen from Ohio as first offered by him. But, sir, there is nothing in the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FARNSWORTH] which is at all in conflict with the Houston case, as the gentleman from Ohio seems to suppose.

Both the gentlemen from Ohio [Mr. Cox and Mr. SCHENCK] seem to have argued that because no motion was made to deprive Houston of the privileges of the floor during his trial it is to be inferred that the House did not deem it proper to deprive him of that privilege; but if you will read the report as it appears on the Journal you will see that he was deprived of the privilege, because, from the moment the charge was made in a responsible shape by a member of the House, he was taken into custody by the Sergeant-at-Arms, and remained in his custody until sentence was passed upon him by the Speaker. Now, the course contemplated by the gentleman from Illinois toward the alleged aggressor in this instance is of a much more mild character than the course of proceeding adopted in the Houston case; and I trust this House will, for the vindication of its own dignity, adopt both the resolution and the amendment.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. Speaker, I do not propose to occupy the time of the House at any great length. I cordially concur in the resolution offered by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SCHENCK,] and also in the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. FARNSWORTH,] with this exception, that I think something is due to the representative character of Mr. Field. I beg leave to suggest the following modification of the amendment, which I believe will meet with the assent of the gentleman from Illinois, and which would be more acceptable to me and to other members upon this side of the House:

And until the report of the committee shall be made, the privileges of the floor of this House heretofore extended to the said A. P. Field are suspended.

Several MEMBERS. That is precisely the same thing.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I have no objection to that, and will accept it as a modification of my amendment.

Mr. STEVENS. I now move the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered, being first upon the amendment offered by Mr. FARNSWORTH.

The question was put, and there were, on a division, yeas 72, noes 45.

Mr. ELDRIDGE demanded the yeas and nays. The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken, and it was decided in the affirmative; yeas 83, nays 38, not voting 59; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Arnold, Ashley, Bailey, John D. Baldwin, Baxter, Beaman, Blaine, Blow, Boutwell, Boyd, Broomall, Ambrose W. Clark, Cobb, Cole, Henry Winter Davis, Thomas T. Davis, Dawes, Dawson, Denning, Dixon, Donnelly, Driggs, Eckley, Eliot, Farnsworth, Ganson, Gooch, Grinnell, Griswold, Hale, Higby, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Julian, Orlando Kellogg, Knox, Lazear, Littlejohn, Loan, Longyear, Marvin, McBride, McClurg, Samuel F. Miller, Moorhead, Morrill, Daniel Morris, Amos Myers, Leonard Myers, Norton, Odell, Charles O'Neill, Orth, Patterson, Perham, Pike, Price, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Edward H. Rollins, Schenck, Scofield, Shannon, Sloan, Stevens, Thayer, Townsend, Tracy, Upson, Van Valkenburgh, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Whaley, Williams, Wilder, Wilson, and Windom—83.

NAYS—Messrs. James C. Allen, Ancona, Augustus C. Baldwin, Chandler, Clay, Cox, Cravens, Denison, Eden Edgerton, Eldridge, Finck, Grider, Harding, Harrington, Benjamin G. Harris, Charles M. Harris, Herrick, Philip Johnson, Kernan, King, Law, Le Blond, Long, McDowell, Morrison, Noble, Pendleton, Perry, Samuel J. Randall, William H. Randall, Robinson, Rogers, James S. Rollins, Ross, Spalding, Strouse, and Joseph W. White—38.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. William J. Allen, Alley, Anderson, Blair, Bliss, Brandegee, Brooks, James S. Brown, William G. Brown, Freeman Clarke, Coffroth, Creswell, Dumont, English, Frank, Garfield, Hall, Holman, Hulburd, Hutchins, William Johnson, Kathfisch, Kasson, Kelley, Francis W. Kellogg, Knapp, Mallory, Marcy, McAllister, McIndoe, McKinney, Middleton, William H. Miller, James R. Morris, Nelson, John O'Neill, Pomeroy, Pruyn, Radford, Scott, Smith, Smithers, Starr, John B. Steele, William G. Steele, Stiles, Stuart, Sweat, Thomas, Voorhees, Wadsworth, Ward, Webster, Wheeler, Chilton A. White, Winfield, Benjamin Wood, Fernando Wood, Woodbridge, Worthington, and Yeaman—59.

So the amendment offered by Mr. FARNSWORTH was agreed to.

The question recurred on the amendment offered by Mr. MOORHEAD as a substitute for the original resolution.

Mr. MOORHEAD. As the House has adopted the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. FARNSWORTH,] and inasmuch as there has been so much discussion of the matter, which has, perhaps, magnified unduly its importance, I will withdraw my substitute.

The resolution, as amended, was then agreed to.

DEFICIENCY BILL.

Mr. STEVENS presented the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 620) to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1865, having met, after full and free conference have been unable to agree.

THADDEUS STEVENS,
GEORGE H. PENDLETON,
Managers on the part of the House.
JOHN SHERMAN,
JOHN CONNESS,
C. R. BUCKALEW,

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I desire to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] on what point the disagreement arises.

Mr. STEVENS. There are, I think, four points of disagreement. There are large appropriations for California, some for Denver, and an appropriation for the contingent fund of this House; on all of which we disagreed.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I had understood that the only subject of disagreement between the two Houses was in relation to the additional compensation to employees of the House.

Mr. STEVENS. No, sir; there are other questions.

Mr. Speaker, as the Senate request the appointment of a new committee of conference, and have already appointed a committee on their part, I move that the House take similar action.

The SPEAKER. If there is no objection, the committee will be discharged and a new committee appointed.

There was no objection.

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege.

The other day, in the course of a controversy which I had with the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOFIELD] who sits before me, I had occasion to speak of a major general of the Army of the United States, who had been in command at New York, as a “gold robber.” In some of the public prints (no doubt from misunderstanding) I was reported as having spoken of him as a “bold robber.” Since those remarks have gone before the public I have received a letter from a major general of the United States who seems to suppose that the remarks which I made were particularly applicable to him, although there was in command at New York at the time another major general, and although that city is the favorite tarrying-place of major generals, there being probably six or more, on an average, at some of the hotels throughout all the year. I send to the Clerk a letter which I have received from a major general of the Army of the United States in reference to those words spoken in debate. I ask that it be read.

The Clerk read, as follows:

WASHINGTON, January 20, 1865.

SIR: I find in the Daily Globe of the 7th instant a report of your remarks in the House of Representatives on the 6th instant, an extract of which, personal to myself, is appended.

I have the honor to inquire whether your remarks are here correctly reported, except, perhaps, the misprint of "bold" for "gold," as the remarks were quoted in other papers; and also whether there were any modifications, explanations, or limitations made by you other than appear in this report.

The gentleman who hands you this will await or call for an answer at any time or place you may designate.

Very respectfully,

BENJAMIN F. BUTLER,
Major General.

JAMES BROOKS, Member of the House of Representatives.

[Extract.]

"I am bound to say that an effort was made by the Federal Government, during the pendency of the late presidential election, to control the city of New York by sending there a bold robber, in the person of a major general of the United States. Robber as he was of the public Treasury, and major general of the United States as he was, he dared not exercise the power given him to attempt to control the actions of those whom the gentleman calls thieves and robbers in his own city."

True copy:

F. C. CLARKE, Captain and A. D. C.

Mr. BROOKS rose.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I rise to a question of order. I submit that, if that be the evidence on which the gentleman from New York [Mr. Brooks] raises his question of privilege, it is not sustained by the evidence.

The SPEAKER. Before deciding this question, which affects a member of the House, the Chair would ask the gentleman from New York to designate which part of the letter he regards as an infringement of the privileges of the House.

Mr. BROOKS. Section six of article one of the Constitution, in defining the privileges of Senators and Representatives, provides that "for any speech or debate in either House they shall not be questioned in any other place."

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains that point, and would decide that the gentleman from New York could, under that provision of the Constitution, refuse to answer the question propounded by the major general. [Laughter.] But the Chair is serious in asking the gentleman from New York which part of the letter he regards as bringing it within the rule.

Mr. BROOKS. If the Chair will allow me, I will state presently.

That letter was presented to me by a Captain Clarke, who stated himself to be an aid-de-camp of Major General Butler. He was dressed in the uniform of the United States, and was in person a very handsome gentleman, who would grace the court as well as the camp. He was desirous of an early answer. I could not like, and I do not like, the presence of military gentlemen in the chambers of members of the House, requiring immediate answers, or any answer, to notes from their superior officers, [laughter,] and I stated to this aid-de-camp from General Butler that I would not give him an answer, but that in due time, after proper deliberation and in the proper manner, I would give an answer to the questions which General Butler desired to have answered. These remarks, respecting a major general of the Army of the United States, were made in debate, on the floor of this House, and I do not choose to enter into an epistolary correspondence with Major General Butler respecting them or any other remarks that I may make as a member of this House. Here, where I made them, I then propose to answer his question.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I rise to a question of order. The gentleman from New York is debating the subject while there is a question of order pending before the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the point of order raised by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Pennsylvania. I should like to know the question of order before the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state it for the information of the gentleman and of the House. The gentleman from New York [Mr. Brooks] rises and presents as a question of privilege a letter received by him from Major General Butler. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Boutwell] raises a question of order and claims that the letter, as read, does not show any breach of the privileges of the House. The Chair stated to the gentleman from New York that he desired to be referred to the particular word or sentence which, in his opinion, constituted a violation of the privileges of the House. The gentleman then refers to a clause in the Constitution which states that no member shall be questioned for words spoken in debate. To that the Chair replied that that, of course, authorized the gentleman from New York to refuse to answer General Butler. The Chair does not yet see what part of the letter is objectionable. The Chair will state, however, that he can very well understand how a letter can be so worded as to mean something else than that which is apparent on the face of it; but there is nothing in this letter which might not be properly addressed to any member of the House.

Mr. BROOKS. If the Chair will allow me, I will state the point which I regard as a breach of privilege.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts raises the point of order that the gentleman from New York must not debate the entire subject, but must refer to the particular part of the letter to which he objects.

Mr. BROOKS. I refer to the whole letter, but particularly to the closing paragraph of it—the letter being presented by a military gentleman in uniform.

"The gentleman who hands you this will await or call for an answer at any time or place you may suggest." That is the language often used in the duello; and if I had time to look up precedents, I have no doubt that I could find twenty cases where duels resulted from such language as this.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will again read the letter, when the Chair will give his decision. The letter was again read.

The SPEAKER. It appears from the letter just read that the gentleman from New York stigmatized, in a speech which he made on this floor, a certain gentleman as a "gold robber," and that that language having been reported in the public papers a gentleman who supposes himself to be meant, writes the letter just read. It appears to the Chair that there is nothing in the language used in this letter which involves a breach of the privilege of the House. If he ruled that it were then he would be compelled to rule that letters addressed by constituents to members of Congress as to how they had voted or spoken on pending propositions were also infringements upon their rights.

We know that language, differing in some degree but still somewhat of the same character, has been used as a preliminary to further correspondence under what is called the "code of honor," but which the Chair regards as a code of murder. If the Chair thought this language could be brought within the language of what is called the code of honor, the Chair would have decided that the gentleman's question of privilege was well taken. But it appears most natural, and not improper, that when a person has been stigmatized here as a gold robber, he should inquire whether the speech which contained the report had been correctly reported, and whether there had not been some qualifications of such a charge made by the gentleman from New York other than in this report. There is no menace in this inquiry that the Chair can see. The Chair thinks the inquiry a natural one, and not couched in improper language, and therefore rules that it is not a question of privilege.

Mr. BROOKS. I appeal from the decision of the Chair. Is that appeal debatable?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Speaker, I have received a letter, which has been read to this House, from a major general in the Army of the United States. Undoubtedly he had some object in sending this letter to me. If his object had been to know whether I had been reported correctly, he could have found the authorized proceedings of this House in the Congressional Globe, revised by me on that occasion, known to have been revised by me, and which he could have learned by an appeal to the reporters of the speech, who reported me at that time. The means of obtaining information were clear and well known to him, and he has proved that they were well known to him, because in the Daily Globe he read "bold robber," and in the Congressional Globe "gold robber," which was the language I uttered. Major General Butler, of the Army of the United States, has clearly and eminently shown that he has considered both reports, the one in the Daily Globe, and the one in the Congressional Globe. So that he knew by actual investigation and inquiry that the report of my remarks were revised by myself, and that the words used on the occasion, approved and indorsed by me, were "gold robber." He could not, therefore, have written this letter to me with any desire to obtain information, for if that were his whole object that information he had in the authorized and official reported proceedings of this House.

If he had wanted to inform himself on the subject, the proper course was to have addressed me as other gentlemen address me when mistakes occur in the reports, and that is, through the United States mails, through the city post office here, or through some friend of his, a member of this House or otherwise. But on Saturday last, for purposes well known to himself, he sends to me no civilian, no member of Congress, no letter by the city post office or otherwise, but as I was at my breakfast an aid-de-camp, in full military panoply and in the uniform of the United States, and in the military service of General Butler, came into my apartment and demands politely but earnestly, an answer to the letter which he handed to me. The letter is in the ordinary form that duelists resort to preliminary to the arrangement for an apology or a fight. If I had been a duelist I should have well apprehended what he meant, and acted upon that apprehension forthwith. If, in other days, such a letter had been received, written from a southern gentleman to another southern gentleman, or to a northern gentleman, the meaning of that closing paragraph would have been well understood, and if I had been a party then to such a letter I should have consulted a second, and thus have had an immediate correspondence and communication with the aid of Major General Butler, to whom our mutual interest would have been intrusted.

In these latter days, however, when the duel and duelists are supposed to have departed from the Halls of Congress, I know of no such proper way to respond to such a letter as this here, in person. Hence, as a member of this House, I have never upon a question of privilege in a matter pertaining to the freedom of debate which is guaranteed to me by the Constitution to say what I have to say, with no desire to enter into any personal or epistolary correspondence whatever with Major General Butler, whose literary talents I well estimate, and which, if not altogether Chesterfieldian, have nevertheless the vigor and verve of Junius. I chose then, as a member of Congress of the United States, to answer this major general of the Army of the United States upon this spot where I made the remarks of which he is supposed to complain. It is upon that ground I have appealed to the House, and ask here the right to say whether I have been correct or incorrect in the language by which I impugned the course of Major General Butler.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Will the gentleman from New York explain to the House what reason he had for charging that Major General Butler was a gold robber?

Mr. BROOKS. That is what I want to do, but I cannot do it in discussing a question of order. [Cries of "Let us hear it." "Let us have it."]

The SPEAKER. Is there any objection to the gentleman from New York proceeding in the line of remark indicated by the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. STEVENS. I think the gentleman had better confine himself to the point under discussion.

Mr. BROOKS. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is a parliamentarian of thirty years experience, and he knows that within the next thirty hours, even if he objects now, I can say, and in order, too, all I desire the country to know.

Mr. STEVENS. I do not know what the gentleman may do. I can hardly tell; but I know that I require that he shall stick to the text now.

Mr. BROOKS. Am I to understand that I can or cannot answer the question of the gentleman from Illinois, and state the reasons why I pronounced Major General Butler a gold robber?

The SPEAKER. It can be done only by unanimous consent, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania objects.

Several MEMBERS on both sides. Suspend the rules; it can be done on Monday, two thirds assenting.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I move to suspend the rules so as to allow the gentleman from New York to proceed without limitation upon debate.

The motion was agreed to, and the rules were suspended, two thirds of the House voting in the affirmative.

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Speaker, I am much indebted to the House for the courtesy with which they have permitted me to extend the range of my remarks, and I will try to say nothing, while stating facts, which will offend any gentleman upon either side of the House.

First permit me to state as a reason why I did not reply by letter, or otherwise, courteously to General Butler, that I had noticed when in the city of New York, that he was surrounded by a staff of twenty or twenty-five officers in the Hoffman House on Fifth avenue, having ten or fifteen horses in front of that hotel richly caparisoned, and that from that house he sent out aids-de-camp to summon gentlemen before him. And when one gentleman appeared before him he found him sitting at a table with two large pistols, one on his right and one on his left; and therefore I did not choose to reply by letter to the demand of one aid-de-camp, though if a posse of United States soldiers or a platoon had appeared with that aid-de-camp I certainly should have yielded to so large a physical force, and have sent the requested reply. These displays and manifestations in New York indisposed me to any, even epistolary, courtesy to be carried on through a staff officer of the general when transferred to the city of Washington.

The grounds upon which I based my charge upon that occasion of a gold robber, were certain transactions in the city of New Orleans, in which, it appeared by testimony taken before a court in New York, that a rich brother of Major General Butler, who had been largely trading in New Orleans, had bequeathed to him, the major general, a large sum of money. General Butler came to New York to execute the will through the surrogate, when a suit was instigated against him to collect from the proceeds of that will the value of some fifty thousand dollars in gold, which the plaintiff in the case alleged had been robbed from him by the then commanding general. The plaintiff was a northern man, from Ballston, Saratoga county, New York, who had spent many years of his life in amassing a fortune in New Orleans, of which fortune, in part, General Butler had been plundering him.

I found my remark upon a deposition submitted in the court of common pleas by the plaintiff in the case, to which I call the attention of the House, and which I ask the Clerk to read.

The Clerk read the deposition, as follows:

Court of Common Pleas, for the City and County of New York: Samuel Smith and Andrew W. Smith against Benjamin F. Butler.

City and County of New York, ss:

Samuel Smith, one of the plaintiffs above named, being duly sworn, on solemn oath deposes and says:

That some twenty years ago he left the county of Saratoga, in this State, where he was born, and where his aged mother still resides, and went to New Orleans, without any means but youth and hope, to seek for better fortune.

By severe economy, constant toil, and the unremitting industry of long years, he and his brother Andrew together, succeeded in acquiring a considerable property, and they became extensively engaged in the business of private banking; the very nature of their business compelled them to make constant advances of money on southern credits; when the war broke out they were extended, and it was not possible for them to collect in their claims without much delay. The State of Louisiana seceded; deponent opposed the secession, and quietly remained to liquidate his affairs, and save what he could. It is easy for those who were safe in the North to talk bravely about their patriotism, and to boast of what they would have done; but had such been where we were, they might have thought differently.

On the 24th of April, 1862, news came that Admiral Farragut had passed the lower Forks. The greatest consternation prevailed. All who had any money wished to conceal it. The fear was of the wild mob and the soldiery, in case the city should be given up to pillage. Deponent had about sixty thousand dollars in gold coin in his safe, which he had been collecting together, and which he had hoped to save. In this frightful consternation deponent took $54,000 of the gold coin and secreted it in the air cells around his safe and left about $6,000 of his own in the safe, besides a small amount belonging to some of his customers. Admiral Farragut's success left New Orleans at his mercy, and General Butler entered the city on the 1st of May and the rebel soldiery fled, and there was no pillage of the town. Fortwith General Butler issued his proclamation, dated May 1, 1862, and directed every man to return to his business, and promising the fullest protection, and expressed himself in these words: "All the rights of property, of whatever kind, will be held inviolate, subject only to the laws of the United States. All the inhabitants are enjoined to pursue their usual avocations. All shops and places of amusement are to be kept open in the accustomed manner, and services are to be held in the churches and religious houses, as in times of profound peace."

Deponent did not suppose that this solemn proclamation by a general of the United States was intended as a delusion and a snare, and opened his banking house in the fullest confidence that the general would not violate his plighted faith.

The secreted coin could not be reached without tearing down a wall of masonry, and deponent being unwilling to excite notice by tearing down a heavy brick wall and withdrawing the coin, when the city was in such a fearful state, let it remain for a few days to await events.

General Butler soon began to examine into the affairs of banks, bankers, and men supposed to have money, for what public end no one could understand.

On the 10th of May General Butler ordered deponent to open his safe, which he did; but the general finding but $6,000 in coin in the safe, while deponent's books showed $60,000 in hand, demanded the concealed coin, which deponent refused to give up, telling General Butler that it was concealed, and the object of the concealment, but declining to reveal the place where it was secreted.

The general then ordered deponent to prison and threatened to confine him in Fort Jackson until he revealed the place of concealment. Deponent was powerless; without the protection of law and at the mercy of despotic force, after being imprisoned in the manner above described, deponent revealed the place where his gold was secreted. General Butler tore down the masonry and carried off the $54,000 in gold, besides the money in the safe, and after a few days he returned to deponent the $6,000 left in the safe, and $4,000 of the concealed coin, keeping $50,000 in gold, which he has retained from deponent to this hour; the general then let deponent go, despoiled of his hard-earned property, and with his business broken up and destroyed, and now when deponent seeks in a lawful way to obtain redress he is met with these false telegrams from Washington. The statement that "this gold was condemned by a military commission as the proceeds of the robbery of the United States mint at New Orleans" is without a shadow of truth, is utterly malicious, and is in every syllable basely false.

Every dollar of it belonged to the plaintiffs; it was the proceeds of long and patient toil; not a penny ever belonged to the mint or to any confederate State office or department thereof, and the military commission so found, and the one who ordered that false telegram sent knew or ought to have known it. Deponent makes this affidavit with a true copy of that commission and report before him. That commission was composed of three able and upright men—Governor Shepley, Hon. Thomas J. Durant, and Dr. Mercer—and their report was made in June, 1862, and proves the shameless falsity of these slanderous telegrams.

Deponent took the oath of allegiance, the amnesty oath also, and is as true and loyal a man as he who by military force has taken away deponent's property.

Deponent respectfully submits that this false charge about a copperhead attachment, and these false and slanderous charges that deponent's gold "is the proceeds of a robbery of the United States mint" published in the newspapers through telegrams from Washington while General Butler was there, and for the purpose of deceiving the public and of prejudicing their minds before the trial of the cause, (which cause had been legitimately commenced under the order of this court,) deserved the rebuke and severest condemnation of every judge and right-thinking man in this community. SAM. SMITH.

Sworn to this 29th of November, 1864, before me,
FRED. SMYTH, Notary Public, New York.

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Speaker, that deposition will explain to the public and to the House whether I was justified or not in the use of the words which I did use in the course of my controversy with the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. SCOFIELD.] I have only to add that those $50,000 in gold have never been paid into the Treasury of the United States, and yet remain in the hands of Major General Butler.

Mr. LOAN. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BROOKS. Certainly.

Mr. LOAN. I desire to ask the gentleman whether the money has not been returned to the proper Department?

Mr. BROOKS. It has never been returned to the Treasury of the United States. It is not there.

Mr. LOAN. Does the gentleman know if General Butler has not reported it to the War Department as subject to their order, and to be paid over when the War Department may so direct?

Mr. BROOKS. I am not able to answer that question, not having any connection with the War Department.

Mr. LOAN. I understand that that is the case.

Mr. STEVENS. I would like to ask the gentleman from New York what was the result of that suit in the New York court?

Mr. BROOKS. It is yet pending.

Mr. STEVENS. A pretty document, then, to read here! Why, no decent man would have done it.

Mr. BROOKS. The fact is not to be disguised, decent or indecent, that the $50,000 are not where they ought to be, in the Treasury of the United States, but are in the sole control and possession of Major General Butler.

Mr. GOOCH. I ask the gentleman from New York to yield to me for one moment.

Mr. BROOKS. Certainly.

Mr. GOOCH. I will say to the gentleman from New York that if, before making his charges upon this floor, he had taken occasion to investigate the facts; if, before charging General Butler with being "a gold robber," he had inquired at the War Department, he would probably have learned that Major General Butler had reported that he had this money in his possession, the circumstances under which it was taken, and his readiness to obey any order of the War Department or his superiors in relation to it.

Mr. BROOKS. At what time did he make that report?

Mr. GOOCH. I apprehend it was before he was sued.

Mr. BROOKS. How long before?

Mr. GOOCH. I cannot fix the time.

Mr. BROOKS. Does the gentleman know the fact?

Mr. GOOCH. I say I do not know the time.

Mr. BROOKS. I know it was not until the suit was threatened.

Mr. GOOCH. Was it or was it not before the gentleman made his statement upon this floor?

Mr. BROOKS. I know that Major General Butler used the writers for the press in this city to proclaim through the press of New York that the money was in the Treasury of the United States when it was not there.

Mr. GOOCH. I ask again, was it or was it not before you used your position upon this floor to charge General Butler with being "a gold robber?"

Mr. BROOKS. I charged, and I reiterate the charge, that a man who robs a loyal citizen of $50,000 in gold, and keeps that money, deserves the epithet which I applied to him.

Mr. GOOCH. Does the gentleman say of his own knowledge that such was the fact?

Mr. BROOKS. I say it is so stated to me.

Mr. GOOCH. But have you ever investigated it; and did you know when you made the charge here the other day that General Butler had not made that report to the Secretary of War?

Mr. BROOKS. I know that he did not make that report till this suit was threatened and till he was affrighted into making it.

Mr. GOOCH. That is not the question. Had you, before you made the accusation, ascertained whether or not General Butler had reported that he had this money to the War Department?

Mr. ANCONA. I rise to a question of order. The gentleman from Massachusetts is not addressing the Chair.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains that point of order.

Mr. GOOCH. I would like the gentleman from New York to give me an answer to the question I have put. If General Butler, while in command of New Orleans, has wrongfully taken money from anybody, and has not reported the fact to the Government, but has attempted to conceal it, he has committed a wrong. If, on the other hand, the gentleman from New York, rising in his place as a Representative, has charged General Butler, without investigation, with being a gold robber, he has done a wrong. And, sir, it seems to me that he is the last man who should come here and claim that he should not even receive a note of inquiry from the man whom he has charged with being a gold robber, and try to shelter himself behind his privileges as a member of this House. I would like an answer to my question.

Mr. BROOKS. And I would like an answer to this question, has General Butler that gold, or has he not?

Mr. GOOCH. General Butler has that gold, ready to respond for it to the Government or to anybody entitled to receive it. [Derisive laughter from the Democratic side of the House.]

Mr. BROOKS. Well, Mr. Speaker, I will leave you to judge between him and me, and that must end this controversy with the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. Gooch,] whether a major general of the United States who takes by force and violence $50,000 in gold from a northern man, and keeps that gold from him until this day and hour, is or is not a robber of that loyal man of the North.

Mr. GOOCH. Mr. Speaker—
 Mr. BROOKS. I have no more controversy with the gentleman from Massachusetts.
 Mr. GOOCH. I wish to say simply—
 Mr. BROOKS. I will not yield to the gentleman—

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York has the floor, and is entitled to proceed without interruption.

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Speaker, this money was taken from this banker—from Saratoga county, in the State of New York—in the city of New Orleans in May or June, 1862. It is now past the middle of January, 1865, and this $50,000 in gold has been in the possession of Major General Butler throughout all that period of time, without any deposit of it whatever in the Treasury of the United States. I think the country will comprehend now and judge whether or not I was right in the remarks that I made on the floor of this House.

If General Butler or his friends are dissatisfied with those remarks, the proper mode and manner of defending him was to have asked a committee of investigation. His course as an honest and upright man was to have demanded an investigation here, not to have sent me a letter of this sort, whether threatening or not, to engage me to enter into a controversy with him on the subject.

While I am on the floor, Mr. Speaker, permit me to say, in defense of the adjective which I applied to General Butler, that there are other transactions which, in the course and progress of the investigation will, if I am not greatly mistaken, fully justify me in the application of that adjective to him.

An honorable gentleman from Michigan [Mr. DINGES] introduced, the other day, into this House a resolution respecting certain trade permits and cotton transactions in Norfolk, Virginia, and in North Carolina. I know not under what information that honorable gentleman introduced that resolution; but I am sure, if I am not misinformed, that there have been transactions in connection with that, which transactions, I hope, will be investigated by the Committee on Commerce, to which this subject was referred, and of which committee the honorable gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURN] is chairman. When those transactions are fully developed, I feel confident, from his uprightness and the uprightness of that committee; I feel confident, too, from the facts now well known in the War Department; I feel confident, too, from the submission of the facts to Lieutenant General Grant, who is about to institute an investigation into those trade permits and cotton transactions; I feel confident, too, from the uprightness of the Secretary of the Treasury, whom I have known for forty years as an honest man, and who has suspended an agent of the Treasury, Mr. Risley, from issuing any more of these permits, in order to look into them all; I feel confident, too, from the action of the War Department, which, if I am not misinformed, has also called here Brigadier General Shepley to explain these transactions, so far as he may be cognizant of them, when under the conduct and command of Major General Butler in the department of North Carolina; I feel confident, I say, that when the whole subject is brought before the Committee on Commerce and thoroughly ventilated, as I trust it will be, facts will come out which will fully justify me in the remarks which I have made. It will appear that a certain G. N. Lane, who was found guilty of fraud to a large amount in the forage department here in the vicinity of Washington, at Alexandria, and who, after detection, refunded a large sum of money to the United States Treasury, was recommended by Major General Butler to Mr. Risley to receive from this Mr. Risley permits to enter into a trade with the rebels of North Carolina. These permits, embracing only the simple articles of cordage, hoop skirts, and ladies' wearing apparel, &c., were used for the purpose of transporting through the command of Major General Butler to General Lee numerous articles that were contraband of war.

Among the articles furnished were Army shoes, coffee, salt, pork, hats, blankets, &c. They went up the Chowan river, and the Nottoway, to a point near the rebel headquarters, at Marpies depot, within the lines of the rebels; and on one occasion two hundred and fifty-five bales of cotton were brought out by one steamer, which cotton was brought in twenty-three rebel wagons, marked "C. S. A.," confederate States of America, and exchanged for these blankets, this coffee, this salt, &c. These transactions amounted in all, in the months of November and December last, to $700,000. These blankets, this salt, this coffee, went direct to the rebel army of General Lee, and helped to supply the vigor and vitality with which the rebels of that confederate army have assailed and assaulted the brave soldiers of the United States.

It will appear, too, in the course of that investigation, if I am not misinformed, that a brother-in-law of Major General Butler—a Mr. Hildreth, of Massachusetts—received in only one transaction, for his share of profits in these transactions, a check for $7,000, while in other cases other sums were given, the amount of which it is not in my power to name.

Let me state in this connection, for the honor of the Treasury Department, that the collector of Norfolk reported to General Butler these transactions, and remonstrated against them, and that they were well known to numerous people within the command of Major General Butler, and that these people did not dare to make exposition of them for fear of Major General Butler while he was in command of those forces there.

With these remarks, Mr. Speaker, let me add that I make no charge of corruption or forgery against the Departments of this Government, nor against the honorable gentlemen on that side of the House. The Secretary of the Treasury immediately upon suspicion and discovery of these facts did his duty. The Secretary of War, on these facts being made known to him, discharged his duty. I have only stated what is the information that a few gentlemen on the other side of the House are possessed of, but who are not in a position to speak with that freedom which I, as a member of the Opposition, can speak.

I do not, sir, speak for party purposes. I have no party in any controversy like this. I acquit every member on that side of the House of any participation in this affair. I rise here now, as I did in the last session of Congress, when I felt it to be my duty to discharge a disagreeable duty as to an investigation into the Treasury, and in like manner I now assume a painful position to disclose facts which I think I may say I know the other side will investigate fully. I do not feel, however, that I should have been tempted to take this disagreeable position if I had not been invited by this letter of Major General Butler, when I made my remark the other day in reply to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. SCOTFIELD.] General Butler was potent in this country, with full command, high in authority, and, as I believed, in the full confidence of the Administration; and now when he has fallen—as he seems to have fallen—I would not have made these remarks respecting a man in that position if he had not invited me by the letter which he sent through an aid-de-camp as if daring me to answer.

I wish to enter into no epistolary correspondence with him. As, in another sphere of duty, the pen is the instrument I use, there I will fully respond to any letters he may send to me when I return to that sphere of duty. But here upon this floor, claiming the privilege of a member to freely discuss public men and public matters, I appeal to no outside tribunal of letters, but content myself with the forum here. I address the House in the presence of the country, and disclose the facts I have disclosed here to-day to justify the adjective and the epithet I applied the other day, in the hope—I trust no vain hope—that such disclosures will be of service to the country.

ENROLLED BILLS.

Mr. COBB, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled a bill and joint resolutions of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (S. No. 72) supplementary to an act entitled "An act to prescribe an oath of office, and for other purposes," approved July 2, 1862;

A joint resolution (S. No. 99) tendering the thanks of Congress to Rear Admiral David D. Porter, and the officers, petty officers, seamen, and marines under his command, for their gallantry and good conduct in the recent capture of Fort Fisher; and

A joint resolution (S. No. 98) to present the thanks of Congress to Brevet Major General Alfred H. Terry and the officers and men under his command.

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE—AGAIN.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. Speaker, we have heard much to-day about the privileges of this House; and there are some high privileges which have been infringed. Members decent, decorous, and respectable in their behavior have been assailed by ruffians. But there is another privilege injurious and dangerous to the country. It is the privilege which members assume to rise in their places and in a vindictive, in a malignant, in an outrageous and indecent manner, to scatter their filth and slanders upon the great men and patriots of this nation, and then to come into this House and skulk responsibility, shield themselves from answer because they are members upon this floor. That privilege when thus used is an abuse of the privilege, and ought to recoil upon the head of any man who practices it. Here he stands under the shield of this privilege, and without one particle of proof sends forth charges which are to affect the character of those who are fighting for our liberties and who are among the patriots and eminent men of our country. This is not the place, and this is not the privilege to be thus abused.

The gentleman from New York said he did it from revengeful motives; that he was provoked to it by the letter which has been read. I have no doubt it was revengeful. But, sir, I hardly blame the gentleman from Illinois as much as I do those around me—I will not refer to gentlemen—and I am only sorry the names of those who gave that privilege are not upon the record, that the country might see and point at them with scorn. Sir, how can it be possible that a man could be brought to sustain such a motion, with a fair notice of what would follow, unless it were to gratify an appetite which loves the filthiest garbage which is thrown forth from the foulest stomach by malignant hate?

Mr. SCHENCK. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania will give way, I will move that the House adjourn, and he can resume his remarks to-morrow.

Mr. STEVENS. I will do so. It is right that we should have an opportunity to put a few facts before the House.

SERVICE ON COMMITTEE.

Mr. SCHENCK. With the permission of the House, before I move to adjourn, I desire to say that I have understood from the Speaker that he would place me upon the committee to investigate the assault made on the member from Pennsylvania, [Mr. KELLEY,] and that I would be expected to serve. I wish to ask now, before the committee is announced, to be excused from serving thereon. I will not shrink from taking a fair share of any labor of that kind, but I will state to the members of the House, that upon matters which the Committee on Military Affairs are charged to investigate they have sent for witnesses and business has so accumulated before us that we are compelled to meet four mornings in the week, and we probably shall have to meet every morning, and I feel that I cannot possibly give that attention to investigating the assault that I would like to give to any matter of investigation.

The SPEAKER. The Chair not having appointed the committee, he will take the intimation of the gentleman as a desire to be excused from service upon that committee.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. HICKEY, their Chief Clerk, announced to the House that the Senate had passed, with amendments, in which the concurrence of the House was requested, a joint resolution (H. R. No. 99) reserving the mineral lands from the operation of all acts passed at the present session granting lands or extending the time of former grants.

Also, that the Senate had passed an act (S. No. 382) to provide for the better organization of the pay department of the Navy; in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move that the House adjourn.

USE OF THE HALL.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Will the gentleman from Ohio allow me to offer a resolution?

Mr. SCHENCK. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. FARNSWORTH asked unanimous consent to submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Hall of the House of Representatives be hereby tendered to Bishop Simpson on Wednesday evening, the 25th instant, to repeat his lecture on the state of the country.

Mr. COX, Mr. ANCONA, and others, objected.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Then I move to suspend the rules.

The SPEAKER. That motion is not in order pending the appeal from the decision of the Chair taken by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. BROOKS.]

And then, on motion of Mr. SCHENCK, (at four o'clock and thirty five minutes,) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, January 24, 1865.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Dr. BOWMAN.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

COMMITTEE SERVICE.

On motion of Mr. CLARK, and by unanimous consent, the Vice President was authorized to fill the vacancy in the committee on the conduct of the war occasioned by the resignation of Mr. HARDING; and

The Vice President appointed Mr. BUCKALEW.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House insisted on its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 620) to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1865, and agreed to the further conference asked by the Senate upon the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Messrs. R. C. SCHENCK of Ohio, D. W. C. LITTLEJOHN of New York, and S. J. RANDALL of Pennsylvania, managers at the conference on its part.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bill and joint resolutions; and they were thereupon signed by the Vice President:

A resolution (S. R. No. 98) to present the thanks of Congress to Brevet Major General Alfred H. Terry, and the officers and men under his command;

A resolution (S. R. No. 99) tendering the thanks of Congress to Rear Admiral David D. Porter, and to the officers, petty officers, seamen, and marines under his command for their gallantry and good conduct in the recent capture of Fort Fisher;

A bill (S. No. 72) supplementary to an act entitled "An act to prescribe an oath of office, and for other purposes," approved July 2, 1862; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 140) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to give the necessary notice stipulated, pending the intention of the United States to purchase the building known as the Merchants' Exchange, New York city, now used for custom-house purposes.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. COWAN presented the memorial of the Board of Trade of Philadelphia, remonstrating against any alteration of the duty on unsized paper; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented the petition of the local board of steamboat inspectors of Philadelphia, praying for an increase of salary; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. HOWE. I present the memorial of S. D. Carpenter, praying for an appropriation to test a new principle in the construction of gunboats. I move that the memorial be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and as its subject-matter is one of great public interest, and the theory of the memorialist seems to be ingenious and plausible, as far as I can discover, I am requested to move that it be printed.

The memorial was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs; and the motion to print was referred to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. RAMSEY presented the memorial of Joseph Nock, praying a renewal of the patent for an improved lock granted to him July 16, 1839; which was referred to the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office.

Mr. HARLAN presented the petition of settlers in Alameda county, California, remonstrating against the passage of a special act granting the lands on which they have their homes to the claimants of the pretended San José mission grant and to the parties claiming by purchase under them; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. CHANDLER presented the petition of the local board of steamboat inspectors of Detroit, Michigan, praying for an increase of salary; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. MORGAN presented concurrent resolutions of the Legislature of New York, in favor of the passage of the joint resolution submitting to the Legislatures of the several States a proposition to amend the Constitution of the United States by abolishing slavery; which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed, the subject having been acted on by the Senate.

Mr. TEN EYCK. I present the memorial of Walter Rutherford, B. G. Clark, Denning Duer, and others, a committee of citizens of the counties of Hudson and Bergen, in the State of New Jersey, requesting that the act of Congress of February 21, 1863, by which the counties of Hudson and Bergen, in New Jersey, were made a part of the collection district of the port of New York, may be so amended that the assistant collector shall have charge of loading and unloading vessels to and from foreign ports and the warehousing of merchandise, and that he be also empowered to enroll and license vessels in the coasting trade owned in whole or in part in these counties, and to do such other acts and things as will promote the interests of New Jersey and of the United States.

I beg leave very briefly to state in favor of this memorial that the population of these two counties now is over one hundred and fifty thousand, and as they lie upon the western shore of the Hudson river and upon other important rivers, they naturally afford most abundant facilities for shipping and commercial business. There are now a bi-weekly line of steamers to and from Liverpool, and a monthly line of steamers to and from the West Indies, arriving at and departing from Jersey City, and a monthly line of steamers to and from Hamburg, arriving at and departing from Hoboken in Hudson county. There are five different lines of important railways terminating in the county of Hudson, by which a large share of the products of the West, together with the coal and iron and oil of Pennsylvania and West Virginia, are transported to the seaboard. The importations and exportations by foreign vessels loading and discharging on the west shore of the harbor of New York are now very considerable; and these memorialists are satisfied that if the assistant collector was empowered to take charge of the loading and unloading of these vessels and the warehousing of merchandise in that part of the district, the business would be vastly increased, and the charges upon merchandise arriving from abroad and domestic products intended for exportation would be greatly diminished.

I will further state that the object of the memorialists is not to change the limits of the district, but merely to increase the power of the assistant collector who has charge of this part of the district. In presenting it, I beg leave also to call the attention of the Senate to a clause of the ninth section of the first article of the Constitution, which declares that "No preference shall be given by any regulation of commerce or revenue to the ports of one State over those of another; nor shall vessels bound to or from one State be obliged to enter, clear, or pay duties in another." I move that the memorial be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. TEN EYCK. I present another memorial on the same subject, from the mayor and common council of the city of Hudson, New Jersey; and also one from the town council of Bergen, New Jersey; and also one from the mayor and common council of Hoboken city, New Jersey; also one from the mayor and common council of Jersey City, New Jersey; and also a memorial signed by a large number of members of the Legislature of the State of New Jersey; all for the same purpose. I move that they be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. McDUGALL asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 407) to authorize the establishment of ocean mail steamship service between the United States and China; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WILSON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 408) in addition to the several acts for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. MORRILL asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 409) to incorporate the Potomac Navigation and Transportation Company of the District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

Mr. HOWE, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 479) for the relief of John Warren & Son, reported adversely thereon, and moved that it be postponed indefinitely; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. R. No. 48) for the relief of Aaron F. Doll, reported adversely thereon, and moved that it be indefinitely postponed; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 489) for the relief of D. McV. Stuart, reported adversely thereon, and moved that it be postponed indefinitely; which was agreed to.

Mr. ANTHONY, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 387) for the relief of Solomon Parsons, submitted an adverse report.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 111) for the relief of Major John A. Whitall, paymaster in the United States Army, on account of lost or stolen vouchers, submitted an adverse report.

Mr. SHERMAN, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 659) making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department during the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1866, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 621) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the year ending the 30th of June, 1866, reported it with amendments.

Mr. WILSON, from the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, to whom was referred the petition of George W. Allen praying for the adoption of measures for the exchange of all the officers of Colonel Straight's command captured near Rome, Georgia, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

Mr. DIXON, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 386) to incorporate the National Protection Insurance Company of the District of Columbia, reported it without amendment.

LECTURE BY BISHOP SIMPSON.

Mr. WILKINSON submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the use of the Senate Chamber be tendered to Bishop Simpson on to-morrow (Wednesday) evening for the purpose of delivering a lecture therein.

SYSTEM OF CHECKS IN THE TREASURY.

Mr. WILSON submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Finance be directed to examine the system of checks in the office of the Register of the Treasury, and report if any legislation is needed for the safer keeping of the public securities there, and also what losses, if any, of public securities have occurred in that office during the last year, and the circumstances of said losses.

ACTING ASSISTANT TREASURERS.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 689) to provide for acting Assistant Treasurers or depositaries of the United States in certain cases.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It provides that in case of the sickness or unavoidable absence of any Assistant Treasurer or depositary of the United States from his office, he may, at his discretion, authorize the chief clerk, or some other clerk employed therein, to act in his place, and to discharge all the duties required by law of such Assistant Treasurer or depositary, but the official bond given by the principal of the office is to be held to cover and apply to the acts of the person appointed to act in his place in such cases, and such acting officer is to be for the time being subject to all the liabilities and penalties prescribed by law for the official misconduct in like cases of the Assistant Treasurer or depositary respectively for whom he shall act.

The Committee on Finance reported the bill, with an amendment to strike out in line five the words "at his discretion," and to insert "with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury," so that it will read:

That in case of the sickness or unavoidable absence of any Assistant Treasurer or depositary of the United States from his office, he may, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, authorize the chief clerk, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in, and ordered to be engrossed. The bill was ordered to be read a third time; and was read the third time, and passed.

MISSOURI MILITIA CLAIMS.

Mr. HENDERSON. I move to postpone all prior orders and proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. No. 359) to reimburse the State of Missouri for moneys expended for the United States.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It provides that—

Immediately after its passage the President shall appoint a commissioner, whose duty it shall be to ascertain the amount of moneys expended by the State of Missouri in enrolling, equipping, subsisting, and paying such State forces as have been called into service in the State since the 24th of August, 1861, to act in concert with the United States forces in the suppression of rebellion against the United States.

The commissioner so appointed is to proceed at once to examine all the items of expenditure made by the State for these purposes, allowing only for disbursements made and amounts assumed by the State for enrolling, equipping, subsisting, and paying such troops as were called into service by the Governor at the request of the United States department commander commanding the district in which Missouri may at the time have been included, or by the express order, consent, or concurrence of such commander. And no allowance is to be made for any troops which did not perform actual military service in full concert and co-operation with the authorities of the United States, and subject to their orders.

In making up the account for the convenience of the accounting officers of the Government, the commissioner is to state separately the amounts expended respectively for enrolling, equipping, arming, subsisting, and paying the troops, and from the aggregate amount he is to deduct the amount of direct tax due by the State to the United States under the act of 1861, or the act entitled "An act to allow and pay to the State of Missouri the amount of money expended by said State in the arming and paying of troops employed in the suppression of insurrection against the laws of the United States," approved July 17, 1862.

In the adjustment of accounts the commissioner is not to allow for any expenditure or compensation for service at a rate greater than was at the time authorized by the laws of the United States in similar cases. So soon as the commissioner shall have made up the account and ascertained the balance, he is to make a written report showing the different items of expenditure to the Secretary of the Treasury; and if from the report it shall appear that any sum remains due to the State, he is to draw his warrant for the same payable to the Governor of the State, and deliver it to him. The commissioner to be appointed, before proceeding to the discharge of his duties, is to be sworn that he will carefully examine the accounts existing between the United States and the State of Missouri, and that he will, to the best of his ability, make a just, true, and impartial statement thereof. He is to receive such compensation for his services as may be determined by the Secretary of the Treasury. The sum of $4,000,000 is appropriated to carry this bill into effect.

Mr. WILSON. This is a very important bill, and I suggest to the Senator from Missouri to fix a day or two hence for its consideration in order that Senators may have an opportunity to read the report in support of it and examine the subject carefully. I think if the bill is taken up at this time without that examination, it will be prejudiced by it. The Senator had better fix Thursday, or Friday, or some future day for its consideration, and give notice that the bill will then be pressed to a vote. Perhaps it would be better to fix some day early in the next week. I do not think the Senate is prepared to act upon the measure now.

Mr. HENDERSON. While the bill is up I desire to offer an amendment to fill up the blank in the title of an act alluded to in the third section. The title of that act is "An act to provide increased revenue from imports, to pay interest on the public debt, and for other purposes," approved August 5, 1861. In line eight of the third section I move to insert in the blank the words "provide increased revenue from imports, to pay interest on the public debt, and for other purposes," and to insert in the blank in line nine the words "August 5."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. ANTHONY in the chair.) That amendment will be made, if there be no objection.

Mr. HENDERSON. Before any disposition is made of the bill now before the Senate, I wish to state that I have no desire whatever to urge its passage now if Senators have not examined the report made on the subject, and I believe unanimously, by the Committee on Military Affairs. It is Senate report No. 107. I am exceedingly anxious that Senators should examine it, so that they may understand the reasons influencing the Senators from Missouri in urging the passage of this bill.

It provides for the appointment of a commissioner or commissioners to proceed and examine into this matter. The Senate will remember that during the closing days of the last session I undertook to introduce a bill of a similar character, and it was objected to. I stated then to the Senate that I feared the result of doing nothing at that time would be to bring upon our State the horrors of an invasion, which afterward came. I do not suppose Senators much thought at that time that we should have the invasion which we had in Missouri last fall.

I will now simply state that ever since 1861 the department commanders in Missouri sent there by the United States have always been appointed major generals of our State militia by an arrangement that was made between the Governor of the State and the President of the United States, and that those department commanders from year to year have called out the militia of the State, which were carefully organized under an act first of the convention and subsequently of the Legislature of Missouri. They have kept large numbers of that militia in the field, and upon the calling out of the militia they have always required the State of Missouri to pay them. We not only paid the militia out of our State treasury, the State broken down as it was, but up to January 9, 1863, as Senators will see on page 12 of the report that has been made by the Committee on Military Affairs, the militia were subsisted by the State. Afterward, in June, 1863, General Halleck issued an order that issues of clothing, camp, and garrison equipage should be made to those troops while actually employed, but those troops have always been paid from the State treasury.

By examining this report the Senators will see what the State of Missouri in its present condition has been compelled to pay the troops called into the field by the department commanders who have been sent there by orders from Washington. We could not do otherwise. Those troops have performed good service, as is testified to by all the department commanders of Missouri, General

Schofield, General Curtis, General Rosecrans, and others; and in fact, the present commander of that department has a large number of those troops now in the State, and the Legislature of the State has heretofore been compelled, and is now engaged in making arrangements for the payment of those troops. We have been taxed very heavily in Missouri for this purpose. There is a heavy poll tax, and a commutation tax of thirty dollars on every man's head in the State in order to pay these troops. They are acting under the orders of the military commanders sent there by the United States, and in every way have been subject to their orders. I think, therefore, that there should be no hesitation whatever to provide for the adjustment of these accounts.

I desire very much that this bill should be acted upon at as early a day as possible. I do not desire to urge it now if it be the wish of Senators to postpone it in order that they may examine the report on the subject which accompanies the bill. The report states all the facts, and states them fully.

Mr. POMEROY. I hope this matter will be attended to at any rate at a very early day. I know the condition in which the action of our Government has left the State of Missouri. I have seen the effect of it; and I think it is absolutely necessary, in order to save that State in her finances, that we should pass a measure of this kind. I do not know precisely what amount should be appropriated, but a measure of this kind ought to be passed at an early day. I hope if the bill is to be postponed, that it will not be postponed for many days. If the Senators from Missouri desire to have it postponed for a few days, I certainly shall not press any reasons why we should pass the bill now; but if it is to be acted upon to-day I shall give some reasons why I think it ought to be passed.

Mr. BROWN. I do not desire to press this bill at the present time, for evidently Senators have not had an opportunity of examining the merits of it. I desire simply to call the attention of the Senate to the report which was made from the Committee on Military Affairs covering this case, and setting forth the evidences and grounds upon which the bill is predicated. I trust Senators will give the report their attention, for the reason that this bill rests upon special grounds which cannot perhaps be well understood without examining the facts there stated.

It is very important to our State that this matter should be adjusted, and adjusted as speedily as possible, because it is the initial point in all reform of the present distressed financial condition of that State. It is impossible to make any movement to rectify the financial condition of our State there without having this initial measure first passed, for the reason that the Union military bonds with which our troops have been paid are made payable for taxes, and we are now receiving nothing but them in taxes. Until we can have some mode of funding them, and enabling us to get taxes in money, we can do nothing at all. I move that this bill be made the special order for Tuesday next. I would name an earlier day, Monday or Friday, if it were not for the fact that I expect to be absent from the city on both those days, and I would be glad to be present when the bill is taken up. I move that it be made the special order for Tuesday next at one o'clock.

The motion was agreed to, two thirds of the Senate agreeing thereto.

SLAVES TAKEN INTO THE ARMY.

Mr. WADE. I move to postpone all prior orders and take up the joint resolution (S. R. No. 97) advising retaliation for the cruel treatment of prisoners by the insurgents.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SUMNER. I move to strike out all of the resolution after the enacting clause, and insert what I send to the Chair.

Mr. POWELL. With the indulgence of the Senator from Ohio, I desire to ask the Senate to take up a resolution of inquiry which I submitted yesterday. I am sure it will occasion no debate.

Mr. WADE. I am willing to give way if, by so doing, I do not displace the measure which I have called up.

Mr. POWELL. I do not seek to displace that. I move to take up the resolution I offered yesterday calling upon the Secretary of War to state why he has not appointed a commission, in obedience to the twenty-fourth section of the act of February 24, 1864. That section is:

"The Secretary of War shall appoint a commission in each of the slave States represented in Congress, charged to award to each loyal person to whom a colored volunteer may owe service a just compensation, not exceeding $300 for each such colored volunteer, payable out of the fund derived from commutations;" &c.

That commission has not been appointed. I do not know why the Secretary has neglected to discharge that duty. This resolution merely inquired why it has not been done.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. ANTHONY in the chair.) The Chair will entertain the motion of the Senator from Kentucky, if there be no objection.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the following resolution submitted yesterday by Mr. POWELL:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to inform the Senate why he has not appointed "A commission in each of the slave States represented in Congress charged to award to each loyal person to whom a colored volunteer may owe service a just compensation, not exceeding $300 for each colored volunteer;" as he was directed to do by the twenty-fourth section of the act approved February 24, 1864, entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes,' approved March 3, 1863."

Mr. WILSON. I am opposed to the passage of the resolution. There is censure in it, by implication, of the Secretary of War, and I think we have had quite enough of that here. It has got to be quite fashionable to get up here and by resolution or by speech censure the Secretary of War for not making reports or taking action that it is thought devolves upon him. I think that resolutions should not be passed in the Senate which censure or which can be construed as censuring the Secretary of War, pressed as he is and toiling as he is toiling for the country. For one I am opposed to the passage of this resolution or any resolution that has in it anything that looks like a censure of the Secretary of War for his action in this matter. I was surprised and grieved the other day to hear the Secretary censured in the Senate for not making reports, reports that he could not make because he had to send out of his Department to get the facts of the case before he could make them. Every part of the Secretary's office, everybody in it is worked and pressed as perhaps is the case in no other Department of this Government. When we send there for information, it has to be gathered up; officers have to be set upon it; and I think proper time should be given. Now, sir, I know nothing about this case, but I take it that the Secretary of War intends to obey the laws of the country. At any rate I am opposed to passing a resolution that on the very face of it is a condemnation of the Secretary of War for non-action.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of one o'clock having arrived, it becomes the duty of the Chair to call up the special order which was assigned for that hour, which is the bill (H. R. No. 307) to regulate commerce among the several States.

Mr. WADE. The joint resolution which I moved to take up was taken up, and I allowed it to give way to the resolution of the Senator from Kentucky, supposing that that would not lead to debate. I suppose the Senator from Kentucky will not press it under the circumstances.

Mr. POWELL. I will not press it now under the circumstances, and I should not have appealed to the courtesy of the Senator from Ohio to enable me to call it up if I had not supposed that it would not lead to debate. I should like, however, to be allowed to make a single remark in reply to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. WADE. I fear that I shall lose the chance to have my joint resolution considered if I give way.

Mr. FOSTER. You have lost it already.

Mr. WADE. Only by common consent.

Mr. FOSTER. The special order has put it off.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kentucky may proceed by common consent.

Mr. POWELL. I hope the Senate will indulge me in one minute's remark. I do not intend to make a speech.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair hears no objection; the Senator from Kentucky will proceed.

Mr. POWELL. The Senator from Massachusetts objects to the passage of the resolution because, he says, it is a censure of the Secretary of War. I intended no censure of the Secretary of War in the matter, but I am free to say that if I thought he deserved censure, I would be willing to censure him. The law I have just read makes it the duty of the Secretary to appoint a commission to do a certain thing. This law has been on the statute-book now nearly a year. It is a matter of very deep moment to my constituents, and I have been written to almost every week since I have been here by persons who wish to know why he has not complied with the law. The object is not to censure him; but we certainly have a right, after this long lapse of time, to ask the Secretary why he has not complied with the imperative requirements of the law. That is all there is of it.

There are a great many persons in my State deeply interested in having this law carried out. We want this commission appointed. The only means I know of to ascertain why it has not been appointed is for me to offer a resolution, in no language of censure, but simply calling for the information, and I certainly see no reason why the objection taken by the Senator from Massachusetts should prevail. It is obvious that the law says the Secretary of War shall appoint this commission; the law has been upon our statute-book nearly a year, and yet he has not appointed it. I simply inquire of him why he has not done it. That is all. If that is a censure, let it be so; I can only say that it was not my object to censure anybody. It is a matter of deep importance to my constituents and the constituents of other gentlemen from the border States. I will not press it now if there is to be further debate, as the Senator from Ohio yielded to me as a matter of courtesy the right to take up this resolution while another subject was pending of which he has charge.

Mr. CLARK. I suggest, then, to the Senator from Kentucky, as he does not intend to press the resolution now, if it leads to debate, that he let it lie over, for certainly in the minds of some of us it conveys a very severe censure on the Secretary in its present form. The point is that the Secretary shall inform the Senate why he has not done a certain thing, as he was required by law to do.

Mr. POWELL. Yes.

Mr. CLARK. It is not very courteous, in my judgment, in its expression. I think it implies a censure, and a very grave censure. We have no official information that he has not done it. It would be certainly much more courteous to inquire of the Secretary whether it has been done or not, and if not, what were the reasons for not doing it.

Mr. POWELL. I am willing to amend the resolution as the Senator suggests.

Mr. CLARK. I do not propose to amend it at this time, because it will require a re-draft of the resolution, but if the Senator will let it lie we can frame it in some form that will not imply a censure, and then I shall have no objection to it.

Mr. POWELL. I will let it lie for the present.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a joint resolution (H. R. No. 143) to facilitate the adjustment of certain accounts of the American Colonization Society, for the support of certain recaptured Africans in Liberia.

RETALIATION ON REBEL PRISONERS.

Mr. WADE. I now move to postpone the special order, and all other orders, with a view to take up the joint resolution to which I alluded before.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (S. R. No. 97) advising retaliation for the cruel treatment of prisoners by the insurgents.

Mr. SUMNER. I now ask that the amendment which I have sent to the Chair be read.

The Secretary read the proposed amendment, which is to strike out all after the resolving clause of the resolution, and to insert the following:

That retaliation is harsh always, even in the simplest cases, and is permissible only where, in the first place, it may reasonably be expected to affect its object, and where, in the second place, it is consistent with the usages of civilized society; and that, in the absence of these essential conditions, it is a useless barbarism, having no other end than vengeance, which is forbidden alike to nations and to men.

And be it further resolved, That the treatment of our officers and soldiers in rebel prisons is cruel, savage, and heart-rending, beyond all precedent; that it is shocking to morals; that it is an offense against human nature itself; that it adds new guilt to the great crime of the rebellion, and constitutes an example from which history will turn with sorrow and disgust.

And be it further resolved, That any attempted imitation of rebel barbarism in the treatment of prisoners would be plainly impracticable, on account of its inconsistency with the prevailing sentiments of humanity among us; that it would be injurious at home, for it would barbarize the whole community; that it would be utterly useless, for it could not affect the cruel authors of the revolting conduct which we seek to overcome; that it would be immoral, inasmuch as it proceeded from vengeance alone; that it could have no other result than to degrade the national character and the national name, and to bring down upon our country the reprobation of history; and that being thus impracticable, useless, immoral, and degrading, it must be rejected as a measure of retaliation, precisely as the barbarism of roasting or eating prisoners is always rejected by civilized powers.

And be it further resolved, That the United States, filled with grief and sympathy for cherished citizens who, as officers and soldiers, have become the victims of Heaven-defying outrage, hereby declare their solemn determination to put an end to this great iniquity by putting an end to the rebellion of which it is the natural fruit; that to secure this humane and righteous consummation, they pledge anew their best energies and all the resources of the whole people, and they call upon all to bear witness that in this necessary warfare with barbarism they renounce all vengeance and every evil example, and plant themselves firmly on the sacred landmarks of civilization, under the protection of that God who is present with every prisoner and enables heroic souls to suffer for their country.

Mr. SUMNER. The resolutions which I have moved as a substitute explain themselves; perhaps it is hardly necessary that I should add another word; and yet, if the Senate will pardon me, I will call attention briefly to the nature of the original resolution before them, and also I will add one word of illustration from some of those authorities to which we are in the habit of referring on such matters.

The resolution of the committee sets forth what we all too painfully know, that our prisoners—"have been subjected to treatment unexampled for cruelty in the history of civilized war, and finding its parallels only in the conduct of savage tribes; a treatment resulting in the death of multitudes by the slow but designed process of starvation, and by mortal diseases occasioned by insufficient and unhealthy food, by wanton exposure of their persons to the inclemency of the weather, and by deliberate assassination of innocent and unoffending men; and the murder, in cold blood, of prisoners after surrender."

After setting forth in the preamble the treatment to which our soldiers, their prisoners, have been subjected, the resolution proposes that we on our part, by way of retaliation, should imitate this example. It expressly declares that certain officers now in our custody "ought to be subjected to like treatment practiced toward our officers or soldiers in the hands of the insurgents, in respect to quantity and quality of food, clothing, fuel, medicine, medical attendance, personal exposure, or other mode of dealing with them;" and "that with a view to the same ends, the insurgent prisoners in our hands ought to be placed under the control and in the keeping of officers and men who have themselves been prisoners in the hands of the insurgents, and have thus acquired a knowledge of their mode of treating Union prisoners; that explicit instructions ought to be given to the forces having the charge of such insurgent prisoners, requiring them to carry out strictly and promptly the principles of this resolution in every case." Thus, according to the requirements of this resolution, rebel prisoners in our hands are to be subjected to a treatment "finding its parallels"—I adopt the words of the committee—"finding its parallels only in the conduct of savage tribes," and they are to be subjected to a treatment, in the words of the resolution, "resulting in the death of multitudes by the slow but designed process of starvation, and by mortal diseases occasioned by insufficient and unhealthy food;" and still further by "wanton exposure of their persons to the inclemency of the weather." I will not proceed any further with these details, all of which will be found in the preamble to this very resolution.

Now, sir, I believe that the Senate will not undertake in this age of Christian light, under any inducement, under any provocation, to counsel the Executive Government to enter into any such competition with barbarism. Sir, the thing is impossible; it cannot be entertained; we cannot be cruel, or barbarous, or savage because the rebels whom we are now meeting in warfare are cruel, barbarous, and savage. We cannot imitate that detested example. Sir, we find no precedent for it in our own history nor in the history of other nations. We find no precedent, I say, in our own history. This question was one of the earliest that General Washington had to deal with after he took command of the American forces at Cambridge. From his headquarters there, under date of August 11, 1775, he addressed a letter to General Gage, the commander of the British forces in Boston, and I believe that this letter contains the full extent to which a nation can honorably go; and I must say that as I read it I felt new pride in that commander of our forces who thus early in the discharge of his great duties showed such an insight into their proper limits and responsibilities. In addressing General Gage, he said:

"Sir, I understand that the officers engaged in the cause of the liberty of their country, who by the fortune of war have fallen into your hands, have been thrown indiscriminately into a common jail appropriated for felons; that no consideration has been had for those of the most respectable rank when languishing with wounds and sickness; that some of them have been even amputated in this unhealthy situation."

After proceeding to remind General Gage of the cause in which he was engaged, he continued:

"My duty now makes it necessary to apprise you that for the future I shall regulate my conduct toward those gentlemen who are or may be in our possession exactly by the rule you shall observe toward those of ours now in your custody."

"If severity and hardship mark the line of your conduct, (painful as it may be to me,) your prisoners will feel its effects; but if kindness and humanity are shown to ours, I shall with pleasure consider those in our hands only as unfortunate, and they shall receive from me that treatment to which the unfortunate are ever entitled."

Senators about me say "that is sound." I am glad they say so, and if they can find in this correspondence any sanction for the adoption of the savage system which is now inaugurated in rebel prisons, let them point it out. The correspondence has its own limitations in the statement of facts on which it proceeds. What are they? Prisoners had been thrown indiscriminately into a common jail appropriated for felons, and no consideration had been had for those of the most respectable ranks, when languishing with wounds and sickness; and some of them had been even amputated in this unhealthy situation. There is, sir, no such painful suggestion as that they "have been subjected to treatment unexampled for cruelty in the history of civilized war, finding its parallels only in the conduct of savage tribes; treatment resulting in the death of multitudes by the slow but designed process of starvation." No such thing appears in the case; and the judgment of Washington was applied strictly to the facts before him.

But this is not all. Search the history of our country and you will find that the practice seems to be fixed; the rule seems to have received an accuracy of statement from which there can be no escape. I have before me here the words of Chancellor Kent in his commentaries, volume one, page 93, where he touches this question:

"Instances of resolutions to retaliate on innocent prisoners of war occurred in this country during the revolutionary war, as well as during that of 1812; but there was no instance in which retaliation, beyond the measure of secure confinement, took place in respect to prisoners of war."

There you have the authoritative testimony of that great expounder of our history and of our jurisprudence, the late Chancellor Kent. I may add also the testimony of another American writer on this subject, whom I have quoted more than once in this Chamber, General Halleck, who, in his work on International Law, thus expresses himself on page 296:

"Retaliation should be limited to such punishments as may be requisite for our own safety and the good of society; beyond this it cannot be justified. We have no right to mutilate the ambassador of a barbarous Power because his sovereign has treated our ambassador in that manner, nor to put prisoners and hostages to death, and to destroy private property, merely because our enemy has done this to us; for no individual is justly chargeable with the guilt of a personal crime for the acts of the community of which he is a member."

I said, sir, it was without a precedent in the history of other nations. I believe that I am right. I believe that no authentic record can be shown where such savage treatment has been imitated by way of retaliation, by a Christian Power. One of the most learned writers on the law of nations, Vattel, dealing with this very subject, very aptly puts the following question:

"What right have you to cut off the nose and ears of the ambassador of a barbarian who had treated your ambassador in that manner?"—Vattel, book 2, chapter 18, § 339.

That question of this learned publicist strikes at the heart of this whole subject. What right have you to adopt any barbarous conduct because the barbarous enemy with whom you deal has set the example? This same eminent publicist, in another place, says:

"It was a maxim of the Roman Senate that war was to be carried on with arms, and not with poison."

"The Senate, and even Tiberius himself, thought it unlawful to adopt the use of poison, even against a perfidious enemy, and as a kind of retaliation or reprisal."—Vattel, book 3, chapter 8, § 155.

That statement, sir, covers the whole case. Why is it unlawful by way of retaliation to adopt poison? Because it is barbarous; and for the same reason it is unlawful for us to adopt starvation, to adopt all that cruel system of treatment which is so emphatically set forth in the preamble to this resolution. And yet, sir, I know well that by the laws of war retaliation is permissible; but it has its limits, and those limits, as I have ventured to say in the resolutions which I have sent to the chair as a substitute, are at least twofold: first, the retaliation must be useful, it must reasonably promise some practical result; and, in the second place, it must be in harmony with the usages of civilized nations. The retaliation that is proposed, as I have already explained in the resolutions, is useless, for it can have no practical result; and it is not in harmony with the usages of civilized nations.

I have said that the laws of war recognize retaliation. The recent most formal and explicit declaration on the subject from any quarter is in the very elaborate "instructions for the government of the armies of the United States in the field," drawn up since this war began, under the direction of a learned commission, and by the pen of one of the ablest and most learned publicists of our age. I refer to Dr. Lieber, once and for many years professor in the University of South Carolina, and now professor in the University of Columbia, at New York. In these instructions he thus affirms the general law of retaliation:

"The law of war can no more wholly dispense with retaliation than can the law of nations of which it is a branch. Yet civilized nations acknowledge retaliation as the sternest feature of the war. A reckless enemy often leaves to his opponent no other means of securing himself against a repetition of barbarous outrages."

Such is the general principle laid down in these instructions. And now, sir, I shall read to the Senate the commentary of this same learned publicist on these very instructions in a letter which I have received from him this morning. Bear in mind, sir, that the writer of this letter is a student of the laws of war, that he vindicates their exercise, and that in proper cases he vindicates the exercise of retaliation; and now allow me to present his criticism on the retaliation proposed:

"I am unqualifiedly against the retaliation resolutions concerning prisoners of war. The provision that the southerners in our hands shall be watched over by national soldiers who have been in southern pens is unworthy of any great people or high-minded statesman. I am not opposed to retaliation because it strikes those who are not or may not be guilty of the outrage we wish to put an end to. That is the terrible character of almost all retaliation in war. I abhor this revenge on prisoners of war, because we would sink thereby to the level of the enemy's shame and dishonor. All retaliation has some limit. If we fight with Indians who slowly roast their prisoners, we cannot roast in turn the Indians whom we may capture. And what is more, I defy Congress or Government to make the northern people treat captured southerners as our sons are treated by them. God be thanked you could not do it, and if you could, how it would brutalize our own people! I feel the cruelty as keenly as any one; I grieve most bitterly that people whom we and all the world have taken to possess the common attributes of humanity, and who after all are our kin, have sunk so loathsome low; I feel the hardship of seeing no immediate and direct remedy, except conquering and trampling out the vile rebellion; but I maintain that the proposed (yet unfeasible) retaliation is not the remedy. Indeed, calmly to maintain our ground would do us in the end far more good. Revenge is passion, and ought never to enter the sphere of public action. Passion always detracts from power."

"I believe that the ineffable cruelty practiced against our men has been equaled in the history of our race by the Spanish treatment of the Indians and by the Inquisition, but counter cruelty would not mend matters. Those who can allow such crimes would not be moved by cruelties inflicted upon their soldiers in our hands. These cruelties, therefore, would be simply revenge, not retaliation, for retaliation as an element of the law of war, and of nations in general, implies the idea of thereby stopping a certain evil. But no mortal shall indulge in revenge."

"I am indeed against all daily treatment of the prisoners in our hands, but for the love of our country and the great destiny of our people, do not sink, even in single cases, to the level of our unhappily, shameless enemy."

"If you could march out some ten thousand prisoners in our hands and say to the enemy: Either you treat our prisoners better or we execute every one of these ten thousand prisoners in our hands, and if you could make the enemy believe you, I would say this is plain retaliation. But could you do it, would you do it? And as to starve those who have starved our sons, and by the thousand, why every one knows the thing cannot be done, and Heaven be praised it is not."

"The only remedy for this bitter evil, as for all others that beset us now, is, let us send men, and men, and men to our Sherman and Thomases that they may strike, and strike, and strike again. Let us place ourselves right before our own times and before posterity, and let the foul enemy see how he can place himself before the world and in history when lying has ceased. It is his affair."

I have read this letter, and I quote it as authority because it is written by the very pen which wrote that proposition embodying retaliation in the instructions to the armies of the United States.

Mr. WADE. Mr. President, I hope the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts to this resolution will not prevail, because so far from intimidating the enemy or inducing them to believe they must give up their inhuman treatment of our soldiers, it will rather be an invitation to them to continue it. The Senator from Massachusetts has proved, in the course of his argument, what I supposed was well settled international law, that the principle of retaliation is part and parcel of the law of war. It has been practiced by all civilized nations, as often as there has been occasions for it. The first example that the Senator read was that of the father of his country in the revolutionary war. Very early in the struggle, at the very outset of the war, as soon as it came to his ears that the British were mistreating our men who were prisoners in their hands, he gave them to understand that their treatment of our prisoners in their hands would be the measure that he would award to their prisoners in our hands. That he lays down clearly as a principle, and he deduced it from the well settled laws of nations. He did not lay down any limitation of it. He simply went on to sum up what he understood to be their treatment, and said that he should observe the same toward them. Does the Senator believe that if their treatment had been infinitely more inhuman than it was, that fact would have induced Washington to drop the principle altogether? Would it not rather have been a seven-fold reason why he should enforce it with greater vigor? He did not lay it down as a limitation, but as a settled principle of law which he would adhere to, that his treatment of prisoners in his hands should be precisely the same with the treatment by the enemy of the prisoners in their hands.

So the authors to whom he has referred all lay it down that it is no new thing I am contending for. The great writers upon international law all treat it as a well settled doctrine that is to be resorted to when there is a necessity for it, though of course not for the purpose of indulging in vindictive feelings or vengeance. If it was only prompted by such feelings, it would be savage and utterly unworthy of our consideration for a moment; but that is not the feeling which prompts us, nor has it among civilized nations become part and parcel of international law for the purpose of revenge, but simply because it is frequently a necessity of war, because you cannot get justice done to your own side, to your own men, unless you resort to this great principle. It arises out of the feelings of human nature. It is that remedy which suggests itself even to a child. It is part and parcel of human nature, and is consequently incorporated into the law of war by all civilized nations.

The Senator says that it will not be useful, that it will not have the effect which we ascribe to it. If he could show that, I agree with him there would be no reason why I should urge it upon the Senate, or why they should adopt it. If it would not prevent this savage barbarity, if it would not provide a remedy, there would be no reason for my urging it or for the Senate adopting it; but the law itself is founded upon the idea that it will prevent the enemy practicing these barbarities. It has grown up and become part and parcel of the well recognized international law, not because it is mere vengeance, but because it is supposed to grow out of the necessity of the case and because it is supposed that it does interpose a remedy for these inhumanities. It is with that view alone that I urge it.

I know that the letter which the Senator read is not the only declaration on this subject that the father of his country made. If I am not greatly mistaken, he wrote a letter to Lord Howe early in the war, saying, "Your treatment of our prisoners will be my measure of treatment to yours."

Mr. COLLAMER. The exact words were, "Your conduct will govern mine."

Mr. WADE. That is better expressed still: your conduct toward our prisoners will govern mine toward yours. So I ask the American people to say to this confederacy, "Your treatment of our prisoners will be the measure of our treatment to yours." But the Senator says they have become so inhumane, so outrageously and savagely barbarous, that we must drop the great principle and suffer the evil to go on. He says that in very slight cases of inhumanity the principle is proper, but when you come to the most savage, where the necessity is seven-fold more than in other cases, you must quit the principle itself. Is that sound logic or law? You do not find it in any of your books. The Senator's learning, which I admit is great, can find no such limitation of this principle of war. When you investigate this principle, if you stop for a moment to analyze it, you will find that war itself is nothing else than the exercise and practice of the principle that I am now urging upon the Senate, and, of course, the greater the abuse the greater the necessity for putting an end to it by applying the remedy.

I have said that it is nothing more than the principle of war as carried out in practice. I ask why have we engaged in war? Because our enemies commenced an unprovoked assault upon us. Was it not that? I am opposed to all offensive war. I do not believe there is any necessity for any offensive war. But, assuming this war on our part to be defensive, as it is, and that we are entirely in the right, as we are, why have we waged a defensive war? The enemy commences an attack upon us, murders our men, seizes our property, and what are we to do? If we kill him, is it not retaliation? If we go on and destroy his property, in order to limit his power for destruction, is that revenge?

Sir, there is nothing in the principle which I advocate on this occasion more or less than the principle of war itself, which is a principle of force against force limited by nothing except it be the power of one party to injure the other. No man regrets more the necessity of such a measure as this than I do; but I know it is a necessity. Inhumanity, suffering from barbarism, will not be increased by adopting this principle, but will be greatly diminished and probably put an end to by it. The experience of all civilized nations has shown that it is a remedy; and the principle is adopted universally, because long practice has shown that it is a remedy; and for this reason it has become a part of the law of nations.

Have we not practiced it in this very war? I remember many a military order issuing from our officers in the field where men have been murdered by guerrillas declaring what punishment should follow, and we have sometimes taken out two men, that were in our hands, in no way connected with the murder or depredation we complained of, and killed them for the murder of one of our men by guerrillas. For the murder of two we have killed four, and we are to-day practicing upon that principle by which we have almost put an end to guerrilla warfare in some of the States. I wonder that the Senator from Massachusetts does not know that that is our practice. If we can take life in retaliation and to prevent such depredations, can we not resort to remedies short of the taking of life to effect the same thing? It all results in this, if there is any hope that by practicing retaliation we shall succeed in putting an end to these horrors and barbarities the measure is perfectly justifiable, and we are exceedingly wrong if we do not adopt it.

I know that it is called for as a measure of redress from every part of the country. The people are amazed that we suffer these barbarities to be inflicted on our soldiers without any attempt whatever to invoke international law in their behalf. We sit here with our arms folded; and my friend from Massachusetts, pursuing what he thinks is a principle of humanity, would fold his arms still longer and say we are utterly powerless to do anything, while thousands and tens of thousands of our brave soldiers are suffering everything short of death, yea worse than death itself. Now, is it any harder for a rebel soldier or officer to suffer some of these things than it is for our poor brave men who are battling in the cause of their country, to be subjected to them? Is all your pity expended upon these barbarians, and have you none for our own brave soldiers who are suffering in our cause? Do you add anything to human woe and suffering by inflicting retaliation on those who, by raising their hands against their Government, have justly forfeited their lives? These criminals must be treated with the greatest humanity! Hands off! Pamper them so that they may go back again as soldiers to fight against us, while our poor men are suffering death by inches! We are to fold our arms and tell the poor soldier, "We will not raise an arm in your behalf; it would be inhuman;" and thereby we encourage these barbarians to go on in their accursed course with impunity, and without any apprehension that they will meet with the like treatment at our hands.

Mr. COWAN. Mr. President, I am as much in favor of retaliation as anybody, I think, can be. I am in favor of it, because it is the only sanction which is possible in the laws of nations; there is no other way by which we can enforce those laws. I beg leave, however, to differ somewhat from the principle laid down by the Senator from Ohio as to the manner in which that retaliation should be administered. If I understand him correctly, he takes the ground that the retaliation should be in kind; that is, in order to retaliate, we should do precisely the same things to rebel soldiers which the rebels do to ours.

Mr. WADE. I barely laid that down as a rule, and I understand that to be the way it has been practiced and become a part of international law. I suppose, however, any other mode that should be thought better, would be acceptable.

Mr. COWAN. I merely wish to speak to that, because I understand that is the principle involved in the proposition which the Senator advocates; that is, if the confederate States of America starve our soldiers, we are therefore justified, or indeed bound, if we undertake to enforce the laws of nations, to starve their soldiers. I think that is not a correct principle. I think there are thousands of cases in which it would be totally inapplicable.

Mr. WADE. I think the gentleman does not understand me exactly. It is true that this joint resolution contemplates retaliation in kind. If, however, any other mode that he can suggest would be more effectual than the particular one laid down here, very well. It would be perfectly in accordance with international law, I suppose, and might be better adapted to the case than this.

Mr. COWAN. Mr. President, I am opposed, then, to the mode contemplated in this resolution. I know there was a time in the history of the world when an eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth was the lex talionis of the universe; but, as I understand, that law, by a higher authority than ours, has been abrogated; and I suppose that if we were as perfect as He who abrogated that law, we should perhaps find another rule; but we are not, and we are still obliged, in order to enforce the laws of nations, to resort to some mode of retaliation. I am willing that any mode shall be adopted which can be executed by our own people; but I would desire to ask those who advocate this measure whether it is possible that American officers and American soldiers, even those who have suffered all these barbarities at the hands of the rebels, could be induced to starve a rebel soldier?

Mr. WADE. There would be no difficulty about it.

Mr. COWAN. I think there would be a great deal of difficulty. I think it would be impossible to procure in the American Army an officer or a soldier either, who would stand by and see a man starve—a man, sir! particularly when it is admitted that that man, individually, may be as innocent as you or I. Mr. President, for the sake of my country, of my people, of our race, I do not believe that it is possible. I am willing to believe that Senators upon this floor feel as sensibly and as acutely as anybody living the sufferings which our soldiers endure; and yet I am satisfied that there is not a Senator upon this floor who could stand by coolly and deliberately and see a rebel soldier starve without attempting to feed him. It is not the kind of retaliation which we are to exercise upon an enemy. A file of our soldiers may shoot a man to the death in retaliation, but our soldiers are not to turn the executioners of a slow and terrible torture. My object is to save them, not to save the enemy, but to save ourselves and to save the instruments which we would use for the purpose of enforcing this retaliation. I will agree to anything honorable, anything manly, anything effective which will not destroy for ourselves that self-respect which it is due to ourselves and to all other people that we should maintain for ourselves.

Mr. President, I am one of those, unfortunately, perhaps, who differ with a great many Senators on this side of the Chamber, in believing that in the distribution of powers and authorities under this Government this is a question which does not belong to this Senate to consider. I have understood it to be admitted in the course of this debate by the honorable Senator from Ohio, as it must be admitted by all men who know of our Constitution and the peculiar organization of our Government, that if we retaliate at all we retaliate according to a law already in existence, not one which is to be made. What is meant when it is said to us that we are to retaliate according to the law of nations? Is that a law in existence, or is it a law to be enacted? If it is a law in existence, this not being an executive body, but legislative, there must be some other power, and some other authority in this Government to exercise it. As I understand this question, it is a question for the Commander-in-Chief of our armies and his subordinates. It is an authority to be exercised by them according to the exigencies which arise, and to be abandoned by them as the exigencies fail to happen.

Mr. WADE. Do I understand the Senator to lay it down that Congress has no power to prescribe the principles upon which the war should be conducted?

Mr. COWAN. I have repeatedly upon this floor given my opinion distinctly upon that subject. So far as all foreign Powers are concerned, and so far as all belligerent Powers are concerned, at war with this Government, our only point of contact with them is in the Executive. We are a part of the legislature of the country; we are a part of the law-making power. Our powers and authorities are municipal. Our enactments reach those against whom we can enforce them, and those against whom we can enforce them are, of course, those who owe us allegiance and are citizens; but as against belligerents and as against foreign Powers they can have no possible operation whatever. But I answer the question sufficiently when I say that the honorable Senator from Ohio himself has repeatedly said that we do this thing because we have a right to do it, by a law preëxisting, heretofore made, and that is the law of nations. Then, if we have a right to do it by the law of nations, we need no additional law to do it. We make laws; we do not execute laws.

Mr. WADE. If the gentleman will allow me, I find he does not understand my argument. I suppose we may, if we think proper, by an act of Congress change the law of nations so far as respects us, and all nations must abide by it so far as our power extends. We might alter the law of nations if we would. Nor did I invoke the law of nations for this. I only alluded to the law of nations to show that the practice which I advocated was not new nor unknown to the laws of war; that is all.

Mr. COWAN. Mr. President, I agree we might do a great many extraordinary things; we might do a great many foolish things; we might do a great many barbarous things; things which would bring down upon our heads the odium of the civilized world if we were of accord to do it; but what I mean to say is, that the legislative department of this Government have no power to do that thing; and that in order that we should have the power even to do it, to violate the laws of nations, and to put us in this unfortunate and reprehensible position with regard to all other nations, it would require the accord of all three departments of the Government to achieve it. It would be necessary, if we undertook to alter and change the law of nations, that the Legislature should first pass the law, that the Executive should sanction it and agree to execute it, and that the courts were to carry it into effect; but all that would be subversive of the very frame and texture of the Constitution of the country.

Therefore, sir, in my opinion this is a question for the Executive of this Government to decide. It is for him to examine into these facts; it is for him to determine whether the exigency has occurred when he will give this terrible sanction to the laws of nations, whether he will make them vindictive in this case. I cannot believe that the Executive is so derelict to his duty, so false to all that we require of him, so faithless to his obligations to our officers and soldiers that he will allow a barbarous enemy to inflict upon them the punishments complained of without taking the matter into consideration, and careful, and prayerful, anxious consideration, in order that he may apply the proper sanctions to prevent it.

Mr. WADE. What are the proper sanctions to prevent it?

Mr. COWAN. The honorable Senator asks what are the proper sanctions to prevent it. I can only answer to the honorable Senator that if I were President of the United States, (which is the most unlikely thing, I should think, that would ever happen,) or if I were called into the councils of the President of the United States, and the question were put to me, then I should be obliged to answer it. As it is now, it is not part of my senatorial duties to determine that question; and if I were to determine it, in my opinion, it would be a usurpation, it would be tyranny.

Sir, what is tyranny? Tyranny consists in the usurpation of power and authority on the part of men to whom it is not given. However much I might desire to correct an evil, however much I might be satisfied that it existed, however much I might protest to the authority having power to correct it, yet, if it was not within the scope of the powers delegated to me, if I undertook to correct, that would be usurpation. As I understand, the boast of this Government, that which characterized it in its inception, that which hallowed it through the course of three quarters of a century, and which gave it success, was the fact that it was a Government of law, a Government of well-defined, clear-settled, distinctly authorized law, each department acting within its own sphere, and responsible for that action. If we are to usurp the proper functions belonging to the President as the Commander-in-Chief of the Army, if we are to distribute that responsibility among the two or three hundred men who assemble here as the Legislature, where will the responsibility be? If we distribute that responsibility over the forty-five or fifty members of this Senate, where will the responsibility be? If there is any dereliction of duty on the part of those who have the power to execute this law, the law of nations, not the law which we make, but the law which has been made, and which is part of the laws of the land by the Constitution, then I will join the honorable Senator from Ohio and all others heartily in going to the source of proper authority, and insisting there that that duty shall be performed.

Sir, how are we to know the facts of the case? Where are we to get them? I do not know them now. I know them from vague rumor and from uncertain report. I am sorry to say that I believe they are true; and I am willing to say that I resisted for a long while the belief that these barbarities were practiced upon our prisoners. I could not conceive that Americans, that men who had been citizens of the United States of America, who had enjoyed its blessings, who had lived in the light of the age which it adorned, and who had derived from its benign, beneficent Government, the advantages which it conferred, could come down so low in the scale of barbarism that they would ever resort to such a diabolism as the deliberate starvation of our prisoners. I repeat, I resisted this belief as long as it was possible that I could resist it for the credit of my country, my countrymen, and my race; but I am afraid now that it is true; and I am willing in every other capacity than that legislative capacity which is limited by the powers and authorities conferred, to do anything and everything I can to induce the President, and the generals who command his armies, to enforce some principle of retaliation which will put a stop to this thing. I am willing that any measure may be adopted, I am willing to recommend any measure which a soldier and a man can execute, which will be calculated to stop for the future these barbarities; but I am unwilling, and cannot here undertake to usurp an authority which I do not believe we have, with all deference to others who do believe it. I have no reflections to make upon them. I have no doubt they are quite as honest in entertaining the opposite opinion as I am in entertaining mine; but I cannot, with the opinions I have, undertake by a law to say to the President that he must do this or that or the other in the premises, simply because, if the President is unwilling to retaliate, if he thinks it improper to retaliate, having full power now to do so, it is utterly useless for us to attempt to drive him to the performance of that duty which we think he owes to our people and to the country.

Nor, sir, would I desire to do that. I have confidence in the President, and I have confidence in his advisers. I have confidence in the men who lead our armies. I think they deserve our confidence. I think the time has now come when we may stand up as American citizens and be proud of the progress that we have made even in the terrible art of war. I believe that we have a right to be proud to-day that we are in the possession of and own the most terrible armies that now shake the earth with their tread in any hemisphere. I say I have confidence in their leaders. I have confidence in the fact that they know the laws of nations, and that they will not sanction their violation. I believe in their forbearance, in their humanity, and I know they will not retaliate as long as it is possible to avoid that disagreeable contingency; but I have no doubt that when the occasion comes, when it offers itself, and they fear it is upon us, they will be equal to the emergency, and they will, without our action, take such measures as will compel the enemy on the other side to respect those laws of humanity, of progressive civilization, and of Christianity, which will enable us, if we make war at all, to make war as men and gentlemen.

Then, Mr. President, if we pass this joint resolution, the effect of it can only be that we recommend to the President to retaliate in case he believes the time for retaliation has come. I have understood that the President himself has declared publicly that if he was satisfied the time had come, if he was satisfied that a proper and fit occasion for it had come, he would not hesitate for a moment to resort to it. I believe him. I believe that he will do it. But I know how easy it is to exaggerate the reports of these barbarities; I know how easy it is to impregnate the minds of the masses of the people with the idea that our soldiers are not as well treated as they should be; and I know how difficult it is that any man should believe, at the same time, that there were demons, fiends incarnate in human shape who would coolly and deliberately, to prevent the exchanged soldier from going again into the ranks of battle, starve him and incapacitate him. I know the difficulty on both sides of this question; and I would say here that one of the highest evidences of the wisdom of the Constitution is to be found in the fact that a single man was made Commander-in-Chief of the armies of the United States, that to a single head was intrusted that extraordinary power.

I know, sir, that there will be difficulties. There never was a great occasion in the world such as this is that was not surrounded by difficulties equally great. It is a law of things that such should be the case, and it is equally a law that, when the occasion comes and its corresponding difficulties come, we should struggle to endeavor to correct them. But, Mr. President, let us be true to our obligations; let us be true to our trust; let us execute the powers confided to us, and let us exercise them, if we can, so as to make them effectual in all their length and breadth; but as to others intrusted with different power, clothed with other authority, let us hold them to the responsibility of doing their duty, and then we shall have done ours. And, sir, I am pleased to say that even in this I think I see a better result than if we were to usurp that which does not belong to us; that we should usurp the conduct of this war, and declare what is our view of the law of nations, and insist that that view should be taken by the Executive. I say I think I see a better result—

Mr. WADE. I should like to know if the Senator contends that Congress cannot make articles of war, and that we cannot, if we see fit, make an article of war as to how prisoners shall be treated? Does he deny to Congress that power?

Mr. COWAN. I will answer the gentleman quite as distinctly as he puts the question. We have the right to make articles of war for the government of the Army in itself, inter se, but I deny that we have the right to make an article of war which shall declare how prisoners shall be treated. You cannot make an article of war which would require the President to burn prisoners, to scalp prisoners, to violate women. That authority has not been delegated to the legislative department of this Government.

Mr. SUMNER. Nor to starve them.

Mr. COWAN. Nor to starve them, in the emphatic language of the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. WADE. If the Senator will allow me, he cannot dodge the principle as to where the power is lodged by extreme cases. If we have the power, we can use it as savages, if we will, or as Christians if we are Christians; but that is no argument as to the limitation of the power. Have we the power or have we not to make articles of war, and can we not prescribe the principle on which the President shall prosecute this war, or do we sit here with no power at all? Is it a one-man business altogether, and can we dodge every question that properly comes before us by saying the President ought to do it?

Mr. COWAN. Mr. President, I have not been in the habit of "dodging."

Mr. WADE. You have not told us what you prescribe as a remedy.

Mr. COWAN. That is the honorable Senator's opinion. I have answered a plain question by a plain answer, and I question whether there is a Senator on the floor who did not understand me exactly unless it were the honorable Senator from Ohio; but I trust even to make him understand me. I have not "dodged" any part of his question. I have admitted that we had a right to make articles of war; but whom do articles of war govern? Does the honorable Senator say that our articles of war govern the enemy; that they govern foreign Powers; that they govern belligerents? Not at all; nobody pretends that that is the case. Articles of war are made to govern our Army. The articles of war are the municipal regulations which prevail within our Army, which operate upon the Army itself, and which the Army and those who severally enter into the Army agree to abide by. But articles of war are not the laws of nations. The laws of nations govern us in our conduct with regard to belligerents; to foreign peoples; and, as I said before, you cannot make an article of war which will authorize your soldier to violate a woman, to scalp a prisoner, or to tie him to a stake and burn him. There is no such authority in this Government.

Mr. WADE. That is pettifogging.

Mr. COWAN. "Pettifogging!" the contrary is pettifogging, if the honorable Senator pleases, with his side-bar remarks. I am no more pettifogging than he is pettifogging. I am no more capable of pettifogging than he is. I do not know why any Senator should be supposed capable of pettifogging on this floor. I have the same interest at stake that he has: I trust we all have. I do not know upon what meat this Cæsar feeds that we should walk about under his legs and seek for ourselves dishonorable places—not graves, I hope, because I do not think there is any danger of graves. I say all that in reply to the side-remark of the Senator about pettifogging. I hope that will all be abandoned upon this floor. There is no necessity for that kind of thing. It neither intimidates nor does anything else, that I know of, that is very good. It will make people angry; that is, people who are not as good-natured as I am; it never affects me in the slightest; but that is about the whole effect of it.

Now, I say, when the Constitution of the country was adopted, the laws of nations, as they then existed, were adopted along with it, and provision was made in that Constitution that we should have authority, not to make them, but that we should have authority to devise ways and means by which they should be executed. For instance: piracy is an offense by the laws of nations, but there is no punishment imposed upon piracy in this country unless Congress should impose it, and therefore Congress is authorized to impose punishment upon piracy and other crimes against the laws of nations. But, by the Constitution, the laws of war, as they existed at the time it was formed, are binding and obligatory upon this people precisely the same as the municipal laws which we enact here in Congress are binding upon them.

THIRTY-EIGHTH CONGRESS, 2D SESSION.

WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 25, 1865.

NEW SERIES....No. 25.

In further answer to the question, by the laws of nations we are bound to treat our prisoners, and the enemy are bound to treat theirs by the same law, as, according to the custom of nations, the Christian and civilized people in Christendom treat their prisoners, and we have no power and authority in the world to declare that we shall treat them otherwise; I mean no legitimate power and authority. We may usurp the authority to do as the Indians do; but that is another question. Therefore, I say, in answer to the gentleman's question—I hope he will not consider me as "dodging" it this time—that we have no authority under heaven, under the Constitution, under the delegated authority given by the American people to the honorable Senator and myself to stand upon this floor and represent them, by which we have any right to change or alter the laws of nations. They are there, fixed, immutable.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Cannot we define piracy?
Mr. COWAN. No, sir; you cannot define piracy.

Mr. WADE. We have done it.
Mr. COWAN. You cannot define piracy, and I doubt, although I do not speak from the book, whether you have done it.

Mr. COLLAMER. We have said that the slave trade shall be considered as piracy.

Mr. COWAN. Very well, that is a matter of description; but you cannot make that piracy which is not piracy.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. There is a clause in the Constitution that Congress may define and punish piracy.

Mr. TRUMBULL. That does not make it any clearer.

Mr. COWAN. Not a bit. This clause which authorizes Congress "to define and punish piracies and felonies committed on the high seas, and offenses against the law of nations," is the very clause to which I refer when I say that when the Constitution was adopted and when it was made the paramount law of the land, it made the laws of nations also obligatory upon the country and upon all the people.

Mr. FOSTER. That is, to punish our own people.

Mr. DAVIS. The honorable Senator from Pennsylvania is right.

Mr. COWAN. I hope so.

Mr. DAVIS. The Congress of the United States cannot define piracy, or make any act piracy for other nations which is not piracy by the laws of nations. But Congress can define piracy, or make acts piracy for our own people by its laws, which are not piracy by national law; but such laws would be only a part of the municipal law of the United States, and would not become a part of the law of nations. The slave trade was made piracy by law of Congress, when entered into by the citizens of the United States; and most of the civilized nations have also passed laws making it piracy against their own subjects, or citizens, to enter into the slave trade. But Spain and Brazil refused either by their legislation, or by treaties, to make the slave trade piracy; and consequently the act of entering into the slave trade by the subjects of Spain and Brazil is not piracy, and cannot be punished as such by the courts of those, or any other countries. An act which is piracy by the laws of nations may be punished as such by the courts of any country; but piracy defined by the laws of any particular country can only be punished by the courts of that country. The law of nations is made by the consent and usages of all civilized nations; no single nation, nor a majority of them, nor a less number than the whole can change or alter the laws of nations, or make any act piracy which by that law is not piracy.

Mr. COWAN. I understand the force of the objection, but as I cannot possibly answer all objections upon the instant I was obliged to defer this; and I have no doubt that, perhaps, this clause was introduced in order to avoid a principle which pervaded the laws of nations, which has always pervaded it, I believe, until recently, and which pervades it yet, except so far as it has been altered by treaty; and that was in regard to human slavery. Human slavery by the law of nations was not an offense; the slave trade was not an offense; but in order that this Government might be clothed with the authority to declare it an offense this clause was inserted in the Constitution by which we were given the general power to define what piracy was; that is, it was a general power, but it was limited by the general common sense of mankind. We could not declare that piracy which did not amount to piracy, and did not resemble it, but those things which according to the enlightened sense of the Christian world of this day amounted to robbery upon the high seas might be piracy; whether it was the robbery of a merchantmen, or whether it was the robbery of a man in his canoe, in both cases they should be made piracy.

I am aided very much by the suggestion of the learned Senator from Vermont, [Mr. COLLAMER,] whose opinion I should think, not only upon this floor, but with the nation generally, would be conclusive upon this point, that this clause enabled us to define as to our own people, and our own people alone, what piracy should be, but not what it should be as to other people. If we declared that something which we fancied was piracy, and which was not piracy by the laws of nations before that time, should be so regarded as to foreigners, what would it amount to? Nothing at all; no more than any other enactment of ours at the present time adding to or amending the laws of nations would amount to anything.

Then, sir, I think I have disposed of the question as to the authority of the legislative department of this Government to make articles of war, or to prescribe the rules of our conduct toward belligerents; and I trust that I have at least satisfied perhaps some people that we have no authority to intermeddle in the premises here contemplated by this resolution. If it was a resolution recommending to the President retaliation, in case he believed that retaliation was necessary, I should vote for it, although I would much prefer some other channel by which to convey our sense of his duty in that behalf; but I am not prepared to go so far as to make a law obligatory upon him based upon facts of which we are not and cannot be sufficiently cognizant, the facts as to whether the contingency has happened; and I am not prepared either for this. Suppose we pass this resolution, and we are informed a few days after by the President that the course of conduct which we supposed offensive and against the laws of nations on the part of the rebels had been abandoned by them, what are we to do then? Suppose we pass the resolution to-day, and to-morrow the President informs us that our law is entirely unnecessary, because the rebels have abandoned that course of treatment which they heretofore pursued against our soldiers, then I would like to know what I am to do in this contingency. My honorable friend, the Senator from Ohio, is the chairman of the committee on the conduct of the war, and he comes in here in his honest, eager, ardent way, and says, "It is all false; they have not abandoned it at all; we must have another resolution and compel the Executive to retaliate." What am I to believe under those circumstances?

Why, sir, I can only believe the same that I now believe. Whatever might be the evidence before the committee on the conduct of the war, however much it may have impressed the Senator with the necessity of action, I can only believe in charity that the President is not impressed with the force of this evidence, or I cannot conceive why he would not act.

Mr. WADE. If the Senator would only read the resolution, he would be relieved from the necessity of making that part of his argument, because it authorizes the President to abandon this system of retaliation when the rebels shall treat our men differently.

Mr. HOWARD. I will correct him.

Mr. WADE. Very well; put him right all around.

Mr. COWAN. I am exceedingly innocent about walking into any pitfalls, and when it is announced that there is danger in front, I think it is only fair that a man should betold what it is. If there is any trap—

Mr. WADE. There is no trap. I only advise you that it would have been better to read the resolution before making your argument.

Mr. COWAN. If you suggested anything, I should be pleased to know what it was, so that I might not be overwhelmed by the horse, foot, and artillery of the honorable Senator from Michigan, when he comes up. However, I believe I will run the risk, and not insist upon any further interference.

I say then, again, (I have only to repeat it once more,) that as the matter now stands I cannot believe that the President has in his possession the evidence of this barbarous treatment, or of its persistent continuance, which is asserted on the part of the honorable Senator from Ohio, or I think he would have corrected it already by retaliation. I would be glad to know if this evidence is in the possession of this body; if they have it, whether they have communicated it to the President, whether he is cognizant of it, whether the commander-in-chief of our armies under him is cognizant of it, whether the several commanders are cognizant of it, whether they stand by with folded arms and see our men tortured by a slow death in this way without doing something in order to prevent it. As I have said, I have no disposition to quarrel with the Executive in anything which he does do, provided it is consistent with the humanity of the age. I am willing that he shall resort to any mode of retaliation which he deems proper, provided it be such a mode as will not disgrace our own officers and soldiers in the execution of his plan. I will not agree that soldiers shall be burned in retaliation, however I might agree that they might be shot by a file of infantry. I will not agree that they shall be scalped and mutilated, however much I might agree to any kind of confinement to which they might be subjected; and I will not agree, so far as I am concerned, that they shall be tortured to a slow death, in order to achieve this retaliation; and it is particularly the case when I come to reflect who those soldiers are, and I would be understood now to be speaking of the rebel soldier, not the rebel officer.

Who is this soldier, sir? Was he a secessionist? Was he part and parcel of that great scheme and conspiracy by which this Union was to be dissolved, by which this fair fabric was to be rent in twain? Not at all. He was a citizen of the United States, owing allegiance to it, bearing willing allegiance to it, I have no doubt, up to the time of secession. Overborne by the conspiracy, carried away by the flood-tide of events, what was he to do? What was the soldier of Georgia to do? What was the soldier of Tennessee to do? What was the soldier of any of these States to do when this calamity came upon him? Resist his State government? How was he to resist his State government when it had all the reins of power in its hands, and when it had the insignia of government and could compel his obedience? What did the Government of the United States do in that contingency? I speak of the commencement of these troubles, and I appeal to the honorable Senator from Ohio whether I do not speak it rightly. What did the Government of the United States do in the fall and winter of 1860-61 when this citizen of the United States was anxious to do his duty, it may be? And I have no doubt there are thousands of cases in which they were as honest as the Senator and I were. When the cry of usurpation was raised on the part of the secessionists, and when their States were to be carried out of the Union in spite of them, what did the Government of the United States do? Did it come to their rescue? Did it go there to repel that usurpation? Did it go there to drive away the secessionists and restore these men to their rights?

Mr. WADE. No. Buchanan thought that would be retaliation.

Mr. COWAN. Mr. Buchanan thought he could not coerce them. The Government of the United States announced publicly to these men that they could not coerce the rebellion; and I believe the Attorney General of the United States wrote a letter stating that it was not the law that the Executive could coerce them. Then I ask how long was it before the Government of the United States came to the conclusion that it could coerce the secessionists and restore these citizens to their rights in the Union? From about the 1st of December until the 4th of March; and then from the 4th of March until about the middle of April, before the incoming Administration decided that it would go to their rescue. All that time we left them under the administration of the secessionists. We went out of possession. We allowed ourselves to be kicked out of possession. We allowed our property to be taken from us; and we allowed them to carry everything with a high hand. But at the end of that time, about the middle of April, 1861, we came to the conclusion that we would do our duty toward these citizens of the Union, that we would come to their rescue, put down the usurping government, and restore them to their rights in the Union. Have we succeeded in doing it? God be praised, we have succeeded in a great measure; but the work is not yet done; and before we can ask these people to submit, the work must be completely done. We cannot ask a man, when we go there and take possession of his neighborhood, to turn in and be immediately loyal when we may go away ourselves the next week and abandon him to the tender mercies of the rebels. We must establish our dominion and our authority over the country before we can ask the people to bear us true allegiance.

And yet, sir, thousands of the men who are to be starved under the barbarous policy contemplated in this resolution, who are to be tortured to the slow and lingering, and of all the most horrible of deaths, are the men whom we ourselves have abandoned to the tender mercies of the conspirators who originated this rebellion. Sir, I cannot consent to that. Whatever I might be willing to do by way of retaliation to the officer, to the man, who goes into the rebel army voluntarily of his own free will and accord, to the man who carries the insignia of office upon his shoulders and the commission of office in his pocket, I am unwilling to inflict it upon the private soldier, driven by a merciless conscription into the ranks of the rebel armies, and compelled to serve there perhaps against his will and truly against his interests. I repeat, I am unwilling to inflict this retaliation upon him, whatever I might be willing to do to those who are voluntarily in the service of the rebellion.

I hope then, Mr. President, if any measure of this kind is to be passed by this body, it will be couched in such phrase as not to offend against the progressive humanity of civilization, couched in such phrase as will not offend against our own sense of justice, couched in such phrase as that in long years hereafter, when we look upon that glorious flag which we all love so much, we shall not see upon a single fold of it the stain of inhumanity and barbarism even in retaliation as a sanction of the laws of war and of nations.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. President, the strangeness and inapplicability of many of the comments made by the Senator from Pennsylvania upon this joint resolution lead me to the conclusion that he has never read it; has never paid the respect to it of giving it a perusal; otherwise I cannot conceive that he could have made so great a mistake in commenting upon it as to suppose that in its terms it was mandatory upon the President, or assumed to give him any direction whatever in regard to the treatment of prisoners. There is nothing of the kind in the resolution. It is from beginning to end advisory to the President, and not in any degree mandatory. If the Senator had perused the resolution; if, instead of coming here and treating the Senate to a protracted declamation upon what he assumed was contained in the resolution, he had condescended to read it, I fancy he would not have made so great a mistake.

It seems, however, that he committed this oversight for a purpose. He had "method in his madness." He was anxious again to instruct the Senate, as he has done heretofore on numerous occasions, in his favorite doctrine that it pertains to the President of the United States, in the character of Commander-in-Chief of the armies, and to him alone, to exercise all the laws of war, and that Congress is not vested with any authority whatever to direct as to the mode in which a war shall be carried on and conducted, after it has once been declared and commenced. I have had heretofore occasion to say a word on this subject, and I do not wish on this occasion to reiterate the arguments I then advanced. It is sufficient for my purpose to say that I reject entirely this groundless assumption in favor of the President. I deny that he possesses any power except such as is given him by the Constitution, or by an act of Congress, for the purpose of carrying on a war which has once been declared or commenced.

The Constitution declares that Congress shall have power to declare war. I need not say to the learned Senator that this language has ever been construed by the best writers upon the Constitution as meaning that Congress shall have power to wage and carry on war. The power of Congress is by no means limited to the simple process of making a declaration of war, for the Senator knows as well as I that there are many wars which do not commence by declaration at all, and it is by no means necessary by the laws of nations that a war should be commenced by a formal declaration. A lawful war may exist without a declaration. Such wars do often exist, and during the present century, even, have occurred on repeated occasions. Sir, it is for Congress, whenever they may see fit, to declare by proper enactments in what mode a war shall not only be declared but carried on and conducted in all its stages, in all its forms, in all its incidents, whether those incidents relate to the treatment of prisoners of war or to the mode of arming, equipping, and conducting an army in the field or a navy upon the ocean. But, sir, I will not weary the Senate by further reference to the singular ground taken by the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Now, sir, what is this resolution which has been so violently, and I think so unjustly, denounced, both by the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. SUMNER,] I regret to say, and by the Senator from Pennsylvania? The Senator from Pennsylvania, like the Senator from Massachusetts, will have it that its object is to "imitate" the barbarities of the rebels; and odium is attempted to be thrown upon it, because it does, in point of fact, require a retaliation upon the rebels of the same treatment which they extend to our prisoners in their hands by calling it an "imitation." It is conceded, in limine, by both Senators that retaliation is in perfect accordance with the laws of civilized warfare; and the learned professor whose letter was read to us by the honorable Senator from Massachusetts concedes this point also, that retaliation is lawful and allowable. We all know quite well what retaliation means. It is returning like for like; it is treating your enemy as he treats you, for the purpose of restraining him from crime, and inducing him by the use of the like severity to observe the laws of civilized war. If retaliation be lawful and allowable, I insist that the measure now before the Senate is strictly in accordance with the laws of war as expounded even by the Senators themselves, and by the professor whose letter we have heard read.

But, sir, it is unnecessary to argue this question of the right of retaliation. It has ever existed since the commencement of civilized society. It is as old a practice as war itself, and so long ago as you read of hostages in ancient history, so long is it since the principle and practice of retaliation have been observed between nations at war.

But, sir, the question arises more particularly whether the Senate have before them evidence sufficient to justify us in resorting to the principle of retaliation. Judging from some remarks that fell from the Senator from Pennsylvania, I was led to suppose that he was still in doubt upon the question whether the provocations given us by the rebels have been of such a character as to justify the measure. On this subject I beg to lay before the Senate and before the country a few extracts from a document I now hold in my hand. It is a report made by a committee appointed by the United States Sanitary Commission at New York, on the 19th of May, 1864. In order to show the character of this committee, and what were the functions imposed upon them by the society, I read the resolution under which they were appointed. There are names here, sir, that will go down to posterity. The gentlemen engaged in performing the duty prescribed by the resolution I am about to read, are gentlemen, as we all know, of the highest respectability for truth and veracity as well as for professional learning and industry. I rest, and rest with perfect security, upon the veracity of their statements. I can entertain no doubt whatever of the truth of the facts they relate, and of the conclusions at which they arrive. The following is the resolution:

"Resolved, That Dr. Ellersie Wallace, Hon. J. I. Clark Hare, and Rev. Treadwell Walden, of Philadelphia, and Dr. Valentine Mott, Dr. Edward Delafeld, and Gouverneur M. Wilkins, Esq., of New York, be respectfully requested to act as a commission for ascertaining by inquiry and investigation the true physical condition of prisoners recently discharged by exchange from confinement at Richmond and elsewhere within the rebel lines; whether they did, in fact, during such confinement suffer materially for want of food, or from its defective quality, or from other privations or sources of disease; and whether their privations and sufferings were designedly inflicted on them by military or other authority of the rebel government, or were due to causes which such authorities could not control. And that the gentlemen above named be requested to visit such camps of paroled or discharged prisoners as may be accessible to them, and to take in writing the dispositions of so many of such prisoners as may enable them to arrive at accurate results; and to adopt such other means of investigation as they may think proper."

Prefixed to their report is the following note by the committee themselves:

"The commissioners appointed in the foregoing resolution by the standing committee of the United States Sanitary Commission respectfully submit the following narrative and report, drawn from the mass of evidence collected by them, and printed in the Appendix, as the result of their inquiry and investigation."

I do not intend to weary the Senate with any extracts from this report, save such as I deem necessary in order to solve the question propounded in the resolution itself which appointed them. These gentlemen had every facility necessary to enable them to ascertain the facts about which they were to make inquiry, and to arrive at proper conclusions. Speaking of the scenes of distress and privation which existed in the Libby prison in Virginia, in the year 1863, they use the following language:

"It was about the middle of last autumn (1863) that this process of slow starvation became intolerable, injurious, and cruel to the extent referred to. The corn bread began to be of the roughest and coarsest description. Portions of the col and lusk were often found ground in with the meal. The crust was so thick and hard that the prisoners called it iron-clad. To render the bread eatable, they grated it, and made mud of it, but the crust they could not grate."

Again:

"Those who were entirely dependent on the prison fare, and who had no friends at the North to send them boxes of food, began to suffer the horrible agony of craving food and feeling themselves day by day losing strength. Dreams and delusions began to distract their minds."

"Although many were relieved through the generosity of their more favored fellow-prisoners, yet the supply from this source was of course inadequate. Captain Callahan speaks of suffering 'a burning sensation on the inside, with a general failing in strength.' 'I grew so foolish in my mind that I used to blame myself for not eating more when at home.' 'The subject of food engrossed my entire thoughts.' 'Captain Stevens having received a box from home sat down and ate to excess, and died a few hours afterward.' 'A man had a piece of ham which I looked at for hours, and would have stolen if I had had a chance.'"

"But the most unaccountable and shameful act of all was yet to come. Shortly after this general diminution of rations, in the month of January last, the boxes, which before had been regularly delivered, and in good order, were withheld."

That is, the boxes that were sent by the friends of these prisoners from their homes, in order to mitigate their sufferings in that prison.

"No reason was given. Three hundred arrived every week, and were received by Colonel Ould, commissioner of exchange, but instead of being distributed, were retained and piled up in warehouses near by, and in full sight of the tantalized and hungry captives. Three thousand were there when Lieutenant Colonel Farnsworth came away."

"There was some show of delivery, however, but in a manner especially heartless."

I desire gentlemen who have manifested so much mercy and forbearance toward the keepers of our prisoners in the hands of the rebels to listen to a few of these extracts. I wish them to hearken to this evidence; and if it does not drive from their hearts that sentimentalism which would refuse the protection of a just retaliation to our prisoners in the hands of the rebels, then I shall be almost compelled to believe that this sentimentalism, instead of being mercy and generosity, is but another name for cruelty and injustice, unworthy of Congress, and unworthy of the character of the nation we represent. Hearken to it; let the whole world hear it, for, sir, we are about to take a step which, in my judgment, we can fully justify in the face of the civilized world:

"Five or six of the boxes were given during the week. The eager prisoner, expectant, perhaps, of a wife's or mother's thoughtful provision for him, was called to the door and ordered to spread his blanket, when the open cans, whether containing preserved fruits, condensed milk, tobacco, vegetables, or meats, were thrown promiscuously together, and often ruined by the mingling."

"These boxes sometimes contained clothing as well as food, and their contents were frequently appropriated by the prison officials. Lieutenant McGinnis recognized his own home-suit of citizen's clothes on one of them, pointing out his name on the watch-pocket."

"The officers were permitted to send out and buy articles at extravagant prices, and would find the clothes, stationery, hams, and butter which they had purchased bearing the marks of the Sanitary Commission."

The very clothes and provisions, in numerous instances, which were forwarded by the friends of these prisoners at home were stolen, confiscated, and sold by the wretches who were employed to take charge of the Union prisoners—a deliberate act of larceny, depriving these starving men of the small donations sent them by their own families to save their lives. And yet we are told here that it is unjust, ungenerous, and cruel for us to retaliate upon such blackguards for the treatment they have exercised toward our innocent and unoffending prisoners!

Again:

"In one instance this constant thievery became an unexpected advantage to the inmates. After the famous 'tunneling out' by which so many effected their escape, the guard confessed that they had seen the fugitives, but supposed that they were their own men stealing the boxes! The tunnel, after running under the street, had its outlet near where the boxes were piled up."

"All through the winter and late into the spring was this suffering, chiefly from hunger, prolonged. There is evidence of its continuation even so late as the month of May last."

"Surgeon Ferguson, who was confined there at that time, gives a most painful picture of what he saw."

"No one can appreciate, without experience, the condition of the officers in the prison during the twelve days of my stay; their faces were pinched with hunger. I have seen an officer standing by the window gnawing a bone like a dog. I asked him, 'What do you do for?' His reply was 'It will help fill up.'"

"They were constantly complaining of hunger; there was a sad, and insupportable expression of face impossible to describe."

"There is no suffering that can be mentioned greater than that of the slow and lingering pains of famine, except it be, perhaps, the agonies of absolute death from hunger—but of this no Libby evidence was collected. The description of Libby life might therefore end at this point so far as having reached the climax of all possible misery on the one hand, and of all possible barbarity on the other. But the testimony develops still other instances of cruelty, which may as well be introduced here, in order to show the animus of the confederate authorities."

"It is stated that for offenses, whether trivial or serious, the prisoners were consigned to cells, beneath the prison, the walls of which were damp, green, and slimy. These apartments were never warmed, and often so crowded that some were obliged to stand up all night. It was in these dungeons that the hostages were placed."

"But the inhumanity was not confined to the living. It extended even to the disposal of the dead. The bodies were placed in the cellar, to which the animals of the street had access, and very often were partly devoured by hogs, dogs, and rats. The officers had the curiosity to mark the coffins in which they were carried off, to find out whether they were buried in them. But they proved to be only vehicles for bearing them away, returning a score of times for others."

Speaking of the indescribable sufferings of the ten thousand men who were confined as prisoners upon Belle Isle in the James river, this committee use the following language:

"The men resorted to every expedient to keep from perishing. They lay in the ditches as the most protected places, heaped upon one another, and lying close together as one of them expressed it, 'like hogs in winter,' taking turns as to who should have the outside of the row. In the morning the row of the previous night was marked by the motionless forms of those 'who were sleeping on in their last sleep'—frozen to death!"

"Every day during the winter season numbers were conveyed away stiff and stark, having fallen asleep in everlasting cold. Some of the men dug holes in the sand in which to take refuge. All through the night crowds of them were heard running up and down to keep themselves from freezing. And this fate threatened them even more than it would have threatened most men exposed to an equally severe temperature, even with such thin clothing and inadequate shelter, for they were starving!"

"The very sustenance of animal heat was withheld, and one of the most urgent occasions of hunger, a freezing temperature, which makes the bodily necessity stronger and the appetite for food greater, was given full opportunity to make havoc among them. So the last stay and power of resistance was taken away; the cold froze them because they were hungry; the hunger consumed them because they were cold. These two vultures fed upon their vitals, and no one in the southern confederacy had the mercy or the pity to drive them away. Only once was there heard a voice of indignant remonstrance in the rebel congress from a noble-hearted statesman, but it was heard with indifference, and brought about no alleviation."

"The surgeons, themselves, were unanimous in their opinion as to the cause of their condition, not only from the uniform story of the men, but from the characteristics of the different diseases, the revelations of the post mortem examination, and especially and most conclusively of all, the invariable treatment which proved most efficacious, namely, not medication, but simple nutrition and stimulation."

"They all agreed in attributing the condition of the men to one or more of the following causes: deprivation of clothing; insufficient food, in quantity and quality; want of fresh air on account of overcrowding; consequent and unavoidable uncleanness; want of adequate shelter during the fall and winter; and mental depression, the natural result of all."

The committee discuss the question whether the rebel authorities possessed the means necessary to the proper support and supply of our prisoners in their hands, and this is the language they use:

"It has been said, and has been the general impression, that the rebel government was itself embarrassed for want of supplies, that its own soldiers were naked and hungry, and that even the prison guards shared the privations of the prisoners."

"It will be noticed that this excuse, urged strenuously by their friends, and half accepted by every one disposed to be moderate and just, after all only accounts for a small portion of the conduct of the rebels to their captives."

"Why were they robbed of their private property; the money, and the few trinkets a man usually carries with him? Or if this was the uncontrollable habit of a wild soldiery, why was it the regular proceeding of the Libby authorities on the entrance of an officer? Why was stolen done with brutal violence when the person undergoing the process expostulated?"

"By whose connivance were the supplies of food and clothing sent from the North stolen? By whose neglect, or by whose order, were they withheld in immense quantities from men palpably starving and freezing?"

"How is it that—after three years of war, during which everything military had grown colossal and correspondingly complete, with them as with us—flat no extensive barracks, even of the cheapest and flimsiest kind, offering, at least, space to move in, and shelter from the weather, were not erected; but that open encampments, or city warehouses too small for such occupation, continue in use to this day?"

"How is it that, even under such circumstances, supposing them for some reason unable to have done better, they made no provision for the prisoners still further, exposing them to the poison of foul air, generated by unavoidable personal uncleanness, and by the equally unavoidable accumulation of filth under certain conditions of disease, for which either no provision was made, or if made, they were capriciously prevented from using?"

The committee go on to say:

"These grave developments of the testimony, by no means new to many at the North, and occasionally the subject of newspaper reports, (though never in such detail as now related,) have as yet elicited no excuse or explanation, and until an excuse or explanation comes the government by whom such things are authorized, and the people by whose public sentiment such things are encouraged, will stand arraigned for almost immeasurable inhumanity and criminality before the civilized world."

"The conclusion is inevitable. It was in the power of the rebel authorities to feed sufficiently and to clothe whenever necessary their prisoners of war. They were perfectly able to include them in their military establishment; but they chose to exclude them from the position always assigned to such, and in no respect to treat them like men taken in honorable warfare. The commonest soldier was never compelled by hunger to eat the disgusting rations furnished at the Libby to United States officers. Their most exposed encampment, however temporary, never beheld the scenes of suffering which occurred daily and nightly among the United States soldiers in the encampment on Belle Isle."

"The excuse and explanation are swept away. There is nothing now between the northern people and the dreadful reality."

Which was, that these barbarities were deliberately resorted to and practiced by the rebel authorities who had the ability to act differently, and to treat our prisoners well—resorted to for the inhuman purpose of destroying the lives of our men by the slow process of starvation. In this they had a double design. The first was one which is perfectly obvious, to strike terror into the northern population, by the atrocities committed by the rebel authorities, and by the sufferings and agony our prisoners underwent in the hands of their rebel captors; and there is no telling the extent of this evil. History will never be able to answer the question, to what extent did this brutal treatment tend to discourage enlistments at the North, and reduce the Union army. Sir, it has beyond all doubt or cavil obstructed the recruiting of our armies to a very large extent. The story told by men who underwent these agonies at the South was circulated from neighborhood to neighborhood, from town to town, and from city to city. Thousands, I had almost said hundreds of thousands of young men were deterred from entering the military service for the prosecution of this war by the fear of falling into the hands of these barbarians. It has greatly obstructed us in recruiting the Army, and has at the same time deprived us of the services of a great number of men who, if they had been properly treated and returned to us according to the laws of war, would have been towers of strength in the prosecution of the war."

Sir, I have only time to allude to that part of this report of the committee which relates to the cruelties committed upon our prisoners at Andersonville in Georgia. It is sickening to read the authentic accounts that come to us both from officers and soldiers who have been the victims of the barbarities of Andersonville. Only two or three days ago I received by mail the following letter from a constituent of mine, a gallant young man from my own State, who, at the commencement of the rebellion, volunteered to act the part of a patriot and soldier in subduing this insurrection. It bears date more than six months ago, and was brought to our lines by a flag of truce:

CAMP ANDERSON, GEORGIA, July 12, 1864.

DEAR SIR: I am a prisoner here, with about thirty-five thousand others. Do take the most active measures to have us paroled or exchanged. A few months will end two thirds of us.

Very respectfully, CHAS. H. HUNT.

HON. J. M. HOWARD, Washington, D. C.

And, sir, since that young man wrote me that letter, he has succumbed to this same inhuman treatment at the hands of rebels, and young Hunt now fills a hero's and a martyr's grave in the State of Georgia."

Sir, the barbarities committed upon our men at Andersonville are absolutely indescribable. Human language is impotent to bring home to the heart and the soul of a man the horrors of those scenes. Artists have been compelled to resort to something more expressive than human language, and painting and engraving have been called in to aid in conveying to the mind the full idea of the brutalities practiced by the rebel authorities upon our soldiers. Out of those thirty-five thousand, I presume not more than one half, if as many, still survive to tell the tale of their sufferings; and the testimony is as clear as the noonday sun that these barbarities were deliberately practiced upon our men for the double purpose of crippling and reducing our armed force and of striking terror into the northern population in order to prevent enlistments. There does not remain ground for a doubt that the rebel government designedly resorted to the slow process of torture and death by starvation, and to freezing and starving united, operating minute by minute, hour by hour, day by day, week by week, and month by month, until the man became a living skeleton and an idiot, no longer able to recognize his wife, his children, or his friends; no longer of any value either to himself or his country; and this for the purpose of weakening our military arm and deterring our people from prosecuting the war."

Sir, I ask any man of humanity, any man who feels a respect for his country, Does it not become us to punish these barbarities, and to punish them in the only way that is left us? which is, the original and actual offenders having made their escape or not being in our power, to seize upon their countrymen, prisoners in our hands, and subject them to the same severities practiced against us. I know, sir, that the heart of a generous man naturally revolts at the practice of retaliation. I am not a stranger, I trust, to the ordinary feelings of humanity; but when the voice of my own countrymen cries to me from the dungeons of Libby, and from the putrid pools of Andersonville and implores me to interpose whatever power I may possess to deter the rebels from the infliction of such cruelties on them, I cannot, and, so help me God, I will not shut my ears to their cries. I think it to be our duty, our duty as a Christian nation, as a Government claiming the respect of the world, to punish these barbarities and to make it necessary for the rebels, if they intend further to protract this war, to submit to the code governing civilized nations.

Now, sir, the resolution does not, as has been incorrectly stated by the Senator from Pennsylvania, whose sensibilities were so exercised on this subject, assume to punish the rebel common soldier who has fallen into our hands as a prisoner. It treats him as a soldier and a prisoner of war ought to be treated. No inhumanity, no retaliation whatever in any form or degree, is to be exercised toward him, but only toward the rebel officer who has fallen into our hands as a prisoner.

Sir, let us touch the rebel authorities in their most vital part. Let us make it necessary for the officers of their army, from the highest to the lowest, to set a better example of humanity than they have hitherto done. My opinion is that if we shall pass this resolution it will have the effect at once to deter the evils of which we complain. I cannot entertain a doubt that when the rebels see that their officers in our hands are to be subjected to ignominious treatment, ay, sir, to the same treatment which our men and officers experience at their hands in Libby prison, on Belle Isle, and at Andersonville, death by slow starvation, horrible as it is to contemplate, they will quit their foul practices, and the honorable Senator from Pennsylvania will not any longer have occasion to exclaim in holy horror that the honor of the United States is tarnished.

Sir, the history of the world, certainly the history of the civilized world, presents no parallel to the brutalities committed by the rebels. Read the story of Dartmoor prison, you find nothing to be compared with them. Read the story of the Black Hole of Calcutta, you find nothing there. Read the story of the ancient British hulks, in which twenty thousand French prisoners were kept in close confinement for three or four years off the coast of England, in spaces not more than four and a half feet high between decks, and you will find nothing there to be compared with these cruelties. In the whole history of modern civilized war, these crimes stand out in hideous prominence. There is nothing that we can find short of the history of Indian barbarities to which they can be likened. And as I said before, Mr. President, I look upon it as the duty of the Government of the United States to punish such gross infractions of the laws of civilized warfare, and to protect our prisoners in the hands of the enemy by holding out the salutary terror of an earnest and prompt retaliation.

The Senator from Pennsylvania, among the other evils which in his fertile imagination he seemed to discover, took it for granted that this retaliatory law, as he called it, was to be enforced even after the rebel authorities should have abandoned their vile practices. It shows that the Senator had never read the resolution at all. The language of the resolution on that subject is perfectly clear. It says that "explicit instructions ought to be given to the forces having the charge of such insurgent prisoners, requiring them to carry out strictly and promptly the principles of this resolution in every case, until the President, having received satisfactory information of the abandonment by the insurgents of such barbarous practices, shall revoke or modify said instructions."

Then, again, there is another clause which will answer the other objection which the Senator makes, that the object of this resolution is to restrict the authority of the President of the United States. The last clause of the resolution removes that objection, if it be an objection:

Congress do not, however, intend by this resolution to limit or restrict the power of the President to the modes or principles of retaliation herein mentioned, but only to advise a resort to them as demanded by the occasion.

Leaving the whole field of retaliation in all its imaginable forms open and free to the Executive of the United States, should he see fit to resort to it, and without binding or restricting him to the particular mode or principles of retaliation set forth in this resolution.

I hope, sir, the resolution will pass without amendment.

Mr. WILSON. I propose to amend the amendment. I move to strike out the entire amendment offered by my colleague as a substitute for the resolution, and to insert in lieu of it:

Whereas it has come to the knowledge of Congress that great numbers of our soldiers who have fallen as prisoners of war into the hands of the insurgents have been subjected to treatment unexampled for cruelty in the history of civilized war, which has resulted in the death of multitudes by the slow process of starvation, and by mortal diseases occasioned by insufficient and unhealthy food, and by wanton exposure of their persons to the inclemency of the weather: Therefore,

Resolved, &c., That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized and required, as soon as may be after the passage of this resolution, to appoint two commissioners to confer with the confederate authorities, with a view of devising some practicable plan for the relief and better treatment of our prisoners of war.

I suppose we all agree that our prisoners have been most inhumanly treated by the rebel authorities, and I suppose we all agree that some action ought to be taken by our Government for their relief. It is proposed in the original resolution to retaliate upon prisoners in our hands, with a view to bring the rebel authorities to their senses. It is proposed in the amendment of my colleague that we shall not retaliate at all; that it is inhuman, unchristian, and barbarous to retaliate. Now, sir, it seems to me that the best thing we can do is to authorize and require the President immediately to appoint commissioners who shall confer with the rebel authorities, and devise some plan, some system, for the relief of our prisoners, and for their better treatment in the future. I have not the shadow of a doubt that we can do it. If two fit and proper persons be sent to Richmond I have no doubt that we can so arrange this matter as to bring practical relief, and I think we had better try that mode than to adopt either of the plans proposed.

I certainly feel the force of the argument as to the inhumanity and barbarism of retaliation. I could not shut a dog up and starve that dog, although I might knock the dog's brains out very easily. I am sure of one thing, that while the nation is calling for retaliation, and while everybody asks for action, if the process was adopted of treating rebel prisoners in our hands as they treat our prisoners in their hands, the humanity of the nation would cry out against it. When we come to practical action we shall find that our people are too good to treat rebel prisoners in our hands as they have treated our soldiers. General Butler proposed, some months since, what I think is the only plan that would have been effective, that I have seen announced in this war; and that was to take officers of the rebel army down on the coast, say to Hatteras, and there put up every day the same bill of fare for these officers that was served at Libby prison.

Mr. GRIMES. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. WILSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. GRIMES. I understand that the Secretary of War has, in response to a resolution of the House of Representatives, informed that body that negotiations are going on, and that he anticipates that in a very short time exchanges will be made. I want to know from the Senator if that is so.

Mr. WILSON. I do not know.

Mr. GRIMES. I am not inquiring of the Senator as to whether the Secretary of War has so informed the House of Representatives; but is that the information that he has from the War Department?

Mr. FARWELL. It is so reported in the Globe.

Mr. WILSON. I read this morning a statement made by the Secretary of War in response to a resolution, I think, of the House of Representatives, stating that exchanges were now going on very well, and I have no doubt they will go on very well hereafter; but I suppose it will never be the case that we shall not have quite a number of prisoners in rebel hands and have some of theirs in our hands.

Mr. GRIMES. I desire to inquire what is the necessity for any legislation on the subject if exchanges are going on regularly, and if, as I understand, the Secretary of War intimates to be his opinion, there will be no future difficulty on that subject—

Mr. COLLAMER. And the balance is in our favor.

Mr. GRIMES. A large balance, forty thousand, I believe, in our favor. In this state of the case I cannot see the necessity for any legislation on the subject.

Mr. SUMNER. I should like to ask my colleague one other question of fact: whether, in point of fact, commissioners were not sent, not very recently, but since the war began, into the rebel States in order to examine into the condition of our prisoners there; and whether they were not refused? I remember very well that a very distinguished citizen of New York, a predecessor in this body of my friend by my side, [Mr. Morgan,] Governor Fish, and a bishop, and one or two other colleagues associated with him, actually went as far as Norfolk, and permission was refused to them to visit our soldiers who were their prisoners. They were sent by the Secretary of War or the President. I remember very well reading in manuscript the instructions under which they went, and that they got to a certain point, and then they were sent back. That being the case, I ask the question whether it is advisable for Congress in a formal way to direct that commissioners shall be sent again.

Mr. HENDERSON. I should like to ask the Senator from Massachusetts at what time those commissioners were appointed by the President, and whether they were authorized in reality by the President to proceed there for that purpose.

Mr. SUMNER. I understand that they were authorized to proceed there, and I named one of the commissioners, a distinguished citizen of New York, Governor Fish.

Mr. HENDERSON. At what time was that?

Mr. SUMNER. Some two years ago.

Mr. FOSTER. More than that. They were not to negotiate about treatment, but to go through the southern country and visit the prisons.

Mr. SUMNER. They were to visit all our prisoners and all the prisons.

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Mr. SUMNER. And make report thereupon.

Mr. FOSTER. But not to negotiate as to the treatment of prisoners.

Mr. WILSON. I cannot see that the refusal of the rebel authorities to allow persons appointed by the Government to visit our prisoners is any reason why we should not now, after the treatment our prisoners have received at the hands of the rebels, send commissioners to devise, in conjunction with the rebel authorities, some practicable plan by which our prisoners can be relieved who are in their hands, and those who may fall into their hands hereafter be better treated in the future. I believe such a plan can be devised. It may cost us some money to do it, but for one I care nothing about the money spent to take care of our prisoners in the hands of the rebels. I would rather adopt some action here looking to a system agreed upon between our Government and the confederate authorities for the relief and good treatment of our prisoners, than to pass resolutions in favor of retaliation, or, above all, pass resolutions against retaliation. I must confess that while I am not ready to vote for the first, I should feel that it was entirely out of place to vote for the latter after the treatment our soldiers have received.

I hope, then, we shall adopt a practical plan such as I have suggested; and I will say here that some men in the country who have had experience, believe that such a plan can be devised, and that it ought to have been tried months and months ago. I know, sir, that some of the best minds of the country have been for a year and a half in favor of trying a plan of this sort, and I think we had better try it. I have undoubting faith that if two proper men are sent to Richmond to represent to the rebel authorities the wrongs that they have committed against our soldiers, men of practical sagacity, some plan will be devised for the relief of our soldiers. At any rate, I think it is right to try it.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Mr. President, as I listened to the speech of the Senator from Michigan [Mr. Howard] I was struck with the fact how much easier it is to float with the passion of the hour than to stand firmly where a man thinks it is right. I know that this is a subject of extreme interest in the country. Every neighborhood has its representative in the southern prisons, and whatever is said in the Senate is listened to in every neighborhood with extreme interest. But, sir, whatever may be the passion of this hour, I feel that the right will justify a man in the future. During the times of the French Revolution the orators in the Convention who were inspired by the frenzy of passion, and called for blood, blood, blood, were the gods of the hour, and were borne upon the shouts of the mob in the streets, and the applauses in the club-houses, but history has assigned them their right place; and I am not afraid even upon this question to say what I believe is right. I do not believe that my honor as a man, or the honor of my country, is to be promoted by adopting a measure which has been so forcibly described by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SUMNER] this morning as barbarous and cruel.

The Senator from Ohio [Mr. WADE] yesterday, in reply to a remark of mine, said that war was against Christianity, and that the usages of nations engaged in war had not been influenced by the sentiments of our religion. I do not agree with him. Does the Senator say that the usages of this day, and the benign influences of Christianity among nations at war, are such as prevailed in the more barbarous and the darker ages of the world's history? Why is it that no longer any civilized nation dare to strike its foe with a poisoned arrow? Why is it that an invading army dare no longer to poison the springs and the wells in an enemy's country? Because the influences of Christianity and the civilization of the century forbid it. Mark where Christianity extends upon the earth's surface, and see the difference. Where ever Christianity now controls the judgment of the world, we have a civilization to some extent even amid the horrors of war; but go beyond that; go into China, where our Christian religion is not regarded, they flay the captive alive to-day; go into Tartary, and into all the nations where any system of religion except our own controls the judgment of the country, and you find yet barbarities that marked wars in the earlier ages of the world's history.

But, sir, I am not going to discuss the question whether war is right or wrong, or whether it is according to Christianity. We have a war, and as civilized men it is our duty to mitigate the cruelties and sufferings attendant upon war to the greatest extent in our power, not to add to them, not to bring our fair fame and good name as a civilized and Christian people down, but rather to hold it up.

I have advocated an exchange of prisoners, and I am glad to hear the chairman of the Military Committee urge that as a possible and practicable mode of relieving the country of its present anxiety in respect to our prisoners. The Senator from Ohio concurred in the views that I expressed at that point, in very strong language. He said that if the War Department could have exchanged our prisoners, it was the duty of that Department to have done so; and if they had neglected to do so, they ought to be severely censured. Perhaps these are not the words used by the Senator, but this is the sentiment.

Mr. JOHNSON. "Culpable" was the word.

Mr. HENDRICKS. "Culpable," I believe, was the term he used, a stronger word than I employed. He said that the Administration was culpable if it was in its power for these months past to have brought our brothers and friends home again and it refused to do so. But the Senator from Iowa [Mr. HARLAN]—and even with the high respect I entertain for that Senator, I am glad that no other Senator has adopted his sentiments on this subject—has said to the Senate, in the course of this debate, that it was right for the Administration thus for months to have refused to exchange prisoners when it might have been done. Why so? For the reason that we can better afford to leave men in prison than they; that we have more men; that we may bring additional hundreds of thousands into the field and not feel the burden very much, because our population is so large, while the South is exhausted in its fighting force. That is the argument of the Senator.

Mr. HARLAN. Is the Senator professing to quote from my remarks?

Mr. HENDRICKS. No, sir; I am not. I am attempting to give the argument of the Senator. If he prefers that I should read his words, of course I can do so. His argument went further. He said that we were now fighting the enemy within works; and that one man to the enemy was worth three or four to us. I think I give the argument of the Senator correctly. The whole of it amounts to just this: that we can afford, in a military point of view, to leave our soldiers suffering in southern prisons, dying under the influence of a southern climate, and under southern diseases, as well as (if I may admit the fact) by starvation; that we can afford to do this, and make in a military point of view, and therefore we will do it.

Again, the Senator said that the term of service of the greater portion of these prisoners of ours in southern prisons has now expired, and that if we bring them home again, we simply lose that number of men, and send to the South men who are yet bound to do military service to the southern government, and therefore they would make in the swap. These considerations I could understand in the exchange of property between man and man, but when the appeal comes to us in the name of humanity on behalf of our suffering friends in the South, I cannot appreciate the sentiment of the Senator from Iowa. We are not bound to exchange prisoners. We are not bound by the laws and usages of war to parole prisoners. It is not a question between us and the belligerents opposed to us whether we shall exchange prisoners. The South as a belligerent cannot demand it of us as a right. The question is between the Government of the United States and its soldiers; and now what is the law upon that subject? I quote from Halleck's International Law:

"But while no State is obliged, by the positive rules of international law, to enter into a cartel for the exchange of prisoners of war, there is a strong moral duty imposed upon the Government of every State to provide for the release of such of its citizens and allies as have fallen into the hands of the enemy. They have fallen into this misfortune only by acting in its service and in the support of its cause. This," says Vattel, "is a care which the State owes to those who have exposed themselves in her defense."—Halleck's International Law, page 432.

The question is between us and the men who have fought for the Government and who have fallen into this misfortune because they were engaged in the public service; and the Senator from Iowa says we shall not consider this obligation which we owe to the soldier who has fallen into this misfortune, because we can make a military profit by leaving him to die in a southern prison. I am glad that sentiment has found no response from any other Senator in this body.

But I wish to carry this thought a little further. The Senator from Iowa says that the term has expired. Is that an argument why we shall leave them in southern prisons? It is the conclusion of the Senator; but to my understanding it is an argument why we should bring them home. Their term has expired, the Senator says. Then what is their right? It is not a question any longer of moral obligation; but what is their right in law? Under the law, they said they would serve for two or three years, and that term has expired. If they were in the ranks, they would be discharged to-day. They are in southern prisons, the misfortune of war. What is their right? Their right is to say to us "Our term has expired and we demand to be brought home." I say, then, the argument is strengthened. If these friends of ours in southern prisons no longer owe military duty to the Government, and the Administration has it in its power to bring them home, these soldiers have the right to be brought home, and in their name I demand that these exchanges be made.

Mr. President, I wish to call a little more fully the attention of the Senate to the proposition before the body. It was done so fully and with such great power by the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. SUMNER], that I find it necessary to add but a very few words to what he has said. What is here proposed? The resolution declares that in the opinion of Congress "such retaliation ought to be inflicted upon the insurgent officers now in our hands, or hereafter to fall into our hands, as prisoners; that such officers ought to be subjected to like treatment practiced toward our officers or soldiers in the hands of the insurgents, in respect to quantity and quality of food, clothing, fuel, medicine, medical attendance, personal exposure, or other mode of dealing with them."

It is a very general resolution. My colleague

I think is under the impression that it does not include the soldiers as well as the officers whom we hold as prisoners. I wish to call his attention, then, to the residue of the resolution:

That with a view to the same ends, the insurgents, prisoners in our hands, ought to be placed under the control and in the keeping of officers and men who have themselves been prisoners in the hands of the insurgents, and have thus acquired a knowledge of their mode of treating Union prisoners; that explicit instructions ought to be given to the forces having the charge of such insurgent prisoners, requiring them to carry out strictly and promptly the principles of this resolution in every case.

I am sorry that the committee reporting this resolution has dignified a policy such as this with the term "principle"—a principle to starve men to death! But I wish my colleague to observe the language of the resolution. It applies not alone to officers who may have been in fault in some time past, but it applies to the conscript of the South, who has fallen under a misfortune even heavier than our own soldiers; the conscript who against his will has been compelled to go into the southern army, and has been taken prisoner and brought up here; constrained to serve against his will, against his wish, against the sentiments of his heart toward this Government; and now we propose to starve him to death!

That we shall treat them as they have treated our prisoners is claimed to be the right. How does the Senator from Michigan in the preamble say our soldiers have been treated by the southern officers and army? Let us see. We are to do to them as they have done to us, for that is the language of the resolution; "or other mode of dealing with them," is the general phrase. I will read the whole preamble:

Whereas it has come to the knowledge of Congress that great numbers of our soldiers, who have fallen as prisoners of war into the hands of the insurgents, have been subjected to treatment unexampled for cruelty in the history of civilized war, and finding its parallels only in the conduct of savage tribes—

Now, I ask the attention of Senators to the following—a treatment resulting in the death of multitudes by the slow but designed process of starvation, and by moral diseases occasioned by insufficient and unhealthy food, by wanton exposure of their persons to the inclemency of the weather, and by deliberate assassination of innocent and unoffending men, and the murder in cold blood of prisoners after surrender.

This is the charge which the Senator from Michigan, in the preamble, brings against the southern officers and soldiers in their conduct toward our soldiers and officers. He says, then, in the resolution, that we must do likewise. Do what? Assassinate a captive after he has surrendered? After he has laid down his arms at your feet, assassinate him in cold blood? That is one of the charges brought in the preamble; and we must do likewise, must we? Deliberate assassination! Not only that, but we must expose them to the inclemency of the weather! Not only that, but we must give them unhealthy food, that disease may come upon them and they may die of horrible disease! Not only that, but we shall deny to them food, that they may die by starvation!

Is it possible that, according to the usages of civilized nations in this century, we may retaliate in kind when these charges are brought against the insurgents, that we in like manner shall treat their prisoners in our hands? I deny the right. I am not sure but that the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. SUMNER], in his exhaustive argument on this subject, quoted the authority to which I am now going to refer. When he was reading from Halleck my attention was called away, and it is very likely that he read the very section to which I now wish to call the attention of the Senate:

"There is, however, a limit to this rule of reciprocity. If the enemy refuses to shape his conduct by the milder usages of war, and adopts the extreme and rigorous principles of former ages, we may do the same; but if he exceed these extreme rights, and becomes barbarous and cruel in his conduct, we cannot, as a general thing, follow and retort upon his subjects, by treating them in like manner. We cannot go beyond the limits prescribed by international law to the rights of belligerents. Thus, the conduct of Great Britain toward Denmark in 1807, in condemning Danish vessels as droits of admiralty, thereby exercising an extreme right of war, justified Denmark in resorting to the corresponding extreme right of sequestering British debts due from Danish subjects. So, also, the sequestering of English debts by France, in 1793, justified England in retaliating by a countervailing measure. Again, the seizure and condemnation of French vessels by Great Britain, in 1803, was an exercise of an ancient and severe rule of war, for which Napoleon retaliated by the exercise of another and still more extreme right, also contrary to the milder rules of modern usage, by seizing all English travelers in French territory."

I ask the attention of Senators to this qualification of the rule:

"But suppose an enemy should massacre all prisoners of war, this would not afford a sufficient justification for the opposing belligerent to do the same. Suppose our enemy should use poisoned weapons, or poison springs and food, the rule of reciprocity would not justify us in resorting to the same means of retaliation. A savage enemy might kill alike old men, women, and children, but no civilized Power would resort to similar measures of cruelty and barbarism under the plea that they were justified by the law of retaliation."—Halleck's International Law, page 445.

If there is any authority directly against the Senator from Michigan in supporting this proposition, it is the authority of the President's chief of staff to-day. It is not enough for the Senator to read a pamphlet here that can have no effect upon the judgment of the country except to excite and increase passions which ought to be quieted rather than stimulated. He must show the Senate of the United States, I take it, that according to the laws of nations as between belligerents we have a right to do this, certainly a terrible thing, that he proposes. It is well enough, perhaps, to read the pamphlet if he wishes to have a political effect upon the country; but to inform the judgment of the Senate as to our rights as a belligerent in a great war, I take it that a pamphlet which does not come authenticated to this body is not very high authority.

Mr. HOWARD. The honorable Senator from Indiana will allow me to ask him one single question?

Mr. HENDRICKS. Certainly.

Mr. HOWARD. I ask the Senator whether he is in favor of any retaliation with a view to compel the rebels to treat our prisoners with more kindness and humanity?

Mr. HENDRICKS. I am in favor of carrying on this war upon our part as a civilized and Christian people. I am in favor of compelling the southern people to carry on the war upon their part as a Christian and civilized people, and if they refuse to do it, I am in favor of retaliating for the protection of our people and soldiers just so far as the usages of civilized nations will justify, and just so far as a civilized and Christian people, we ought to go, and no further.

Now, sir, the only authority that I have read condemns what the Senator proposes. He has not given us a citation of a single authority of force and respectability in this body justifying the high measure which he proposes. I expected to hear it. He is the champion of the measure; he reports it to the body; but instead of referring to accredited authority upon the subject, he gratifies the Senate by reading from a pamphlet containing a report of a committee appointed by the Sanitary Commission who go down and say they take testimony. I have much testimony within my own knowledge upon this subject. I believe there is much exaggeration upon it, as I get the facts from men who were in the very prison that the Senator read about. I dare say most Senators recollect the case of Captain Flinn, an officer in Libby prison, a captain from the town in which I live; a captain who had commanded in battle as a brave and gallant man. He was selected by lot to be shot in retaliation for two southern officers that were shot out in Kentucky under the command of General Burnside. I took a great deal of interest in his case. He was my personal friend. He wrote to me that he thought an exchange could be secured. I saw the President at once, and the President, a kind-hearted man, made the order on the part of this Government, and Captain Flinn was exchanged, and when he returned to his neighbors he told them that the prisoners were as well provided as the men who guarded them. I take his word on that subject while he was there as equal to the word of any man. It may have been worse afterward, but I do not know how the fact was.

Mr. HOWARD. Do I understand the Senator from Indiana to assert upon this floor that the Union prisoners in the hands of the rebels were as well provided for as the rebel soldiers or as the rebel prisoners in the hands of the Unionists? Will he assert that principle upon this floor?

Mr. HENDRICKS. I do not understand that that is a principle; it is a question of fact.

Mr. HOWARD. Well, the fact.

Mr. HENDRICKS. The Senator asks whether he understands that I have said that our own prisoners were treated as well as their guards. I did not say so. He has read testimony here taken by a commission in respect to Libby prison. I have given the statement of an honest man who was a prisoner there for months, a part of the time in a dungeon, selected by lot to be shot. When he came home he made this statement to his neighbors. I have no doubt that there have been cruelties inflicted on the Union prisoners in southern prisons, and that is one reason why I want them brought home; but I do not believe that it has gone to the extent reported in the country. I do not believe, upon the information I have on the subject, that it is at all to the extent stated in the pamphlet from which the Senator read to-day.

Mr. BROWN. Will the Senator permit me to ask why, if that is the case, does he object so strenuously to their prisoners being put in exactly the same position?

Mr. HENDRICKS. There is no force in the Senator's question; there is ingenuity in it. I say so with entire respect. The committee, in the preamble to this resolution, have undertaken to say precisely what has been the treatment of our prisoners, and the resolution declares that corresponding treatment shall be inflicted upon rebel prisoners in our hands. The committee has undertaken in this preamble to foreclose any inquiry on the part of the President; the committee has not left the President to judge how our prisoners have been treated; but the committee says to the President, in this resolution, "Sir, our prisoners have been starved, our prisoners when they have laid down their arms have been assassinated in cold blood; our prisoners in southern prisons have had diseases brought upon them by being allowed only unwholesome food; and, sir, we, the Senate of the United States, expect you, Mr. President, to administer unwholesome food, that disease may crawl into the system of rebel prisoners in the North. We, the Senate of the United States, expect you, Mr. President, to see that when the southerner lays down his arms and acknowledges himself a captive, he shall be assassinated in cold blood. The Senate of the United States expect you, Mr. President, because we have recited the fact of similar treatment in the South, to so restrict the food that shall be given to rebel prisoners in our hands, that they shall die minute after minute, hour after hour, day after day, month after month," in the language of the Senator from Michigan. So the question of the Senator from Missouri is answered by the committee. If the Senator from Missouri thinks it right to do this thing, to do a thing unheard of for hundreds of years, to do a thing that has not darkened the page of the history of our race since the days of the Edwards, to do a thing that is not done this side of western Asia, I am not prepared to go that length. I say the country is not prepared for it; Senators have mistaken the desire of the people at home.

The Senator from Michigan particularly shows deep feeling upon the subject. He shows it here. This debate goes out and he becomes the champion of the cause of our prisoners in the South, becomes the particular favorite of their friends at home, I suppose. That makes him strength; I am glad of it, but I wish to ask the Senator this: what does that Union prisoner down at Andersonville, who wrote him that letter saying that there were thirty-five thousand prisoners there, and that if they were not soon released two thirds of them would die, ask? Does that brave man in Andersonville ask the Senator from Michigan to go to poisoning or starving brave men in our hands? No, sir; that constituent of the Senator asks him to procure his exchange that he may come up into the North, into a climate to which he is accustomed, and where his health may return again.

Mr. HOWARD rose.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Before the Senator interrupts me I want to ask another question now. Inasmuch as the Senator from Michigan has shown such great zeal on this question, I want to know from him, as he is highly connected with the military movements—his position on the Military Committee makes him so—what steps he has taken in his official capacity to secure an exchange of prisoners.

Mr. HOWARD. If there has been any law enacted by Congress upon that subject I have probably voted for it, and the Senator from Indiana is as capable as myself of ascertaining what my action has been on that subject. The question is therefore supererogatory. I am not the Executive of the United States, and have no authority to act for him; and I suppose the Senator, in speaking of my "official capacity," does not wish to ascribe to me as a Senator from Michigan what pertains to the Executive.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I had hoped that the Senator from Michigan who reported this resolution, or the Senator from Ohio at the head of the committee on the conduct of the war, could tell us why our friends had not been brought home. The Senator from Ohio says there are some reasons; he hears of some reasons, but he does not know what they are. I had hoped that with his strong will and with his earnest nature, and with the passion of the Senator from Michigan, an address and a demand should have been made on the Department at the other end of the avenue which would have brought our brothers home. The Senator from Michigan says that his constituent in the prison of Andersonville now fills a southern grave. Of course we are all ready to drop a tear upon it.

Mr. HOWARD. Yes, sir, and he fills it in consequence of the deliberate starvation and cruelty of the rebel keepers toward him and his companions in arms, as the Senator knows well. That constituent of mine predicted that unless they were relieved, there would be two thirds of that thirty-five thousand dead in a short time. How they were to die the Senator from Indiana knows as well as I; that he expected to perish under this savage treatment of the rebels, as he has done.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I think we all understand that particular view which the Senator took of the subject. The point is this—

Mr. SUMNER. If the Senator will give way, I will move an adjournment.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I shall not occupy much more of the time of the Senate, and I would rather conclude now, unless Senators are restless.

Mr. SUMNER. There are several Senators who wish to speak.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I would rather finish what I have to say. I do not want this to be understood as anything like a speech. I wish to make a few remarks on the subject, and I shall not occupy much time, if the Senate will excuse me.

The point is this: it has been in the power of the Administration to secure an exchange, and I say that is the protection to our soldiers that I want. There is practical legislation proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. Wilson.] Send a commission; agree upon what shall be done. It can be agreed upon, for the Secretary of War tells the House of Representatives that there is no trouble, there is no difficulty, in bringing about an exchange. Why has it not been done? I take it for granted the reasons assigned by the Senator from Iowa have been the reasons, and they are not sufficient. If this constituent of the Senator from Michigan had been exchanged, had been brought up here into a northern, healthy climate, no doubt he would have recovered, and lived to comfort his friends and to enjoy life among them.

There is but one more suggestion that I wish to make on this subject. From the commencement of this war to the present time I have not believed that anything like barbarism or cruelty, any departure from the usages of civilized nations in prosecuting wars, has been any advantage to the northern cause. I believe that when we stand closely by the humane sentiments that have finally come to be incorporated in the laws of nations, it has been for the good of the North, and I shall refer to but two instances in illustration.

A beautiful valley in the State of Virginia has been made desolate, I suppose under the order of General Grant, until, as some one expressed it, a crow could not fly over the Shenandoah valley any more unless he carried a knapsack. Desolation broods where there were wealth and happiness once. What has been the effect of making war upon private property, of burning houses, and barns, and stacks? To make every man, woman, and child in all that region of country the bitter foe of this Government, uncompromising and unyielding, driven to despair, nothing to hope from us, nothing to hope but in the success of their cause. That is one policy.

General Sherman during the last year has made the most brilliant campaign I think that history records. From the time that he left Chattanooga until he carried his grand army to Savannah and captured that city, I think there is nothing like it in all modern history for the care that he took of his men, for the skill with which he accomplished every movement, not throwing, as Grant has done, thousands of men against breastworks to die, but by the interposition of high military genius he has carried his army in triumph over the mountains and along the rivers until that army has marched clear across the southern confederacy. I regret that in a military point of view before he left Atlanta he found it to be necessary to destroy that city; but when he came to Savannah, and that was at his feet, in the power of the General Government, private property was respected and individual security was made yet more secure; and what has been the effect? The effect of General Sherman's wise and humane policy at and about Savannah has made the power of Jeff. Davis and the southern confederacy tremble through all the Empire State of the South. Senators know it. And in my action and votes here I am going to consult what I believe, with the best lights I can command, to be the true interest and honor of my country, and not one minute shall I consult the passions of the day. I want this Union restored, not of one people to hate another; I want it restored under such circumstances that we may once more be friends.

Why is it that according to the laws of nations certain rules have been adopted for the regulation of belligerents, between foreign Powers engaged in war? It is that the war shall be prosecuted without inhumanity, barbarism, and cruelty, so that when the war is over there may be mutual respect and confidence, that the ancient relations of commerce and trade may return unimpaired. If that is an argument in favor of standing by the laws of nations, that high code which civilization has established between foreign Powers, belligerents, is it not a much more potent argument in favor of standing by those sentiments when we wish to bring back into the family these people of the South, and make us once more one Government and one people with one destiny?

Mr. HENDERSON. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. SUMNER. Before that motion is put I wish to have the amendment that I moved, and also the amendment of my colleague, ordered to be printed for the use of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That order will be made if there be no objection. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Missouri.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, January 24, 1865.

The House met at twelve o'clock, Mr. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. CHANNING. The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the War Department in relation to the hundred-day men accepted from Ohio and other States; which was ordered to be printed, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, a report from the same Department in relation to the amount paid for commutation by persons illegally drafted; which was ordered to be printed, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

SELECT COMMITTEE.

The SPEAKER appointed, as members of the select committee on the assault on Hon. WILLIAM D. KELLEY, in pursuance of the resolution of the House of yesterday, Mr. BEAMAN, of Michigan, Mr. ROLLINS, of New Hampshire, Mr. ROBINSON, of Illinois, Mr. BALDWIN, of Massachusetts, and Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York.

VERIFICATION OF INVOICES.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill further to provide for the verification of invoices; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message was received from the Senate, by Mr. HICKY, its Chief Clerk, notifying the House that that body had postponed indefinitely bills and a joint resolution of the House of the following titles:

An act (H. R. No. 479) for the relief of John Warren & Son;

An act (H. R. No. 489) for the relief of D. McV. Stuart; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 48) for the relief of Aaron T. Doll.

Also, that it had passed House bill No. 689, to provide for Acting Assistant Treasurers and depositaries of the United States in certain cases, with an amendment, in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House.

LIGHTS AND SIGNAL VESSELS.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, by unanimous consent, introduced the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be directed to inquire into the expediency of imposing a tax on commerce for the purpose of defraying the expense of lights and signal vessels, and report by bill or otherwise.

AMENDMENT OF THE CONSTITUTION.

Mr. MORRIS, of New York, by unanimous consent, presented the concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of New York, proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States so as to abolish slavery; which was laid on the table.

RAILROAD TRAVEL IN THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. ARNOLD, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Whereas the numerous and increasing instances of personal injury and loss of life occurring on the railroads of the United States, and as post roads for the transportation of soldiers, indicate gross carelessness in the management of such roads, and that travel upon them is becoming more and more perilous; and whereas it is the duty of the Government, as far as it has the power, to secure the safety and security of its soldiers and citizens so traveling on said railroads: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be, and they are hereby, directed to inquire and report whether any legislation is necessary to render the travel and transportation of soldiers and citizens on railroads and post roads of the United States safe and secure, and that they report by bill or otherwise.

TARIFF AMENDMENT.

Mr. FARNSWORTH, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means are hereby instructed to inquire into the expediency of reporting a bill repealing the tariff upon all materials used in the manufacture of paper.

BUREAU OF FREEDMEN AND REFUGEES.

Mr. SCHENCK, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported a bill to establish in the War Department a Bureau for the Relief of Freedmen and Refugees; which was read a first and second time, recommitted to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

MRS. HENRIETTA L. ELDRED.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Pennsylvania, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill for the relief of Mrs. Henrietta L. Eldred; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

INTERNAL REVENUE REPORT.

Mr. A. W. CLARK, from the Committee on Printing, reported the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That five thousand extra copies of the report of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue be printed; two thousand for the use of the members of this House, and three thousand for the use of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue.

PRINTING OF DOCUMENTS.

Mr. A. W. CLARK. I am also instructed by the Committee on Printing to report the following resolutions, and I ask that they be passed at this time:

Resolved, That the orders made by the House of Representatives during the first session of the present Congress for printing the accounts of the superintendent of Indian affairs for the southern superintendency be, and the same are hereby, rescinded.

Resolved, That the order made by the House of Representatives on the 12th of February, 1864, for printing the statement of fines imposed and deductions made from the pay of contractors for carrying the mails during the year ending June 30, 1863, be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

Resolved, That similar reports hereafter made to the House, shall not be printed unless special directions be given therefor.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Is that a House resolution or a joint resolution?

Mr. A. W. CLARK. The order for printing was made by the House.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I supposed that this statement of fines was printed under a provision of law.

Mr. A. W. CLARK. It was ordered to be printed by the House.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I supposed there was a provision of law which required these things to be printed. I think the resolution is just and proper. The only question is whether it should not be a joint resolution, in order to repeal an existing law on the subject.

Mr. A. W. CLARK. No, sir; it was merely an order of the House.

The resolutions were then agreed to.

LANMAN'S DICTIONARY OF CONGRESS.

Mr. A. W. CLARK. I am also instructed by the majority of the Committee on Printing to report the resolution which I send to the Chair. Permit me to say that I dissent from the report, but make it under the instructions of the committee.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That there be printed for the use of the members of this House a sufficient number of extra copies of the Dictionary of Congress to make the quota of the House equal to that already ordered by the Senate: Provided, The copyright hereby directed to be paid by the Clerk shall not exceed the amount heretofore paid per copy for the same work.

Mr. KERNAN. I desire to inquire the cost of printing these extra copies.

Mr. A. W. CLARK. Anticipating that this resolution might elicit some debate, I took the precaution to ask the Public Printer the expense of the contemplated work. According to this resolution, each member of this House would be furnished with an additional supply of twenty-three copies of this Dictionary, the whole expense of which, according to the estimate of the Public Printer, would amount to $11,250, $5,000 of which would go as copyright to Mr. Lanman. He, however, in a letter to me, says that if the type which has been set up has already been distributed, he proposes to receive fifty cents per copy as his compensation for the copyright, reducing the amount to $2,500. A majority of the committee were in favor of the report, but were unanimous in saying that the expense for copyright should not exceed fifty cents for each copy.

I now call the previous question.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I move that the resolution be laid on the table.

Mr. SCHENCK. This is one of the worst of all the jobs that have ever been brought into this House.

The SPEAKER. The previous question has been called, and debate is not in order.

Mr. A. W. CLARK. If the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] wishes to make some remarks on this subject, I withdraw the call for the previous question.

Mr. SCHENCK. Mr. Speaker, this is one of those resolutions for book purchasing and book distributing at the expense of the Government which I think ought not to pass. It is proposed to buy, for the use of members of this House and for distribution, a book which, if it has any merit, belongs to that class that ought to be obtained by application at the bookstores in the usual way by those who have occasion for it. I would as soon think of distributing any other Dictionary as a Dictionary of Congress, which, I believe, is simply intended to give a brief biography, not only of every honorable gentleman here now, but of all those who at any time heretofore have served in the legislative councils of the nation. It seems to me that it ought to be enough to defeat a resolution of this kind to refer to the fact that it is a book whose general character is such that members and their constituents ought to supply it to themselves, if they are curious in that kind of literature, without putting the public to the expense of purchasing it for them.

But if we look to this particular book I undertake to say that the character of the job of thus furnishing it at the expense of the Government is still more flagrant. Take, in the first place, the style of the book. Look at its introduction. "Political laws," are the first two words. I should like to know what "political laws" are. Organic laws, constitutions, might possibly be regarded as "political laws;" but how it is that the laws which are passed here or by any legislative body are "political laws" is past my comprehension. And yet those two words, the very first in the book, are a sample of its whole style.

But the style, it may be said, is much less important than the matter. Very well; take the matter.

Mr. STEVENS. I desire to ask the gentleman whether the style of the different biographies is not as various as the styles of the gentlemen who wrote them. [Laughter.] Nobody supposes that they were all written by Mr. Lanman.

Mr. SCHENCK. I do not think that all those who have been members of this or any other Congress have written their own biographies for this volume. Here, for instance, is the case of W. W. Irvine, of Ohio. He is set down as having been chargé d'affaires to Denmark in 1843. Well, as he died at Lancaster, Ohio, in 1842, it is not probable that he furnished the memoranda in his own case.

Mr. STEVENS. The information may have been received through a spiritual medium. [Laughter.]

Mr. SCHENCK. That is a specimen of the accuracy of the book, unless it may have been since amended. As suggested by my friend from Pennsylvania, the hypothesis of a spiritual medium might account for this way in which the material was obtained. In another case, of which I have a note, it is stated that a certain gentleman was in 1863 appointed by President Lincoln a judge of the Court of Claims, while he was in fact appointed by President Buchanan. I hold in my hand sixty-two specimens of this kind of the accuracy of that book; but I will not detain the House by commenting upon them.

But there is another feature in this case—the evident political bearing, if it may be so called, of the book. If gentlemen will look at the various biographies, they will find that it has generally been thought sufficient to speak of a member as having been elected to Congress, together with a statement of his birth and death, accompanied by the date of each. This, in such brief biographies, is perhaps sufficient, and all that ought to be expected. But when you come to the case of such a person as Jacob Thompson, the rebel member of the Cabinet of Mr. Buchanan, and a rebel while he was a member—the man who connived at frauds and thefts in his Department, and communicated information to the enemy while he was of the council of the President—you find that the biographer is disposed to speak, not merely of particular facts, but to comment a little upon the popularity with, and the great performances for the benefit of, his constituency which led to that gentleman's success in his aspirations for a position in Congress.

So, again, when you look at the cases of Boteler and some six or eight others, who withdrew from this House because they were rebels, it softens that down to a resignation, when no such resignation was made. And thus throughout that book, from the beginning to the end, whenever it is thought proper and necessary to speak of one who occupies that relation to the Government which led finally to rebellion and insurrection and treason, you will find them handled very gingerly, and if there is an encomium to be passed upon them there is a little enlargement of the merits of the individual, while no pains are taken to illustrate the character and history of any one who has stood by the country. Take, for instance, the case of my former venerable colleague, Joshua R. Giddings. In order that a fling may be made at him, he takes especial pains to show that he died in a billiard room. The style of the book is not so diffuse, nor the number of facts introduced so general, as to call for a trifling and unimportant matter of that kind to be mentioned, unless there was an object in it. I only allude to this to show the general malice and the general tone of that book as regards the character, leaning, inclination, and sympathy of the gentleman, whoever he may be, who had charge of its general preparation.

Then again, sir, the book has been gotten up at different times. Several years ago the first of it was prepared, and that has been added to since; and those things, now in 1864—the date the book bears and the date of the introduction—which were true two years ago remain as if they were true yet. That is the position of a man as given some three or four years ago, or whenever it was the first edition of this book was published, and it remains as if he still were in that position. Gentlemen are put down as members of Congress who are not here now. Gentlemen there now occupy places which are not the places they held at this time. The book relates back to some former time. These corrections have not been made in the book I have seen, certainly not in the one of 1864. I have notes to show that it is full of anachronisms and solecisms which would be disgraceful to anything which pretends to be history, as this does.

But I did not purpose to detain the House further than to direct its attention to the kind of matter which we propose to charge the United States with, that we may get it for our own use and to distribute it to our own constituents. If it is of any value we ought to signify our belief in that value by buying the volume for ourselves, or to present it to our constituents, or leave those outside of these Halls to buy it on their own account.

Mr. FARNSWORTH moved that the resolution be laid on the table; and on that motion demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 93, nays 42, not voting 37; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Atley, Ames, Arnold, Ashley, Augustus C. Baldwin, John D. Baldwin, Baxter, Blair, Beaman, Boutwell, Boyd, Broomall, James S. Brown, William G. Brown, Ambrose W. Clark, Cobb, Cole, Creswell, Henry Winter Davis, Thomas T. Davis, Dawes, Denning, Dixon, Donnelly, Driggs, Eckley, Eden, Eliot, Farnsworth, Ganson, Garfield, Gooch, Grinnell, Griswold, Harding, Higby, Holman, Asahel W. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Julian, Kasson, Francis W. Kellogg, Orlando Kellogg, Kernan, Knox, Littlejohn, Longyear, Mallory, Marvin, McBride, McClurg, McIndoe, Samuel F. Miller, Morrill, Daniel Morris, Morrison, Amos Myers, Leonard Myers, Norton, Odell, Charles O'Neill, Othys, Patterson, Pendleton, Perham, Perry, Pike, Price, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Robinson, Edward H. Rollins, Schenck, Scofield, Shannon, Sloan, Smithers, Starr, Stevens, Thayer, Thomas, Upson, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Wheeler, Chilton A. White, Williams, Wilder, Wilson, and Windom—93.

NAYS—Messrs. James C. Allen, Bailly, Blaine, Brooks, Clay, Cox, Dawson, Denison, Edgerton, Eldridge, Fluck, Frank, Grider, Hale, Benjamin G. Harris, Charles M. Harris, Herrie, Philip Johnson, Kalbfleisch, Law, Lazear, Le Blond, Long, McAllister, McDowell, Middleton, William H. Miller, Moorhead, Noble, John O'Neill, William H. Randall, James S. Rollins, Ross, Scott, Spalding, John B. Steele, Strouse, Stuart, Sweet, Whaley, and Yeaman—42.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. William J. Allen, Allison, Ancona, Anderson, Bliss, Blow, Braudagee, Chanler, Freeman Clarke, Coffroth, Cravens, Dumont, English, Hall, Harrington, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Hulburd, Hutchins, William Johnson, Kelley, King, Knapp, Loan, Marcy, McKinney, James R. Morris, Nelson, Pomeroy, Pray, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, Rogers, Smith, William G. Steele, Stiles, Townsend, Tracy, Van Valkenburgh, Voorhees, Wadsworth, Ward, Webster, Joseph W. White, Winfield, Benjamin Wood, Fernando Wood, Woodbridge, and Worthington—37.

So the resolution was laid on the table.

Mr. FARNSWORTH moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was laid on the table; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

COLONIZATION SOCIETY.

Mr. COX. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to present, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, a joint resolution in reference to a settlement with the Colonization Society by the Secretary of the Interior. I ask that the resolution may be read, as well as a letter from the Secretary of the Interior.

The Clerk read the title of the joint resolution, as follows:

Joint resolution to facilitate an adjustment of certain accounts of the American Colonization Society for the support of captured Africans in Liberia.

Mr. COX. If there is no objection to the introduction of the resolution, I will demand the previous question.

Mr. SPALDING. Will the gentleman allow me to take up, in connection with that, the Senate bill in reference to a gunboat to Liberia?

Mr. COX. We cannot take up two matters at once.

No objection being made, the resolution was received, read a first and second time, ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. COX. I move that the vote by which the resolution was passed be reconsidered, and also move that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. COX. I will ask to have printed in the Globe the letter of the Secretary of the Interior, instead of having it read to the House.

Consent was given; and the letter is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,

WASHINGTON, December 16, 1864.

SIR: During the years 1860 and 1861, this Department, in virtue of the authority conferred upon the President by the act of Congress approved June 16, 1860, entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act in addition to the acts prohibiting the slave trade,'" (Statutes at Large, volumes 12, 40,) entered into four several contracts with the American Colonization Society for the support, for one year, of a large number of Africans, about five thousand in all, who had been recaptured on the high seas by armed vessels of the United States, and, by order of the Government, taken into the republic of Liberia. By the terms of these contracts the United States agreed to pay at the rate of $100 per annum for each African over the age of eight years, and at the rate of fifty dollars per annum for each one under that age. The payments were to be made monthly for the first three quarters of the year, the recapitatives were to be supported, for every African landed in Liberia without regard to age. The payments for the last quarter were to be deferred until the end of the quarter and until a certificate should be produced from the agent of the United States, setting forth the number of Africans fed, clothed, and sheltered during each month of the year, and that the contract had otherwise been faithfully executed by the society. The object of deferring the payment for the last quarter was to enable the Department to deduct from the amount which might become due for the last quarter any sum found to have been overpaid during the first three quarters.

Prior to the termination of the contracts the American Colonization Society, at the instance of the Liberian authorities as is understood, entered into an agreement or sub contract with the Government of Liberia, by which that Government assumed the guardianship of the recapitatives, and the obligations which the Colonization Society had engaged with the United States to perform toward them—the payments by the United States continuing, however, to be made as previously to the American Colonization Society.

In my annual report of the 5th of December, 1863, I referred to this subject as follows, namely:

"The accounts of the American Colonization Society for the support of recaptured Africans in Liberia have not yet been finally settled, owing to the imperfect manner in which they have been kept by the resident agent of the United States in that republic, and by the Liberian authorities after the transfer of the recapitatives to them. The information and facts required to be regularly reported not having been recorded and preserved by them, it is feared they cannot now be obtained with the accuracy of detail contemplated by the strict terms of the contracts, and hence it is respectfully recommended that the Department be authorized by law to adjust and settle the accounts on equitable principles."

The Department has no reason to suppose that the terms of the contracts have not been faithfully fulfilled and the welfare of the recapitatives duly cared for, but in consequence of the omission referred to, it is found to be impossible to effect a final settlement of the accounts without the aid of further legislation on the subject.

I am satisfied that there is a balance equitably due to the republic of Liberia, through the American Colonization Society, which that Government is anxious to have paid; and with a view to the only practicable mode of settling the accounts, I submit to you the accompanying draft of a joint resolution for the consideration of the Committee on Foreign Relations.

I have the honor to be, with much respect, your obedient servant,

J. P. USHER, Secretary.

HON. CHARLES SUMNER, Chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate.

TREASURY PRINTING BUREAU.

Mr. JENCKES, by unanimous consent, submitted the following preamble and resolution:

Whereas in the annual report of the Secretary of the Treasury no mention is made by him of the Printing Bureau of the Treasury Department:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to communicate to this House the present condition of the Printing Bureau, together with the annual report of the bureau, and any and all reports with reference to said bureau which have been made to the Secretary during the past year.

The SPEAKER. This being a call for executive information, requires unanimous consent for consideration to-day.

No objection was made.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I move to amend the resolution by adding thereto the following:

Together with all the expenses incident to the same.

Mr. JENCKES. I accept the amendment.

The resolution, as amended, was agreed to.

MEDICAL DEPARTMENT OF THE NAVY.

Mr. ODELL, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to reorganize the medical department of the United States Navy; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

MAIL SERVICE TO CHINA.

Mr. COLE, of California, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, reported a bill to authorize the establishment of ocean mail steamship service between the United States and China; which was read a first and second time, ordered to be printed, and recommitted to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

CHINCHA ISLANDS.

Mr. COLE, of California, by unanimous consent, introduced the following resolution; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the people of the United States of America view with distrust the violent and unprovoked seizure of the Chincha Islands by the Spanish authorities on the 14th day of April last, as well as the continued and unjustifiable retention of those islands from the Peruvian Government; and that they regard the transaction as part of a scheme, in connection with the movements of France and Austria in Mexico, to subvert the Spanish-American republics.

PRINTING OF NAVY REGISTER.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts, by unanimous consent, introduced the following resolution; which, under the rule, was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That there be printed, for the use of the members of this House, two thousand five hundred copies of the Navy Register.

MAJOR M'FARLAND.

Mr. ROLLINS, of New Hampshire, by unanimous consent, introduced a joint resolution with reference to Major McFarland; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

ENROLLED BILL.

Mr. COBB, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled a joint resolution (H. R. No. 140) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to give the necessary notice stipulated pending the intention of the United States to purchase the building known as Merchants' Exchange, New York city, now used for custom-house purposes; when the Speaker signed the same.

GUNBOAT FOR LIBERIA.

Mr. SPALDING. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the Senate bill with regard to furnishing a gunboat to Liberia.

Mr. HOLMAN. I demand the regular order of business.

Mr. SPALDING. Will not the gentleman allow me to take up this bill?

Mr. HOLMAN. I think we had better proceed to the regular order.

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the consideration of the appeal taken yesterday from the decision of the Chair by the gentleman from New York [Mr. Brooks.] Upon that question the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Stevens] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. STEVENS. I do not wish to imitate the example of the gentleman from New York [Mr. Brooks] so far as to speak without evidence, or to hope that the House will take my assertions as true, and therefore I will give a portion of my time to the gentleman who represents General Butler's district, [Mr. Boutwell,] who will give us the facts of which he has possession. We will then see how far the remarks of the gentleman from New York are justified.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Mr. Speaker, under the circumstances which exist it is quite possible that I may be compelled to ask the indulgence of the House for a longer period of time than is assigned by its rules to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. Stevens.] I do not propose to take time in making remarks, but there is a certain amount of evidence necessarily to be submitted to this House and to the country in order that this question may be understood; and as my course of proceeding will necessarily be determined by the measure of time which the House may be disposed to allot to me, I take this opportunity of asking the House to allow me one hour beyond what remains of the time assigned to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, with the hope that in that period I can offer what I have to submit to the House, and leave also time for the gentleman from Pennsylvania to submit the remarks which it is his purpose to make.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent that his time may be extended one hour.

Mr. COX. I will not object if the same privilege be extended to the gentleman from New York [Mr. Brooks] to reply. That is nothing more than fair.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the proposed extension of the time of the gentleman from Massachusetts, with the understanding that the gentleman from New York shall have a similar extension, if he desires to reply?

No objection was made.

Mr. BOUTWELL. It is my fortune, Mr. Speaker, and not ill fortune, that I represent the district of Massachusetts in which General Butler resides. When the gentleman from New York [Mr. Brooks] on a day now some time since passed, charged upon General Butler the crime of being "a gold robber," I paid no heed to it. I had seen from the commencement of this war that secessionists, and men whose sympathies are with the purposes of the secessionists, had not hesitated, whenever and wherever they could obtain the ear of the public, to arraign whomsoever they might upon whom in any degree, in their estimation, rested the crime of being patriots. I remembered that General Butler had been the first man to expound to this country and to the world the true doctrine as to the rights of the negro race on this continent, and to expose to mankind the course necessary to be pursued in order that this rebellion might be crushed. I regarded the observation of the gentleman from New York as an observation made in harmony with these continued and oft-repeated declarations made by secessionists in the South and secessionists and their sympathizers in the North. I did not properly appreciate the circumstance that he spoke from this floor, that he was here shielded by the Constitution, that he had in a certain sense the ear of the American public, and perhaps of the world, and that what he uttered went upon the records of this House and became a part of the history of the country.

General Butler being the subject of that observation, took a different view entirely of the matter, and when the remark was brought to his notice he addressed a letter to the gentleman from New York. That letter has been read before this House, and its contents are known to the country generally. If it had been what the gentleman from New York assumed upon this floor that it was, a challenge to him to mortal combat, if he had not been overwhelmed by his fears, he would have rejoiced that that day for which he longed, the day for the reconstruction of this Union as it was, had approached, in that the assassination was attempted in one part of this city of a member for words spoken in debate, and that there was a challenge to another, reviving recollections which must have been grateful to him of those days when the Union did exist "as it was" and there was no freedom of speech upon this floor or upon the floor of the other House of Congress; but his fears overcame entirely the tendency which he otherwise would have had to rejoice in the restoration of the palmy days when assassination and dueling were tolerated in the capital of the country. But those days are passed, and now that there are no longer plantation masters here or to be represented here, I trust that plantation manners also will depart from us.

It was the last of the designs of General Butler to challenge the gentleman from New York to mortal combat. The letter to the gentleman was dated on the 20th day of January. On that same day General Butler addressed a letter to the Speaker of this House, which was not sent. I have examined General Butler's letter book; and I find that the letter to the Speaker anticipates in order the letter addressed to the gentleman from New York, and if there were no other evidence, it would sufficiently explain the purpose, which General Butler had in view. I send that letter to the Clerk, and ask that it be read to the House.

The Clerk read, as follows:

WASHINGTON, January 20, 1865.

SIR: I take leave most respectfully to request you to lay before the House of Representatives this note, in order to avail myself of the only means of redress known to me, without breach of the privileges of the honorable House.

Mr. JAMES BROOKS, a member of the House, on the 6th of January, is reported to have used in debate the following language:

"I am bound to say that an effort was made by the Federal Government during the pendency of the late presidential election to control the city of New York, by sending there a bold robber, in the person of a major general of the United States. Robber as he was of the public Treasury, and major general of the United States as he was, he dared not exercise the power given to him to attempt to control the actions of those whom the gentleman calls thieves and robbers in my own city."

The correctness of the report of which I have taken measures to ascertain.

Here, then, is a charge made upon the responsibility of the position Mr. Brooks occupies of very high crimes and misdemeanors alleged to be committed by an officer of the United States which, if he is guilty, ought to be visited by the most condign punishment.

If the charge is calumnious and false, then it is due to the national honor that it should be unstained by the imputation of the employment of such a person in its service in high official position, and it would seem also due to the dignity of the House that a public slanderer should be rebuked.

The Constitution and laws of the United States and parliamentary usage give to the officer thus charged no means of redress through the ordinary courts of law, or any other mode known among honorable men; therefore, appealing to the sense of justice of the honorable House, I respectfully ask that an investigation may be ordered of the charges so preferred against me by a member of the House, through a committee of its members with the most ample powers of inquiry.

Further, in order not to embarrass the investigation by confining it to the single charge made, I desire to have put in issue every official act of my public life which can in any way be supposed to affect my official integrity or personal honor, and that my accuser have leave to make good his accusation before the committee of the House, so that if the accused be found guilty, proper prosecution may be ordered in the courts for his punishment; or if the accusation be found false and calumnious, the honorable House may be in position to vindicate its own honor and dignity by the due punishment of a public calumniator and slanderer.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully,

BEN. F. BUTLER.

Hon. SPEAKER House of Representatives, Congress of the United States.

Mr. RUTWELL. That is a copy from General Butler's letter book of a letter which he intended to address to the Speaker of this House whenever the gentleman from New York should have replied to the letter sent to him on the 20th of this month. Lest there should be any misunderstanding I will say this in regard to these letters: up to yesterday, after the adjournment of the House, I had never conversed with General Butler or with any friend of his in reference to any official act of his life. As the gentleman from New York was about closing his remarks I went over to the seat of the honorable member from Pennsylvania [Mr. Stevens] and said to him that I desired that the House should adjourn before this debate closed, and that to-morrow I would probably present official documents to this House. At that moment I had no knowledge that any official documents existed, but I had known General Butler for twenty-five years. I knew his faults; I knew his virtues; I knew his failings; I knew his capacities; I knew that in a transaction involving $50,000 he had evidence incontrovertible as to the position he occupied. And when I approached him, as I did last evening, without any suggestion from him, and reported to him in brief the statements that had been made on this floor, and said to him that if he had any documents to present to the House, I, as his Representative, should be happy to be the means of communicating them, he opened his letter book and showed to me the two letters, the one addressed to the gentleman from New York and the other to the Speaker of the House. He said that both were written at the same time; and they appeared on the letter book in their proper position, only that the copy of the letter to the Speaker preceded that of the letter to the gentleman from New York. At the same time I had the boldness to meet there Captain Clarke, who was in the uniform of the Republic. I know that if he had worn gray uniform when he approached the gentleman from New York that gentleman would not have been so affrighted. I asked him to state what he knew about the matter. He said, "I wrote the letters at the same time, on the same day, from the dictation of General Butler; and they were recorded just as they appear."

A single word now in reference to a matter on which I do not propose to spend much time—the affairs at Norfolk. The gentleman [Mr. Brooks] did not present yesterday any evidence whatever as to General Butler's transactions at Norfolk. I shall not, therefore, spend much time over it; but when I approach the greater subject, the House will see, and the country will see, that any statement of his, without testimony, as to the transactions of anybody, cannot be believed by the country. I say, from an inquiry this morning, that the records of the War Office furnish no testimony whatsoever impeaching General Butler's reputation or conduct in reference to trade transactions in the district which he has lately commanded.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I come to the testimony in reference to the $50,000 transaction in New Orleans. I ask the attention of the gentleman from New York to one point, because, when I have presented the evidence, I shall put to him a question on my own responsibility as a member of this House, as a Representative of a district, as a citizen of this country, interested somewhat in the reputation of a man who is already historical, and who, since the administration of Hastings in India, has had a larger command and greater interests of the country placed in his hands than almost any other person, and I shall expect a definite and distinct answer to that question; and therefore I put him on his guard at this early moment. The question I shall put to him is, (asking the Clerk first to read the extract from the gentleman's speech which was contained in General Butler's letter,) whether he reaffirms the statement which he made or whether he retracts it? And according to the course which he takes shall be mine as to some observations which I will then submit.

The gentleman from New York laid before the House yesterday what he calls a "deposition" of one Samuel Smith, which turned out to be an affidavit ex parte, and not true at that. I have here a letter signed by the United States district attorney at New Orleans, and the United States marshal, dated 12th May, 1864, which, although subsequent to the transactions that are now in question, throw some light on the character of this charge. I ask the Clerk to read them.

The Clerk read, as follows:

OFFICE OF THE UNITED STATES DISTRICT ATTORNEY,
New Orleans, May 12, 1864.

Sir: By the last mail I received your note of the 23d ultimo, making inquiry relative to the status of Samuel Smith & Co. respecting their loyalty. As I left this city soon after the commencement of hostilities, and remained in Washington city till May of last year, I cannot speak from personal knowledge. Having made diligent inquiry, however, I learn that Mr. Smith was a sympathizer with, and an aider and abettor of the rebellion while it was in power here. The firm were the agents for the confederate loan, and their books and blanks are still in the upper room of their former banking house on Camp street in this city, showing their agency as above stated. The general reputation of Mr. S. Smith was that of an enemy of the United States, before the arrival of General Butler, and for some time afterward. Andrew W. Smith, his only partner, was even more bitter in his disunion sentiments.

My information is derived from gentlemen of the highest standing, constant loyalty, and continued residence here throughout the rebellion up to this time.

If I can be of any service in preventing impositions upon the Government, such as I am informed have already been practiced by secessionists here representing themselves otherwise in Washington, you have but to intimate it. If you wish affidavits of the statement made above with regard to Samuel and A. W. Smith, composing the firm of Samuel Smith & Co., they shall be forwarded.

I have the honor to be, your obedient servant,

RUFUS WAILES,

United States District Attorney.

Hon. Wm. Whiting, Solicitor of the War Department.

I concur in the correctness of the foregoing statements relative to Messrs. Samuel Smith & Co., from my own personal knowledge.

JAMES GRAHAM,
United States Marshal.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I have caused that to be read as furnishing a basis in evidence for the seizure of the money in question. The affidavit of Samuel Smith says:

"The statement that 'this gold was condemned by a military commission as the proceeds of the robbery of the United States mint at New Orleans' is without a shadow of truth, is utterly malicious, and is in every syllable basely false."

I hold in my hand the order of Major General Butler constituting a commission. I have also the evidence taken before the commission; also the award of the commission. Although the $50,000 was not condemned as being the proceeds of the property of the Treasury of the United States, and in that respect the statement of Smith is true, it was, nevertheless, condemned in consequence of the conduct of Smith in his transactions with the confederate officers at New Orleans. I ask that the Clerk shall read the document which I now present; but before it is read, I will state that Farragut passed the forts at the mouth of the Mississippi river, I think, on the 24th day of April. On the 2d day of May General Butler took possession of the city of New Orleans. Although I have not the date of the seizure of this money, it was at some time between the 2d day of May and the 12th day of June, when the order was issued constituting the commission.

The Clerk read, as follows:

NEW ORLEANS, June, 1862.

GENERAL: We have the honor to submit the following report of the proceedings, evidences, and findings of the commission authorized by the following special order:

[Special Order, No. 96.]

HEADQUARTERS DEPARTMENT OF THE GULF,
New Orleans, June 12, 1862.

A commission composed of General Shepley, military commander, Dr. W. N. Mercer, and Thomas J. Durant, Esq., of New Orleans, is ordered to hear and determine whether there is reasonable cause to believe that the specie and property seized by the United States in the banking house of Samuel Smith & Co. is the property of the confederate States, or of any department or office thereof, or whether said specie and other property has been used in any way to aid the confederate States or any officers thereof in concealing any property of the confederate States, or whether said Samuel Smith & Co. have in any way so acted in behalf of this rebellion as ought to cause the further detention of said specie and other property for hearing before the Department at Washington.

This board to sit at the expense of the parties claimants, it having been ordered at their request. Captain Peter Haggerty is appointed recorder for the commission.

By order of General Butler:

R. S. DAVIS,
Captain and A. A. G.

In obedience to the above order the board met on the 15th June, at half past seven o'clock, at the St. Charles Hotel.

Present, General Shepley, W. N. Mercer, and Thomas J. Durant, commission, and Captain P. Haggerty, recorder. The parties being present with the witnesses, the claims of the United States authorities to hold the property mentioned in said order, the admitted facts in relation to said property, as well as the reasons for making said claim, were presented by Major General Butler.

The following affidavit of Marcelin Esnard was then read, namely:

I, Marcelin Esnard, of lawful age, do depose and say that, on the day Mr. Guirot went away (April 24, 1862) with the specie of the mint, I took $50,000 in gold from Mr. Samuel Smith on his order, which order is exhibited to me here. A few days before that, (four or five days), Mr. Guirot, having a quantity of silver which he wished to change into gold for the convenience of carrying away the specie, procured Mr. Smith, director of some bank, to have this bank take the silver and give gold for it, which the bank did, and I received it from Mr. Smith as by receipt shown me here, and carried it to Mr. Guirot, and he carried it away with him, and on the same day gave me the books of the mint which were captured at my house.

M. ESnard.

Then came before the above-mentioned M. Esnard, and swore that he told the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, in reference to these proceedings.

BENJ. F. BUTLER,
Major General Commanding.

And here the Government rested their case.

Messrs. Samuel Smith & Co. then proceeded, through A. L. Rozier, Esq., to state their side of the case, and recite the following statement of Jacob Staub, namely:

Jacob Staub, being duly sworn, says that he is the porter of the Canal and Banking Company; that on or about the 23d of last month, by order of the president of said bank, he received from the mint $50,000 in silver coin, ten boxes of which, each containing $1,000, he placed in the adjoining banking house of Samuel Smith & Co., who were aiding the bank in the redemption of their bills, and that Samuel Smith & Co. returned to the Canal Bank four of the said boxes, containing each $1,000, and $6,000 in their bills, which they had redeemed, the residue he placed in the said Canal Bank; that during the day Mr. Guirot, the assistant treasurer of the mint, called at the bank, and he (Jacob) requested Mr. Guirot to send for the gold which he had been ordered by the president of the bank to deliver to him in exchange for the silver received, which Mr. Guirot promised to do. At two o'clock, when the bank closed, the gold was not sent for, and he, by order of the president, placed it in the banking house of Samuel Smith & Co., who usually kept their banking house open later in the day than the incorporated banks, to be delivered to Mr. Guirot when called for.

JACOB STAUB.

Sworn and subscribed before me this — day of May, 1862.

D. F. MITCHELL,
Justice of the Peace.

And also called Jacob Staub, who testified as follows, to wit:

"Am a porter employed in Canal Bank. We received the money in April. An officer of the mint, I think it was, said Mr. Guirot sent him with the money. I gave Smith ten boxes of it, and the rest was to be used (as small) in paying the small notes of the bank. On the 23d, Smith gave four boxes back to us. Guirot came next day; he said, 'Will you give me that money in gold?' I told him I had $50,000 in gold and he could take that; said he would come at two o'clock. The gold was rolled into Smith's window, and the porter told him it was Guirot's money. On Saturday, the 19th, we had only silver for an hour or so. On Tuesday morning I heard arrangements had been made with the mint for the specie. The bank was crowded. I think we got a little silver from Mr. Barker's bank. I know that ten boxes went to Mr. Smith and that four were returned to us. I think the 23d was Wednesday. The silver came in on Tuesday and Wednesday; think we got $50,000 on Wednesday about eleven o'clock. Mr. Guirot told me he wanted the gold and would come for it before two o'clock. I saw the gold rolled into Smith's; it was done up in bags and then put in a keg. Mr. Guirot did not know that we were going to put it into Mr. Smith's. On the 22d and 23d, Smith had a pretty large amount of gold. I think he sent into our bank a check for $37,000; the paying teller and myself did the paying out. I did not know that Smith had a large amount out on the 22d. I saw him about the bank three or four times that day, and I know that some money was going into Smith's."

"I cannot tell who brought the large check of Hewitt, Norton & Co., or who it was paid to; I did not know of any other large amounts paid to Smith & Co. about that time; I have no recollection of paying the large check or setting aside the coin to pay it."

"Bank began to pay specie Saturday, April 19; Monday and Tuesday specie began to run short. On Wednesday the president or cashier told me that money would come from the mint. I understood next morning from the officers of the bank some more money would come; gave no receipt for it, $25,000, which came first; I was not asked for a receipt the next day; know Mr. Guirot very well; he came in about two hours after we had the specie. I received orders from our bank officers to pay to Guirot the amount in gold. He came in about eleven o'clock; did not take it then, but said he would come for it at two o'clock. The money we put into Mr. Smith's because he was close by the bank; I said that day as late as six or seven o'clock and Mr. Guirot did not come; I think it was the 23d, Wednesday."

The affidavit of Mr. J. Rathbone, president of the New Orleans Canal and Banking Company, was then read, as follows, to wit:

Mr. J. Rathbone, president of the New Orleans Canal and Banking Company, being duly sworn, says that Mr. Samuel Smith, a director of the bank, called on him on about the 22d of April, 1862, to know if the bank would give gold for silver, stating that Mr. Guirot of the mint was desirous of making the exchange, and that he on the part of the bank told Mr. Smith that as the bank had little or no silver, and the gold in the vault then ready to pay out was in twenty-dollar pieces, it was difficult to pay amounts under twenty dollars. The bank would make the exchange to the amount it should pay out. Then Mr. Smith told the deponent that his firm would redeem the notes of the bank in silver to aid in satisfying the run on the bank for the redemption of its notes, and that this deponent was informed by the clerk or porter that the bank and Samuel Smith & Co. had thus used of the silver to the amount of $50,000 which he ordered handed over to Smith & Co. in gold.

J. RATHBONE.

Sworn before me this — day of May, 1862.

D. F. MITCHELL,
Justice of the Peace.

Mr. Rathbone was then called as a witness by Samuel Smith & Co. and testified as follows:

"I am president of the Canal Bank, and did not make any arrangement with Guirot for the gold. My impression is that I told some one that I thought it best to put it into Smith's office. This gold was put into bags of $5,000 and then put into kegs, but not in bags constructed for our bank. I do not think the bag was sealed; I have no personal knowledge of the payment of Hewitt, Norton & Co.'s check; I do not know anything of the $50,000 afterward; my impression is that the transaction was on the day preceding the passage of the forts by the United States forces; I do not know that any receipt was given for the silver; they told me that $50,000 had been paid out; I told them to pay it out with a keg of gold. Before we began to pay specie there was no consultation by the board of directors as to when the bank should obtain its supply; I think Mr. Smith told me he would supply us; I think we had it of him before we heard of Guirot."

"My impression is that Mr. Smith asked if I would take some silver, that he would get some of Guirot. I said yes, so far as we wanted it, and we would pay for it in gold. I do not recollect whether anything was said between myself and Mr. Smith as to the object for which Mr. Guirot wanted to change the coin. Mr. Smith told me, as I understood him, he wanted it in smaller compass in case he wanted to send it away. This was my impression. We must have used Mr. Smith's money before it (this coin) came from the mint."

The affidavit of Samuel S. Booth was then read, as follows:

Samuel S. Booth being duly sworn, says that he is a clerk in the banking house of Samuel Smith & Co.; that they were employed in assisting the Canal Bank in paying out specie for their bills; that their silver running short Mr. Smith procured it from others during hours of business. Mr. J. Guirot came to the bank and had a conversation with Mr. Smith on the 22d or 23d of April last, and when Mr. Guirot left Mr. Smith remarked that the Canal Bank was to give $50,000 in gold, soon after which the silver came up on a cart, and most of which went into the Canal Bank, the residue into the banking house of S. Smith & Co. for the mint, which was delivered to Mr. Esnard by me on the following morning on presentation of the order book appended.

SAM. S. BOOTH.

Sworn to and subscribed this — day of May, 1862.
D. F. MITCHELL,
Justice of the Peace.

Messrs. Samuel Smith & Co.: Please deliver to the bearer, Mr. Esnard, the $50,000 in gold.

A. J. GUIROT.

Respectfully,
April 24, 1862.

Mr. Neville, a witness called by Sam. Smith & Co., testified as follows:

"I am one of the clerks of Sam. Smith & Co.; keep their books, [cash book of Smith & Co. exhibited.] I was not present at any one of those transactions. I only know generally that Smith & Co. ought to have the amount of $64,000 which is set down in the cash account of Smith & Co. of April 23; it is in Mr. Booth's handwriting. I have no knowledge of what amount they should have at any time other than appears on the books."

And here the court adjourned to meet to-morrow evening at seven and a half o'clock.

SATURDAY EVENING, June 14.

Met according to adjournment; all the members of the commission and the recorder being present, when the hearing was resumed.

Mr. Neville, being recalled, says as follows:

"I collected from the Bank of Louisiana $2,500; Mechanics and Traders, $700; Union, $500; Canal, $11,000. The entry in the cash book, except as to amount, was an error of mine. I do not remember of any other large amount of gold coming in on that day or 22d April. I know that a large exchange bill sterling had been sold; the books show on the 23d April $64,000 and odd. We were in the habit of buying and selling coin and bank notes every day without affecting our capital. On September 16 we had a specie balance of about $37,000 and odd. The agreement made by the Canal Bank with Sam. Smith & Co. was that whatever was due at the time they resumed specie payment they would assume and pay."

The deposition of C. Bell was then read as follows:
Colville Bell, being duly sworn, says that on the 22d of April last he received from Sam. Smith & Co. a bill of exchange on London of £6,608, for which he paid Sam. Smith & Co. $36,700 in gold by giving them a check on the Canal Bank, payable in gold, which is hereto annexed.

COLVILLE BELL.

Subscribed and sworn to before me this 24th day of June, 1862.

D. F. MITCHELL,
Justice of the Peace.

NEW ORLEANS, April 21, 1862.

CANAL BANK:

Pay to the order of Sam. Smith & Co. (in gold) thirty-six thousand seven hundred dollars. ($36,700).

HEWITT, NORTON & CO.,
Per C. BELL.

Mr. C. Bell was then called by Smith & Co., and testified as follows:

"I purchased of Mr. Smith a bill of exchange on April 21. I paid for it next day in gold. This was a portion of what was due to Hewitt, Norton & Co."

"Mr. Norton was a director in the Canal Bank. I was directed by the president of the bank to collect my balance in gold. [The above check shown.] I handed it to Mr. Smith. The affidavit was made next day. The check is hereby dated. I went to Mr. Smith and got the check in sterling exchange."

The affidavit of Lafayette Guyal was then read, as follows:

Lafayette Guyal, being duly sworn, says he is a bookkeeper in Canal Bank, and keeps the accounts of Hewitt, Norton & Co.; that he knows Sam. Smith & Co. presented for payment on the 23d April, 1862, Hewitt, Norton & Co.'s check for $36,700, payable in gold; that said Smith & Co. brought also into the bank Canal Bank notes and gold, and made a settlement with the cashier, and received a keg of gold in payment, said to contain $50,000; recollects the circumstances from having assisted at its delivery.

LAFAYETTE GUYAL.

Subscribed and sworn to before me this 14th June 1862.

D. F. MITCHELL,
Justice of the Peace.

And here the evidence closed. The views of Smith & Co. were then presented by Messrs. Barker and Rozier, and the views of the United States by Major General Butler.

Here the commission adjourned to meet Monday evening, June 17.

On Monday evening, June 17, the commission met, according to adjournment, and proceeded to the consideration of the case presented, and having heard the evidence on both sides, consisting of admitted facts, affidavits, books of S. Smith & Co., of a commercial character, and documents, and also listened to full argument on both sides of the cause, and having maturely deliberated upon the whole case, has rendered the following conclusions:

First. The admitted fact that Smith & Co. concealed $50,000 in gold coin at the time of the approach of the United States forces, and on being questioned as to the same, at first strenuously denied both its concealment and existence—facts that have not in any way been explained by Smith & Co. in the trial—tend to raise a violent presumption that these $50,000 may be the same which were sent by Mr. A. J. Guirot, treasurer, from the mint, and this presumption is by no means weakened by the singular occurrence in which Smith & Co. have left the affair of the other $50,000 in gold, which apparently was made up by Hewitt, Norton & Co.'s check on the Canal Bank for $36,700, and the remainder by the payment from Smith &

Co.'s own funds. In addition to this, the testimony of Staub, compared with that of C. Bell, brings the two transactions, if two they were, of the two kegs of specie upon the same day, or possibly consecutive days, and the whole of the testimony on Smith & Co.'s side so far would go to raise a presumption that the $50,000 lot of gold seized by the United States is the same that Guirot sent silver for from the mint, and if it stood uncontradicted, the commission would feel bound to declare that there was reasonable ground for holding it as being the same.

But the commission has before it, on the other hand, the positive testimony of Esnard and Booth, whose affidavits have been allowed to go in without affording the commission the benefit of a  viva voce  examination, and the witnesses swear positively that the keg of gold promised to Guirot was actually taken away by Guirot's agents from Smith & Co.'s banking house. This positive testimony the commission feels bound to regard as outweighing all the suspicious circumstances which tend to show identity, and therefore determines that there is no reasonable cause to believe that the specie and property seized by the United States in the banking house of Samuel Smith & Co. is the property of the confederate States or of any department or office thereof. Having come to this conclusion, from the evidence upon the question of the identity of gold seized and that destined for Guirot in exchange for the silver he sent from the mint, the commission has heard no evidence going to show that the said specie and other property has been used in any way to aid the confederate States or any officer thereof, in concealing any property of the confederate States.

Having thus disposed of the first and second points, the commission now proceeds to the last, to inquire whether said Smith & Co. have in any way so acted in behalf of this rebellion as ought to cause the further detention of said specie and other property for hearing before the Department in Washington. It was in evidence before the commission, by the testimony of Rathbone, president of the New Orleans Canal and Banking Company, that Samuel Smith had informed him on or about the 23d of April that inasmuch as the bank was drained of silver coin, and needed a large amount to pay off its bill-holders, $50,000 could be procured from him by Guirot, the treasurer of the mint, for a like sum in gold, and that Guirot had informed him he wished to change the silver for gold, in order that he could more conveniently carry it off. This conversation with Rathbone in the view taken by the commission, fixes upon Smith a knowledge of the design entertained by Guirot of withdrawing the money in the mint from the reach of the United States, and shows further that Smith, being a director of the bank, by making with it the arrangement on behalf of Guirot, directly aided the latter in carrying off the funds of the mint, and so assisted in thwarting the military operations of the United States. Whether any or what penalty is now, or will be by law, attached to such conduct, the commission do not know. They think that under no circumstances can it possibly exceed the amount which Guirot was assisted to carry away, and therefore that all specie or other property seized beyond the $50,000 in gold should be released, and that with regard to such surplus there is no cause for further detention. With regard to the $50,000, the commission thinks there is ground for detention until the proper Department at Washington can be heard from.

G. F. SHEPLEY,
THOMAS DURANT,
W. NEWTON MERCER.

The undersigned having by their judgment done all that by the strict requirements of law they felt themselves bound to perform, would now beg leave most respectfully to submit that in their opinion as citizens and men, in consideration of the penance Mr. Smith has already undergone, it seems proper to them to suggest to General Butler that in the exercise of his discretion, he should, in laying this matter before the proper Department at Washington, recommend as advisable a lenient course, looking toward a restoration of the money, in case such action should not be inconsistent with law, or such other form of recommendation as the general might think proper.

G. F. SHEPLEY,
THOMAS J. DURANT,
W. NEWTON MERCER.

Major General BUTLER,
Commanding Department of the Gulf.

Mr. BOUTWELL. It will be borne in mind, Mr. Speaker, that this award was made and submitted to Major General Butler on the 17th day of June, 1862. The gentleman from New York, when questioned yesterday by my colleague [Mr. Goocn] as to whether General Butler had made any report to the Department in reference to this $50,000 in gold, said that no report had been made until the suit was threatened. It will appear from the documents which I shall have the honor to submit that the first letter from the attorney of Smith to General Butler was dated February 29, 1864. I have before me, and I shall ask the Clerk to read, a communication from General Butler to the Secretary of the Treasury, dated the 2d of July, 1862, at his headquarters in New Orleans, fifteen days after this award was made. The gentleman from New York, who comes here to arraign a man who has sacrificed the comforts of home, a lucrative profession, the esteem of his friends, his standing in the community, and exposed himself to the perils of war, and has done service in the cause of the country, while we—I do not say the gentleman from New York alone—while we sluggards have done nothing; the gentleman from New York, who comes here to arraign such a man, does not even take the pains to inquire whether the statements which he makes are false or true.

The Clerk read, as follows:

HEADQUARTERS DEPARTMENT OF THE GULF,
NEW ORLEANS, July 2, 1862.

STR: Will be found inclosed herewith minutes of the doings of a commission to inquire into the seizure of the specie of Samuel Smith & Co.

The finding is that the case should be sent to the Department for investigation. I should have sent the specie ($50,000) to you, but this remarkable state of things exists: two paymasters came down here with $385,000, too little money to pay the troops of the department, some of whom have not been paid for six months, and they and their families are suffering for their just dues, which, from the inefficiency of the pay department in not making proper requisitions, has not been furnished them. I shall therefore appropriate this $50,000 toward the payment of the troops left unpaid, one of which is a western regiment not paid since December, and a Maine one not paid since October. I shall borrow of one of the banks here $50,000 more in gold (I cannot get Treasury notes) upon my own order and pledging the faith of the Government. This I have promised shall be refunded in gold in sixty days, with interest at the rate of six per cent. per annum, and trust that pledge will be made good, as I shall have to suffer the loss. I shall also obtain of Adams & Co. here $50,000 in Treasury notes, or thereabout, and by leaving the allotments unpaid here, but to be paid in New York, I shall be able to have the payment completed. But this only pays the March payment, leaving two months still due. May I ask, therefore, that my draft of $—, in favor of Adams & Co. be honored, and a future draft, not exceeding in all $50,000, be honored at sight, so that Adams & Co. can send forward the remittances to the soldiers' wives which have been used here to pay others, and that $50,000 in gold be sent me to repay that which I have borrowed? I could not let my soldiers go longer unpaid. It was injuring the credit of the Government with our foes, and breeding sickness and discontent among my men.

Trusting that this action will meet approval in the emergency, I am most truly yours,

B. F. BUTLER,
Major General Commanding.

Hon. SALMON P. CHASE, Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I may state, Mr. Speaker, that this $50,000 in gold was taken by General Butler at a time when there was no considerable difference between gold and paper. In the exigency which existed he loaned it to the paymasters of New Orleans. When they received funds from the Government it was returned to him; and it was twice used in that way for the purpose of relieving the claims of the soldiers upon the Government; and it was finally left in the hands of General Butler.

I ask now that a memorandum which accompanied General Butler's account to the War Department, which was in February following, shall also be read to the House.

The Clerk read, as follows:

Memorandum to accompany the Accounts filed in the War Department.

In the matter of the item of $50,855 taken from Samuel Smith & Co., bankers.

This money was seized from Smith & Co. upon the belief that it was either the identical money taken from the United States mint by the rebel superintendent, or else gold exchanged by him for silver, which was paid out by the Canal Bank after the fleet passed the forts, and by Smith concealed by being bricked up in the rear of the vaults of his banking house. By agreement with Mr. Smith, the questions of this seizure were submitted to a commission of Governor Shepley, Dr. Mercer, president of the Louisiana Bank, and Thomas J. Durant, Esq., a leading lawyer of New Orleans. A protracted hearing was had, and full examination of evidence by counsel in behalf of the claimants, and report made that all but two kegs, containing $50,000, be returned to Smith & Co., which was done; but as to the $50,000, that should be held by the United States, subject to the disposal of the Government at Washington. This report was forwarded to the Secretary of the Treasury (see my letter inclosing same). In the absence of funds to pay the troops, some of whom had been six months without pay, upon the decision of the commission, this, with other moneys, were turned over to the paymaster, Major Hewitt, to pay the troops, and his receipt taken. When the money came for payment of the troops, and is now held for the use of the United States, Smith & Co. are both active rebels, and have returned to their allegiance. They have threatened to hold the general making the seizure personally responsible for this amount, and he only desires such order may be made as will, if the United States receive the money, relieve him from personal responsibility.

All of which is respectfully submitted.

BENJ. F. BUTLER.

WASHINGTON, D. C., February 11, 1863.

Mr. BOUTWELL. If I were to stop here, Mr. Speaker, the charge of robbery made by the gentleman from New York would have failed entirely. Within fifteen days after the award of the commissioners, as appears from incontrovertible testimony, the circumstances were reported to the Treasury Department and subsequently were made known to the War Department. The suggestion was made by the general that if the War Department would relieve him from personal responsibility the money would be placed in the hands of the Government; and it will appear from the testimony which is to be herewith submitted that the War Department refused to relieve General Butler or receive the money; and he has been compelled from that day to this to keep it, in order that he might save himself from personal responsibility either to the Government or to Samuel Smith.

I now present and ask the Clerk to read the correspondence between Mr. Pierrepont, counsel of Mr. Smith, and General Butler.

The Clerk read, as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, February 29, 1864.

DEAR SIR: Samuel Smith, of Saratoga county, New York, formerly private banker in New Orleans, has a claim for $50,000 in gold used by General Butler in 1862 for payment of his troops in New Orleans. I write this in the Treasury Department with the letter of General Butler to the Secretary before me; it is dated July 2, 1862. It was supposed by the Secretary that as the letter of General Butler stated that the money was used to pay the troops, that the credit for that $50,000 would be found in Paymaster General's or Auditor's office. I have this day been over the accounts with the clerks, and no mention of the money appears. Will you do me the favor to say to what paymaster this money was given, and in what accounts this $50,000 should appear? I am the counsel of Mr. Smith, and the Paymaster General suggests this as the quickest way to learn what paymaster had the money. Your letter of July 2, 1862, only states the fact that the money was paid to your troops without naming this, what paymaster.

The accounts of Hewitt, Sherman, Locke, and Usher, have all been examined, and we find no account of it. Will you do me the favor to reply to this at my residence, 103 Fifth avenue, New York city, and much oblige, Yours, very respectfully,

EDWARDS PIERREPONT.

Major General BUTLER.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, March 3, 1864.

GENERAL: When I had the honor to address you on the 29th ultimo, I was not as well advised as now. As counsel for Samuel Smith & Co., whose $50,000 in gold was taken in New Orleans, and which matter you had referred to the Treasury, together with all the papers, I have had case examined, and have produced Mr. Smith and had his deposition with others taken here and filed. I had reached the point when I had supposed the money would be paid over, and the Secretary undertook to find to what credit it stood, and not being able to find out, at the suggestion of the Paymaster General, I wrote to you.

Now I have just learned from the Secretary of War more about the matter. Will you do me the favor to inform me who has the money, and to whom, in your judgment, I ought to look for it, and to whom it rightfully belongs?

I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

EDWARDS PIERREPONT.

16 Wall Street, New York.

Major General BUTLER.

16 WALL STREET, NEW YORK, March 15, 1864.

GENERAL: Two weeks ago this day I wrote from Washington to learn where the $50,000 in gold taken from Samuel Smith & Co., New Orleans, now is. I wrote with yours of July 2, 1862, directed to the Secretary of the Treasury before me, in which you speak of this gold; the letter is now on file with the report of Governor Shepley and others. I am Samuel Smith's counsel. Will you do me the favor to say what was the disposition of Mr. Smith's gold, where it is, and to whom, in your judgment, it rightfully belongs?

I also addressed you a second letter on the same subject. As I have no reply from either, I fear that you may not have received them.

To avoid accident I will send this in duplicate, and very respectfully await your reply.

Ever your obedient,

EDWARDS PIERREPONT,

Counsel for Samuel Smith.

Major General BUTLER.

HEADQ'RS DEP'T VIRGINIA AND NORTH CAROLINA,
FORT MONROE, March 21, 1864.

EDWARDS PIERREPONT, Esq.:

I am in receipt of your letter in regard to the money alleged to be of Samuel Smith & Co., bankers, at New Orleans, up to the time of the capture of that city by the United States forces. As you are aware, I am in the field and have, therefore, no books or papers with me relating to former transactions, and was obliged to wait until I had examined some memoranda before I could make as full an answer as I could wish. This must be my apology for the delay in answering your letters. I am now without dates and amounts, but the facts and the order of sequence I am quite sure will be without mistake.

The case of Smith & Co. was as follows: within a few days after my arrival in New Orleans I received information that the director of the United States mint, before the appearance of the United States fleet, had fled up the Red river with Governor T. O. Moore and a portion of the mint and some of the New Orleans banks. That he had deposited with Samuel Smith & Co., bankers, whose place of business was next door to the Canal Bank and banking house, $50,000 of the specie which belonged to the United States. Upon further examination, it appears that the mint director, finding the silver bulky to carry away, had placed a large sum with Smith & Co., who had loaned it, or a portion of it, to the Canal Bank, which during some days just before the taking of the city of New Orleans had been redeeming its circulation in specie. That this silver had been paid out by the bank to its customers and bill-holders. That Samuel Smith & Company had received for specie $50,000 in gold in two kegs, either from the director or bank, which being simply in exchange for the money of the United States, was, of course, the property of the United States, Smith & Co. having this idea of concealing the stolen specie of the United States. Thereupon I caused Samuel Smith & Co. to be brought before me for examination, and in the most solemn manner they denied as well the exchange of the silver as the possession of the gold or silver; knew not where there was any concealed or conveyed away; owned that their books would show that they had no gold of any amount. I ordered their books and papers to be seized and examined. Finding upon their books, which had been altered and erased for the occasion, that the firm had a quantity of gold, although by no means the amount of $50,000, and feeling sure of my information, I ordered Smith to be sent to Fort Jackson. Smith thereupon confessed that the whole story, therefore, had been a lie, and that he had bricked up, in the air space between his safe and the wall of his counting house, a large amount of gold and silver. Upon sending there, we found the two kegs of $25,000 each we were in search of, and some bags of gold and silver, amounting to some fourteen or seventeen thousand dollars more, some of which corresponded with some of the entries on Smith & Co.'s books. I thereupon seized the specie and held it for the use of the Government.

Afterward, Mr. Jacob Barker applied to me for a hearing upon the question of property and whether there was probable cause for holding this gold as the property of the United States. I appointed a commission consisting of General Shepley, military governor, Dr. Mercer, president of the Bank of Louisiana, and Thomas J. Durant, (I believe), an eminent lawyer of New Orleans, to adjudicate and determine these questions. A full hearing was had, witnesses were examined, books produced and examined, and counsel heard in arguments. I remember the president of the Canal Bank was examined and made a very lame explanation of how Mr. Smith got this money out of his bank and of the way he borrowed silver of the mint. Smith's brother was also examined, who gave a still more lame account of the alteration of the books, and why there appeared in the cash account about that time so many thousand dollars' worth of lead, and on the next page, so many thousand dollars' worth of "Tin." Suffice it to say that after a laborious examination the board reported that the fourteen or seventeen thousand dollars of specie was the property of Smith & Co., and should be given up to them, and that there was cause for holding the two kegs of $25,000 each. This report with the accompanying documents was thereupon forwarded to the Treasury Department at Washington. All the smaller sums of fourteen thousand dollars or so, and papers were returned immediately to Smith & Co., with the exception of about thirteen hundred dollars, about which a dispute arose between Smith & Co. and my officers, they avowing that they had never received the amount, while Smith claimed that they had.

Afterward, before I left New Orleans, in order that there might be no just cause to suspect the integrity of my officers, I paid Mr. Barker (Smith's counsel) the sum in dispute, and took his receipt. In the mean time my troops had remained unpaid for more than six months, and, although repeated requisitions had been made on the Treasury, still the money had not been transmitted. Believing that this gold belonged to the United States, as I now believe, and there being no difference at that date between gold and Treasury notes in New Orleans, and but little anywhere, for reasons stated in my reports to the Treasury I turned over this gold from time to time to my paymasters, to be paid out to the troops, and it was done; and when afterwards they got funds they repaid me, and, indeed, I believe it was advanced to them and returned more than once. The reasons why, probably, you cannot find that gold, "ex nomine," in the accounts of Majors Hewitt and Usher, was that no difference was made in paying the troops between that and Treasury notes, and therefore, receiving it, and returning it when they had funds, there would be no appearance of it.

You will find, therefore, in my accounts settled at the War Office, that I have charged myself with that amount of $50,000, and made myself responsible to the Government for it in a final settlement of my account, taking care that any supposed rights of Smith & Co. should be preserved by a written statement filed with the accounts in the War Office as well as my report to the Treasury. In the usual case of a disputed claim I should hardly have felt myself called upon to answer to the counsel of one party, to have given so full a statement of facts; but having taken this money as an executive officer of the Government, I have felt it my duty to make full expositions of all the facts so far as they have come to my knowledge and are now within my recollection. I may, however, be permitted to add a single fact, which will perhaps be no information to their counsel, that the two brothers, Smith & Co., were both bitter, active, and unrepenting rebels, who refused to take the oath of allegiance so long as I remained in New Orleans, and one or both, I believe, went to Canada to reside. If you should desire any other questions answered in this regard, you have only to propose them, and if you will give me opportunity to go to books and papers, I have no doubt but I can give you sums and dates.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

B. F. BUTLER,

Major General Commanding.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Following that letter was another from Mr. Pierrepont, which I ask the Clerk to read, as well as the answer of Major General B. F. Butler.

The Clerk read, as follows:

16 WALL STREET, NEW YORK, March 26, 1864.

MY DEAR GENERAL: I am very truly obliged by your satisfactory letter received this hour. It fully explains the delay by which I have been a little annoyed. Pardon this suggestion; why not pass over the money to the War Office or to the Treasury, and leave me to such remedy there as the Government may think fit?

They now say the money is not in their hands. Please let me hear upon this.

Very truly yours,

EDWARDS PIERREPONT.

Major General BUTLER.

HEADQ'RS DEP'T VIRGINIA AND NORTH CAROLINA,
FORT MONROE, March 28, 1864.

DEAR SIR: Your note of the 23rd instant is received, and I am glad to be able to answer it speedily. I am much obliged for your suggestions. When I settled my accounts at the War Office, the question of what shall be done with this money of Samuel Smith & Co. came under discussion, and I then said to the Secretary of War, that as a lawyer I supposed that I might be held personally for the sum, and that if he would give me an order to pay over the money to the War Office in such form to release me from responsibility if hereafter called upon by Smith & Co., I should be glad to pay the money over. He doubted whether this could be done, and suggested the money might lie in my hands until the Department was called upon for it, and that a proper memorandum should be put on file, so that Smith & Co.'s rights, if they had any, should be preserved as well as my own. There is no difficulty in dealing with the money now in the same way.

If the War Department directs an order to me to pay the money either into the Treasury or contingent fund of the Department, and Smith & Co., acting under your advice, will give me a memorandum stating that such payment shall relieve me from personal responsibility, I will give a draft for the amount on the Assistant Treasurer of the United States that will be honored at once.

I think it but right, however, that my first letter to you stating the facts of the capture of the money should be laid before the War Department for its information before any order is made on the subject, transferring the funds to Smith & Co.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

BENJ. F. BUTLER,

Major General Commanding.

Hon. EDWARDS PIERREPONT, New York.

P. S. Since writing the above note I have received from my clerk a copy of the memorandum filed at the War Office at the time of the settlement of my accounts of which I have.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I ask that some further correspondence be read.

The Clerk read, as follows:

16 WALL STREET, NEW YORK, April 1, 1864.

MY DEAR GENERAL: I am very glad to receive your letter of the 28th of March. I am not one of your enemies. That matter will now be adjusted, and I will write you some statement of facts of which it is evident you are not apprised. Immediately after the seizure of the gold Smith came here; he was born in Saratoga county, where his mother now lives, and he has been with her here, and in Washington, most of the time since.

He employed Senator Reverdy Johnson and myself as his counsel; as the younger man I have been the more active. The report of the commissioners which you appointed clearly established beyond all controversy that the gold belonged to Smith. The commissioners so report; and the evidence returned with the report abundantly established the conclusion.

These papers, with your letter of July 2, 1862, are now in the Treasury Department, and I have complete copies of them all. I took Mr. Smith to Washington, and his deposition was taken at great length and is now on file with the other papers. Mr. Smith is a Yankee, born of a Yankee, bred a Yankee, has taken the oath of allegiance, and is as true and loyal as you or I. He has not been in Canada at all; he tried in the fright and terror which prevailed in New Orleans to save his property in part. Dr. Mercer, who acted on the commission, is now here. I am truly glad that this matter is about to be adjusted. Not every one who has been in the case has the same desire to have it quickly settled as I have. My own view about the case is this: I think it quite clear that you could not successfully resist a suit in New York brought by Smith to recover whatever damages he can prove. I think the true way to settle it is for you to pay Smith and take a release, with the assent of the War Department. If you agree with me I will see that it is done in such way as you shall see is liberal and just. I await your reply.

Ever truly yours,

EDWARDS PIERREPONT.

Major General BUTLER.

April 4, 1864.

MY DEAR SIR: I can only repeat my offer that whenever the War Department will order the money paid over to your client, and he shall give me a release, my draft for the amount will be forwarded. I am glad to hear that Mr. Smith is loyal. His conversion I trust is sincere. For yourself, I thank you for your expressions of kindness and confidence, and while they are very gratifying indeed to one who has been so much maligned as I have been, yet you will see in this transaction I have so lived as to defy my enemies. Allow me, my dear sir, further to say "Ex uno disce omnes." For a while you will confess to yourself that you doubted my action in this business. I am as willing that every act of my official life shall be as thoroughly investigated as this may be. Therefore you will see that while I am obliged for the friendly feeling which prompted you to desire this case "quickly settled," still if those who desired otherwise had had their way I should have been as well pleased, because conscious of having endeavored to do my duty. An attack upon me in this case would have failed, and thus answered a thousand others to which no reply can ever be otherwise made. Upon the point of law which you suggest, pardon me if I differ from a lawyer so distinguished as yourself. I do not believe that a military commander in a captured city, taking money (contraband of war) which might be used against that officer's army, from an alien enemy, can be held liable for the capture as a trespasser for the tort in not returning upon demand which might sustain trover after the enemy became a friend and incapacitated to sue. I am inclined to think that having paid the money to his Government would answer the demand. It was to avoid this after-question, however, (I had no doubt on the first,) that I hesitated to pay the money to the Government. Still I am rusty at the law, and my opinions are not now, if they ever were, worth much.

Yours, truly, B. F. BUTLER.

16 WALL STREET, October 26, 1864.

MY DEAR SIR: You leave Mr. Smith no alternative but to commence an action. It is not necessary there be any publications in the papers if you will authorize any attorney to appear for you, but otherwise it is necessary.

I do not wish any publication unless you wish it. Please let me know your attorney at once, if you have one here. Truly, EDWARDS PIERREPONT.

Major General BUTLER.

HEADQUARTERS NEAR VARINA, October 28, 1864.

MY DEAR SIR: Your note inclosing the summons and complaint in the case of Mr. Smith and Brother was received last evening in the field. I hasten to answer.

Although not a resident of New York or amenable to the jurisdiction of her courts, so that a summons could hardly bring me in, yet I shall at once acknowledge service and instruct my attorney, John A. Hackett, Esq., to make answer. Having done this, I shall rely on your courtesy to allow me a little time to go to Washington to make the following disposition of the cause. When you desired me to assent to a friendly suit I could make no answer to the proposition, because as an official I could do nothing in any way to compromise the rights of the United States. Now, however, your proceeding in institum leaves me in a different situation, because although I am acknowledging service, still as I must come to New York and can hardly travel incog, you could obtain service, and therefore without prejudice a suit may be considered fairly begun.

I will now apply to the War Department, and ask the Government to assume the defense; if that is done, then I have no further interest in the matter; if not, then I am at liberty to arrange with your client, or contest the suit as I choose, and am left free to negotiate about a matter in which I can have no personal interest except to save myself from cost. So soon, therefore, as I can get away, which I hope to be in a few days, I will make answer, or will meet you as you prefer, and be able to state exactly my position on this subject. Of course, the suit, if it goes forward, will be removed into the courts of the United States. You will not need to be told that these suggestions do not proceed from any desire to delay your clients; but, in fact, to further their interests, if they have any. You will please answer me at once whether this course will meet your concurrence.

As to publication, I beg leave to repeat to you that I can have no objection to any person knowing every fact connected with this transaction. The most exaggerated stories have been told about it privately, from which I am suffering; but what can I do about it that I have not done? Respectfully, BENJ. F. BUTLER, Major General.

Hon. EDWARDS PIERREPONT, Counselor at Law, 16 Wall Street.

16 WALL STREET, November 2, 1864.

MY DEAR GENERAL: Yours received, and satisfactory. You have been a general since you were a lawyer, and when you speak of jurisdiction I think you have not read our recent statute.

We have a way to get jurisdiction not like old way; but that is no matter. I will show you when we meet. Your proposition is satisfactory, and I shall confer with your attorney.

I send you my speech.

Yours, EDWARDS PIERREPONT.

Major General BUTLER.

MR. BOUTWELL. Mr. Speaker, the last letter indicates that General Butler was about to apply to the War Department for leave to pay over the money, and that the Department should assume the responsibility of the defense. I now lay before the House his letter to the Solicitor of the War Department and the reply of the War Department, which will close the papers on this branch of the case.

The Clerk read, as follows:

HEADQUARTERS DEPT. VIRGINIA AND NORTH CAROLINA, FORTRESS MONROE, VA., November 28, 1864.

MY DEAR WHITING: I inclose herewith to you a note to the Secretary of War, in relation to the matter of Samuel Smith & Co., bankers, of New Orleans.

I think it a clear case for a test question, and hope the Government will defend it. Please bring the paper to the notice of the Secretary, and get his permission to allow me to publish the note in my own justification.

Although somewhat thick skinned to newspaper attacks, yet some of my good and true friends are writing me that I ought to explain the facts, and I know no better way to do so than by such publication.

If I may rely, upon those friendly relations which exist between us, upon you to procure this to be done, you will add another to the many obligations under which I am to yourself.

By the by, why do you not come to the "front" and see how war is actually carried on? I will give you a "plate and a blanket."

Yours, truly, BENJ. F. BUTLER, Major General.

Hon. WILLIAM WHITING, Solicitor of the War Department.

WAR DEPARTMENT, WASHINGTON CITY, December 6, 1864.

GENERAL: I am instructed by the Secretary of War to inform you—

First. That your communication dated at Fortress Monroe, November 28, and addressed to him in relation to the claim of Samuel Smith & Co. against you, was referred to the Judge Advocate General for opinion and report on the question of indemnity you ask for.

Upon that reference, the Judge Advocate General reports:

"The question of indemnification cannot be determined at this stage of the proceedings. Should there be a judgment against the applicant his rights to be indemnified against it will depend upon the character of his conduct, considered in all its bearings, which has given rise to the suit. This will be best understood when examined in the light of the testimony which will be produced on the trial. If the applicant acted within the scope of his powers, fairly interpreted, his claims to protection against the results of this suit should be allowed. The fact that he has retained the gold seized and now holds it, subject to the order of the Government, is not considered as affecting the right or obligations involved."

This report is approved, and will govern the action of the Department upon your request for indemnity.

Second. In relation to your request for leave to publish your letter to the Secretary of War, the Secretary directs me to say that no objection is made by the Department to your publication of any statement in regard to the claim of Smith & Co. which you may deem essential for your vindication.

Third. In reference to the information given by you to the Department, a copy of your memorandum in relation to the gold of Smith & Co., seized by you, filed with your accounts and vouchers in the War Department, is hereto annexed.

I am, general, very respectfully, your obedient servant, E. D. TOWNSEND, Assistant Adjutant General.

Major General B. F. BUTLER, Commanding Department of Virginia and North Carolina, City Point, Virginia.

MR. BOUTWELL. Mr. Speaker, this closes the documentary evidence I have to submit to the House in regard to the charge made by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. Brooks.] As far as I can judge of the weight of evidence, it is conclusive in its refutation of this statement made by him.

In the first place, there is no element of the crime of robbery in this transaction from the beginning to the end. The seizure was made by a public officer, a military commander, in pursuance of what he believed then to be his duty, and what I believe a jury of his countrymen anywhere, on the evidence, would find to have been his duty under the circumstances in which he was placed. He submitted the whole question of the right of property, as far as it could be submitted, to a military commission, and he followed the decree, or award made by that commission, and within fifteen days reported the facts to the Government, and from that day to this he has always been ready and responsible. He has again and again solicited the Department to take the money and assume the responsibility—either to take it as belonging to the Government, or pay it over to Samuel Smith & Co., and relieve him.

I am not here as the defender of General Butler. He has no claim upon me, and I have no obligation toward him, except what I owe to my countrymen whenever and wherever applying for justice. Believing, also, that wherever the slander is made, there, if possible, in that place, it should be exposed, I have volunteered so far as to submit this evidence in this particular case. And I say, further, while I have no information in regard to any other transaction of General Butler, I believe, whenever the issue is made with him in reference to any transaction of his, he will be as clearly triumphant over his enemies as in this day and this place I believe him now to be.

I ask the Clerk to read an extract from the speech of the gentleman from New York; and then I will submit to him the question I indicated at the beginning of my remarks.

The Clerk read, as follows:

"I am bound to say that an effort was made by the Federal Government during the pendency of the late presidential election to control the city of New York by sending there a bold robber, in the person of a major general of the United States. Robber as he was of the public Treasury, and major general of the United States as he was, he dared not exercise the power given to him to attempt to control the actions of those whom the gentleman calls thieves and robbers in his own city."

True copy: H. C. CLARKE, Captain and A. D. C.

MR. BOUTWELL. Now, Mr. Speaker, I ask the gentleman from New York whether from the evidence which has been submitted to this House, and in view of all the circumstances in the case, he reaffirms the extract which has been read from the Clerk's desk, or retracts it? I yield for a reply.

MR. BROOKS. Has the gentleman concluded his remarks?

MR. BOUTWELL. I have not.

MR. BROOKS. Whenever the gentleman concludes I shall be happy to make reply. The introduction of his remarks shows that he is not entitled to courtesy. He spoke of me as in sympathy with the secessionists. At the conclusion of the gentleman's remarks, and finding what he has to say, I shall be ready to reply.

MR. BOUTWELL. I understand, then, that the gentleman is neither prepared at this moment to reaffirm the statement made in that speech, nor to retract it. On this evidence, conclusive as to the falsity of the charge, the gentleman from New York stands silent, and will neither reaffirm the declaration that he has made to this House and to the country, that Major General Butler of the Army is a gold robber, nor will he, upon this evidence, retract it. Has it make no impression upon him? Does he not comprehend it? Does he yet persist in allowing that declaration made in his speech to stand upon the record? If he has a name to live, does not the dread of posterity inspire him to do justice to a servant of the country? Is he still silent? Has he no voice to reaffirm what he has declared, or is he yet destitute, shall I say of manliness, to admit that he was mistaken?

I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Stevens] whatever may remain of the time allotted to me.

MR. STEVENS. I presume the gentleman from New York [Mr. Brooks] desires to be heard, and as I intend, when I finish my remarks, to move to lay the appeal upon the table, I will conclude my remarks after the gentleman from New York shall have finished.

MR. BROOKS. I prefer that the gentleman shall conclude his remarks.

MR. STEVENS. As those remarks will depend much upon the course taken by the gentleman from New York I will take my chance to obtain the floor again.

MR. BROOKS took the floor.

MR. JOHNSON, of Pennsylvania. I rise to a question of order. Yesterday, sir, the privilege of a gentleman was suspended because of some supposed intimidation toward a member of this House. The Halls of this House have been very largely crowded with faces strange to me, and they may be strange to others. I ask that the rule which excludes persons who have not the privileges of the floor be enforced.

THE SPEAKER. As the Chair is requested to enforce the rule, all persons not allowed to remain by the rules of the House will retire, and the Doorkeeper will enforce the rules.

Proceedings were suspended for a few moments while the Hall was being cleared of persons not entitled to the floor.

MR. JOHNSON, of Pennsylvania. I understand that many gentlemen have not retired from the Hall, but only into the cloak room. I ask that the rule may be enforced.

THE SPEAKER. It has been decided repeatedly, upon appeal, that the doors of the cloak room are the bar of the House, and therefore persons outside of those doors are outside of the House.

MR. BROOKS. I am not surprised that when, in the discharge of a high public duty, I assailed a series of corruptions, I am met with the spirit with which I have been met by the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. Stevens,] and the not less honorable gentleman from the State of Massachusetts [Mr. Boutwell] who represents the district from which Major General Butler comes. The honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania, in a speech last night, chose to use adjectives which, if not unbecoming his dignity, his age, and his position, at least are unbecoming the dignity of this House, for he used adjectives like these: "vindictive," "malignant," "outrageous," "indecent," nouns like these: "filth," "slanders," verbs like this: "skulk." And when two thirds of this House yesterday voted me the privilege to go on, the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania rose and lectured the other side—no, not the other side; on this question there is no other side; neither side wishes to see the property of this country plundered or the enemy fed and supplied by men in the conduct of our own armies; on these things there is but one side—I say he lectured his own people in a style like this:

"I am only sorry the names of those who gave that privilege are not upon the record that the country might see and point at them with scorn."

Talk of plantation manners! [Referring to Mr. BOUTWELL's remarks.] There is no overseer in Alabama or in South Carolina who would talk to the negroes on his plantation in a style like that which the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania addressed to the Republican members yesterday on the floor of this House. He treated the Republican party as his plantation, and a negro plantation! Members of that party must be considered by him as serfs or slaves to endure a lecture like that from the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania. Toward them he would point the finger of scorn; and of them he required a record, in order that the country might point at them the finger of scorn. Plantation manners all this; nothing but plantation manners! For thirty years I have been on or about the floor of this House, and no overseer of a plantation in South Carolina or Georgia ever seated here did I ever hear address white men as the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania addressed his white men yesterday upon this floor.

"Sir," asked he, "how can it be possible that a man could be brought to sustain such a motion, with a notice of what would follow, unless it were to gratify an appetite which loves the filthiest garbage which is thrown forth from the foulest stomach by malignant hate?"

I know not what vocabulary that gentleman had been studying; I know not in what school he has been taught during his vacation. Certainly not in that classic place to which another honorable gentleman referred the other day, the Five Points of New York; for they do not, nor will they, use any such language as that which the honorable gentleman introduced into this debate yesterday, and applied to the Representatives of this House.

There are three gates in London somewhat renowned and peculiar for their style of literature: Newgate, the gate of the prison; Cripple-gate, the gate of the cripples; and Billingsgate, the gate of the fishwomen; and the gentleman from Pennsylvania must have studied his vocabulary in all the three—Newgate, Cripple-gate, and Billingsgate—before he came here yesterday to lecture his party in this House. [Great laughter.] Sir, there are certain fountains which run out in the progress of time, and when they do run out they flow with nothing but with mud and with "garbage," and there are certain persons "Who chew on wisdom past,

And totter on and blunder to the last."

[Laughter.]

Sir, such language as the gentleman used is not decorous nor proper to be applied, I will not say to me, but to any member or to any portion of the members of the House of Representatives. It is not argument, it is not logic, it is not retort; it hardly rises even to the dignity of parliamentary blackguardism.

The honorable gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BOUTWELL] in the discharge of his duty as the Representative of Major General Butler—and it may be due to him to say that it was perhaps the discharge of a necessary duty—chose to connect me with secessionists, or to describe me as one whose sympathy with secessionists prompted and inspired the remarks which I made respecting Major General Butler upon the floor of this House. I challenge the record of the past with the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts from the beginning of his career and of mine. At no time, now, during the war, or before it, have I ever been allied in any manner with those who are disloyal or unfaithful to the Constitution of my country, or to the flag, the stars and stripes, of that country. I have never been allied with those who thought that the Constitution was a compact with hell. I never have been connected with those who desired a new Constitution or a new Bible, for I have been content with the Constitution as it came down to us from our fathers, and the Bible as it was expounded by our fathers.

Sir, the disunionists and secessionists, if not now, who have been hitherto on the floor of this House and elsewhere, are those who inspired the causes which led to this war, not alone in the southern but in the northern country; those who created a riot in the city of Boston because they would violate or not enforce the law surrendering fugitive slaves; those who trod down the United States marshal in the execution of that law; those who furnished John Brown with pikes to invade the State of Virginia, and to drive those pikes into the hearts of the innocent women and children of Virginia; those are the oldest secessionists, the preliminary rebels of this war.

No record of mine, no document, no speech, no expression of mine here or elsewhere, ever connected me with the rebels of this country. From the moment the gun was fired at Fort Sumter, I had no heart or sympathy with them. They were my enemies then as they are now. Yet the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts has chosen to say that if an aid-de-camp of some general not dressed in Army blue, but with the gray armor of the rebels, had approached me, I should have been less concerned than when an aid-de-camp of General Butler invaded my room. But that is only rhetoric, perhaps. It is worse, however, it is slander; and it is as unjust as it is slanderous. It comes certainly with an ill grace from Massachusetts, with the records of rebellion that that State has, and with the antecedent record that he himself has. And what is the record of his client and constituent in this case? No man, Mr. Speaker, did more, or, I might say, as much, to excite and arouse the feelings of this country, and to bring about that hostility which led to the clash of arms as Major General Butler. Belonging to the Democratic party, and the most ultra of that party, he was ever first and foremost in stimulating and encouraging that hostility and invective which would lead to excitement and to war, and whenever the Democratic party was disposed to compromise or make concessions in any way which would lead to pacification, he was the last of all to yield, and the first and foremost to bring about that collision of opinion which would lead to this clash of arms. And yet I, who am of the school of Clay, and of Massachusetts's own Webster, trained in obedience to the Constitution and laws, never even responsible for any of the errors of the Democratic party, hardly connected with that party except so far as it chose to honor me here with its sympathy and its votes, elected here upon the floor of this House in opposition to the machinery of that party; I am denounced by the Representative of this General Butler as a man more disposed to welcome a rebel uniform of gray than the blue uniform of a soldier of the United States!

Sir, in the Charleston convention, which led to the rupture of the Democratic party and the election of Lincoln, if Butler himself had been the paid agent of Jeff. Davis and of the conspirators to destroy this Union, he could not have acted a more efficient or a more fatal part in sundering and dividing that party and bringing about this collision than he did as a delegate from Massachusetts to that convention. I never voted in my life for Jefferson Davis, while Major General Butler voted fifty-seven times in the Charleston convention for this same Jefferson Davis, to make him President of the United States. Compare my record, then, with his. Compare my past with his. A sagacious man, like General Butler, a man of talent and power and capacity, must have known very well, while he was thus acting in the Charleston convention, where all that action would lead; that it would lead to a disruption of the party of the Democracy, and in that disruption to a triumph of the Republican party. This agent, this colleague, this associate of Jefferson Davis, in a letter addressed to the Speaker of this House—turning up now this day for the first time from his letter book, after his letter to me had been delivered for days—calls me a calumniator, and urges this House to exercise its power in order to drive me from my seat on this floor home to my constituents. Calumniator! No man is capable of uttering words more calumnious than Major General Butler. No man oftener or better selects his subjects when he inflicts these calumnies—safe subjects, such as ministers of the gospel, women and children, or often persons subject to his absolute control; and yet he denounces others as calumniators, and me among them, as calumniating him. Sir, no calumny can ever be used which would quite describe the life and history of this Major General Butler.

The honorable gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BOUTWELL] spoke, and so did the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS,] of the services which General Butler has rendered to his country. Sir, he has done no more than I have done. We both have shed large quantities of ink for our country, but upon the whole I think I have shed the most. Neither of us has done anything more. No blood of his has been spilled. No successful victory of his has been recorded. No thanks of Congress have ever been rendered to him. Big Bethel and Fort Fisher stand as monuments of disaster and shame, under his control, while no such record, at least, stands against me. The services which he has rendered to his country have been services of injury, in exciting passions, in exasperating the South, and in dividing the North. These are the services he has rendered to his country—no more.

I am told that he curbed the proud Empire city of New York; that he restrained it within proper boundaries on the day of election; that but for him there was no knowing what might have passed. At least we might have been in the throes and agonies of civil war. Sir, we but amused ourselves when General Butler came to the city of New York with the pictures that he exhibited. There were some twenty, twenty-five, or thirty aids-de-camp, mounted on horses, riding to and fro up and down our beautiful Fifth avenue, to the astonishment of our males and to the gratification of our ladies. But, so far from exercising any influence through fear or by authority, with not the least terror did he ever inspire the lofty and proud people of that magnificent city. If we were born ever to be subjected—that city of a million people—to anything but the Government and laws of the country, we never were born to be overriden and subjected to any Major General Butler. We did not scorn him; we did not even defy him. We looked upon the whole show in front of the Hoffman House in Fifth avenue as we would look on a body of circus riders in some beautiful amphitheater, [laughter,] amusing ourselves with the various performances of his aids as they pranced off for different parts of the city.

Sir, he did render, however, some essential service. In my judgment, and in the judgment of our friends, he increased the Democratic majority from five to ten thousand votes. The Democratic party—if my Democratic friends will forgive my saying so—sometimes contains certain members who are not always orderly on election days. Among the laboring classes the election is a holiday. They are sometimes in the habit of indulging in a generous glass of the cheapest liquor which some neighboring porter-house may administer to their comfort or zeal. On that election day and a few days before we told them that General Butler had come there to create an excitement and disturbance, and we exhorted this Democratic people to allow no glass of liquor to be drunk in the city of New York till after sunset of that day, and if they saw any scolding going on, to take the scolding person aside without any collision or controversy with him. The consequence was that we voted in solemn column, like men marching to a solemn duty, without liquor, without controversy, without any excitement whatsoever; and the peace of that election ran up the Democratic majority toward forty thousand in the Empire city. Sir, that was the only service that he did the country there; the rest was but jest, melodrama, theatrical war.

The honorable gentleman from Massachusetts was pleased to say that since the record of Hastings in India no man had had so wide and so extensive a command as Major General Butler. The honorable gentleman from Massachusetts will permit me to say that I think that was a most unfortunate allusion. The history of Hastings in India is in a good degree the history of Major General Butler at New Orleans and throughout all those regions on the Mississippi. I will not recall that history; but I will recall the fact that years afterward the proudest and the loftiest spirits in the British Parliament, from Burke onward, arraigned Hastings for his conduct in India as I have arraigned Butler here, and as others hereafter will arraign him on the floor of this House, for his conduct in New Orleans and elsewhere. And, sir, the history of Butler will, I venture to predict, be the fate of Hastings: supported by a ministry, though but feebly and partially supported, yet recorded in history as a plunderer and a robber, and bequeathing to posterity a name immortal for that plunder and robbery alone.

Mr. Speaker, I have not had time or leisure, and I have not the opportunity now, to examine in detail the numerous and lengthy documents which the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts has presented. But, if I understand those documents, they disclose these facts: that a certain sum of money—$50,000, or over—was forcibly extorted, by threats and violence, from a Mr. Smith, a banker in New Orleans, originally of Ballston, Saratoga county, in the State of New York—one of those numerous northern men who, in earlier times, had gone to New Orleans to accumulate fortune, with the intent, when that fortune was accumulated, to go back to the land of their birth and there enjoy their otium cum dignitate. No matter what slanders General Butler, for his own purposes, may fix upon these worthy gentlemen from Ballston, there are their relations in the State of New York; there is the home of their fathers; there is the land where they were born, and to which they intended to go. If, under those threats and that extortion, they concealed their gold, they paid but a proper tribute to the rumored character of Major General Butler; and they may be excused for that concealment when they supposed that they were to be plundered of fifty or sixty thousand dollars, the accumulation of a long life of labor.

A court of inquiry was then instituted. Instituted by whom? It was no civil court, but a mere military court, the creation of General Butler, at the head of which was an officer of the Army, and at the end of which were two gentlemen of New Orleans, for the time being subjects of General Butler. They found, first, that this was not Government money; it did not belong to Government; it did not come out of the mint of the United States. They found, second, that that money had not been used for the purpose of aiding the confederate States. When they found that, they had discharged their duty so far as to acquit Mr. Smith of treason, of collusion with the confederates, or of robbing the mint of the United States.

There are other facts in connection with those papers which the honorable gentleman has submitted; and among them is this leading fact, that the Secretary of War would not take the responsibility, by assuming in any degree whatsoever the control of this money. The Secretary of War looked upon it as money illegally and wrongfully seized, and he would not be held responsible for it in any manner, but chose to leave it all in the possession and control of Major General Butler. Neither the War Department nor the Treasury Department would undertake to indemnify him for the great wrong which he had committed. They left upon him and him alone the responsibility for seizing that money, with all the consequences thereof, he to be subject to all the costs and to all the indemnity.

Another fact has come out: though this money was taken in June, 1862, yet, after the long correspondence with Mr. Pierrepont, so remarkable for its courtesy, not even till this day has that money been paid over to the bankers to whom it belongs, Smith & Co. So that for two years and nine months the gold which was taken from Messrs. Smith & Co. in New Orleans, illegally and forcibly taken, has been kept from them, and is now in the forcible possession of Major General Butler. Major General Butler, up to the suit at law in November last, as I disclosed in the affidavit of Mr. Smith read by me; up to that day in last November, notwithstanding this long controversy with Mr. Pierrepont and this long possession of the money, refused to surrender these $50,000 in gold, and these $50,000 in gold are now in possession of Major General Butler.

Mr. Speaker, these are the leading facts which the record discloses, and these are the facts which are to go throughout the country. If any statement of mine is in contravention of that record here made, let that correction go forth with that statement, for I intend no misstatement of facts.

But here is this additional great fact, well worth the public attention, and which, though not a legal, is a moral fact, to go before the people of this country: Major General Butler, at the opening of this war, was a criminal lawyer in the manufacturing city of Lowell; with no great renown as a distinguished juriconsult; with no large practice; with no important cases which have appeared before the high court of Massachusetts or the Supreme Court here; a lawyer of moderate practice, doubtless with moderate means. He went to New Orleans in command of the army of the United States, his brother being with him, neither being known to have had any accumulation of money. That brother died in New York, after living in New Orleans under the military administration of Major General Butler, leaving in his will a fortune, an immense fortune as stated in the public prints. He left that fortune to his brother, Major General Butler. The two brothers accumulated this large fortune, which the records in the surrogate's court of New York disclose, while one was the military commander of the richest military department of this Government. No other major general in the Army of the United States has any such record of any such fortune. Where is the fortune of Lieutenant General Grant? Who ever accused him of plunder and robbery? What trouble has he with outsiders whatever? What complaints are made against him by members of the Opposition party? There is Major General Sherman, who, with humble possessions, is yet content with those possessions. There is Admiral Farragut, who by his navy opened the way to New Orleans so as to permit General Butler to enter it; he has nothing but his salary to live upon; he has no accumulation of fortune. There is General Thomas, a gallant, noble soldier, who has won victories for us; he has no accumulation of money. Yet here is a major general without a victory, who, with his brother, accumulated, while in possession of New Orleans, a very large fortune.

These may not be legal facts nor legal testimony, but purely record evidence bearing upon the substance and principle of the remarks I made the other day.

I might enter into a full examination of the documents which the gentleman from Massachusetts, in this ex parte exhibition, has placed before this House. I might ask whether they have been on file in the Department. Whether they have been on file in the Treasury or War Department, and how long they have been there. There has been a dispute already as to the money, we see, and the paymaster to whom it was paid. I might ask what record has been made of the transaction. Really, sir, the only thing known in regard to this $50,000 in gold is that for two years and nine months loyal people from the North doing business in New Orleans have been deprived of it by Major General Butler. How will the return of this money, this $50,000 in gold, be any compensation for what they have lost? The control and possession of $50,000 in gold for two years and nine months, during which time gold has been up to 285, if now returned at 200, would in itself be no inconsiderable fortune. The possession of $50,000 in gold for these two years and nine months, with the fluctuations that have been constantly going on, is of itself a fortune to the possessor. Sir, if this judgment is rendered in the courts of law, or if General Butler refunds it under the laws of the country in lawful money, worth now about fifty cents on the dollar, that will be legal return, under the judgment of a court, for the money thus taken. The $50,000 in gold is now worth $100,000 in legal tender, and was worth $120,000 not long ago.

Mr. Speaker, I will not renew my epithets or my adjectives. I leave these facts and this record to go forth to the country, and the country will judge between me and Major General Butler, whether I was right or not in the language I used upon the floor of this House. I am not to be deterred from duty by invective, or rhetoric either. The declamations of honorable gentlemen who are excusing these wrongful extortions and prolonged possession of an honest man's gold, have got to be offset by the facts and the record. I listened with satisfaction to the challenge for a committee and an investigation, thrown out, and I take it as an accepted fact that, in consequence of the letter from Major General Butler, demanding an investigation not only into this gold transaction, but into all his proceedings in the department of the Mississippi, and elsewhere, the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BOWWELL] will feel it his duty, ay, must feel it his duty, to institute a select committee for a thorough examination of all these facts; or, if he does not do that, at least will by express resolution transfer the whole subject to the Committee on Commerce, which has the investigation of no inconsiderable portion of this subject already.

I have but little more to say, except to add that controversies of this nature are not to my liking or of my choice. I do not plunge into them. In an excited and warm controversy with the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. SCOTFIELD,] who was sharply assailing the people I represent, I felt it my duty to vindicate that people from the allegations which he was making, and in the course of those remarks the name of Major General Butler was brought in. I would have been willing that the subject should have dropped. No revenge, as the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania stated, has prompted me; no spirit or love of revenge. I have no revenge to gratify against Major General Butler.

Mr. STEVENS. The gentleman will see that there is a misprint in the Globe. The word "no" is inserted, and should have been left out, as the rest of the context will show.

Mr. BROOKS. I will assure the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania that I never act upon this floor under the promptings of a spirit of revenge. If Major General Butler had not, in a seemingly threatening letter, addressed me as he did, I would have answered him through a member of this House, or through any other gentleman except the military gentleman sent to me from his personal staff. I never have acted in a spirit of revenge, and I never intend thus to act as a member of this House. I act in the spirit of public duty.

Honorable gentlemen on the other side, especially when the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania lashes them as he did yesterday, require more than ordinary courage to expose facts in connection with the Administration, or even with the subordinates of the Administration, and hence the duty was devolved upon me, in this case, to present certain facts in the history of General Butler, and to bring those facts before the House and before the country. No revenge, no desire or love of revenge, prompted me. What I did was done simply in the discharge of a high public duty. If on an investigation General Butler can vindicate his character in the administration of the departments of the Mississippi and North Carolina and Norfolk, I will have given him an opportunity to redeem his character, which is not pure, before the people of the country. His character is not good in the estimation of the world. The names of Butler and of Haynau are associated together in all European languages, and are one and indivisible. And if I shall have given General Butler an opportunity to vindicate his name and fame before mankind, I have rendered him an especial service, and he ought therefore to thank me.

Mr. Speaker, I appealed from the decision of the Chair yesterday under an apprehension that I was not to be permitted to go on with the remarks that I was making, and was to be cut short in those remarks. I now withdraw that appeal. I was loth to make it, and as the House has given me an opportunity of saying what I had to say, I have no further necessity to prosecute that appeal.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. Speaker—
The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York withdraws the appeal, and there is no question before the House.

Mr. STEVENS. I shall have to renew the appeal. [Laughter.]

Mr. Speaker, when the gentleman from New York [Mr. Brooks] arose, I had hoped that he would do one of two things, either admit his error yesterday or speak to the subject which had been discussed and upon which evidence had been taken. Had he done that I might possibly have supposed that what he did yesterday was not prompted, as he said himself, by this letter which he had read here, or, as I say, by revenge, or I might possibly have believed—I will not say I do—that it was done from patriotic motives. [Laughter.] Then I should have had nothing more to say. But instead of addressing himself to the question before the House and to the evidence, he has spoken of everything else and scarcely touched that. The proportion of his remarks which referred to the subject, compared with the balance, was about like the quantity of bread to the quantity of sack in Falstaff's bill. [Laughter.]

The gentleman began by complaining of the conduct of the gentleman from Pennsylvania and the gentleman from Massachusetts in making remarks personal to himself. One who upon this floor had used every epithet of slander which the most foul tongue could utter against a man who was absent in the service of the country; a gentleman who had talked about "gold robber" and "cotton speculator," and of "contraband dealings with the enemies of the country," and had charged all that upon a gentleman who holds the commission and wears the epaulets of his Government; that gentleman has complained that my language was foul, and talked about its being learned in Billingsgate and Cripple-gate and New-gate. Sir, with all the gates that the gentleman has gone through and that he refers to, there is one gate which the gentleman will enter which I shall strive to avoid. [Great laughter.]

Mr. Speaker, for a gentleman who could hunt through the purlieus of bawdy-houses and seduction, who could take the testimony of prostitutes and the inmates of these vile houses, and who, after the committee associated with him unanimously, he being the only exception, refused to let that evidence see the light, could put that filthy stuff, which ought never to be seen outside of such places, surreptitiously, without the order of this House, as an appendix to a minority report and send it broadcast over the country, to talk to any man about Billingsgate and Cripple-gate! And yet that is the condition of the gentleman from New York. I hope you have none of you read this stuff. [Laughter.] I advise all of you never to read it. I have read but a little passage of it. It stinks in the nostrils.

But, sir, having said thus much, I perhaps ought to say that possibly I owe an apology to gentlemen upon this side of the House, because when they had, after full notice of what was to come, opened the floodgates of Billingsgate to flood this House and the country, in the heat of debate and of my feelings I may have used intemperate language. I did feel mortified and grieved, but my feelings are very much mollified by the evidence which has this day so amply vindicated the high character of Major General Butler, so far as it was brought in issue before this morning. I admit that that evidence has done great justice and great favor to Major General Butler, for, sir, there is not a candid man, there is not an honest man in this House who will dare to say that that evidence is not a complete and perfect vindication of Major General Butler from all the charges made against him by the gentleman from New York; it not only vindicates him, but shows him to have, in all his acts and in all his correspondence, acted, not only like an honest man and faithful officer, but like a gentleman and a well-educated man. The whole of the correspondence would do credit not only to his heart but to his great ability and his scholarship and his professional learning. And I will say here that, so far as professional learning goes, I was long ago struck with his correspondence with the gentleman who was sent down there by the Government, Mr. Reverdy Johnson. General Butler showed more ability, more knowledge of the law of nations, and was more correct in his positions than that gentleman; and if General Butler's doctrine had prevailed, $800,000 in gold, which was seized by him, would have been kept from supplying the rebel armies, to which it was applied, when turned over, under the advice of the eminent counsel to whom I refer.

Is there a word in that correspondence which goes to show that General Butler ever designed to appropriate to himself a dollar of the money of those rebel Smiths?—for they are proved to be rebels, and there is nothing to the contrary but the remark of the gentleman from New York, which, I beg leave to say, is not now evidence in a court of justice. [Laughter.] Is there one single act of his that does not show that he seized it in his official capacity, and had ground for seizing it? He found these rebels there, who had been the agents, the riders and abettors, of rebels, and when he questioned them about gold, they denied that they had a particle of it; and it was finally found walled up in their place of business so as to keep it concealed from the Government of the Union. Was not that, in itself, sufficient evidence against these men?

Contrary to the charge of the gentleman from New York, General Butler immediately reported the matter to the Government. He communicated it first to the Secretary of the Treasury, and then to his superior officer, the Secretary of War; and he was directed, instead of paying it over, to hold it till the matter should be decided. How is this making profit out of it, as the gentleman from New York now charges, for I think he gives up the principal and only sticks now to the interest? [Laughter.] Where has the money been? Why, some of the communications that have been read show that it is deposited in the sub-Treasury of the United States, on which General Butler offered, at any moment the Department would allow him, to give a draft that would be honored.

Now, sir, is it the character and conduct of an honest man, not of a high-minded, honorable man, but of a man of common honesty, after all this, still to persevere before the country in the charge that General Butler is guilty of dishonesty? No, sir. The gentleman from New York but faintly refers to that, and goes off about other matters, about which nothing was said yesterday and nothing has been said to-day except what he said himself. And he brings in the dead corpse of General Butler's deceased brother, to malign him, without stating a fact that anybody would believe who had heard him before. Now, the fact is that that brother had been in California, had been operating in many places before he went to New Orleans, and his fortune, instead of being the $2,000,000 that was talked about, dwindled down to less than $200,000, as I am told. This, to be sure, is going out of the record to answer extra testimony; and I merely mention it so that the gentleman's statement might not go alone upon the record.

The gentleman says that General Butler has done no service to his country. Service to his country! If it is true that he helped to kill the Democratic party, he did a great deal of service to the country. [Laughter.] I do not know that fact. That took place before secession, and is, therefore, a little further back than I choose to go. But if he was wrong then, the gentleman from New York has been going wrong ever since and getting worse all the time, while General Butler has been getting better and better, and is now an excellent man. I wish to God they would all reform in the same way. [Laughter.] Did he not come on in the midst of peril and seize Baltimore, which others had failed to do? Did he not go to New Orleans and seize it, and administer its affairs better, and to the greater satisfaction of every loyal man, than has been done since, although I do not draw comparisons? Talk about that being a parallel with the administration of Warren Hastings! All that I have to say is this: Warren Hastings was made immortal by the talents of the counsel who prosecuted him. He was acquitted, as the public will acquit General Butler. The only difference is that there has been no pure and upright and manly eloquence in this prosecution, to immortalize General Butler, as in the case of Warren Hastings.

Mr. Speaker, the gentleman refers to the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. Boutwell,] whom I do not intend to defend. He also talks about John Brown. The gentleman well knows that that class of people to whom he referred were very few in the United States. None of the Republican party belonged to that class. But, sir, I will state the difference between John Brown and the gentleman from New York. While I have not a word to say in extenuation of the conduct of John Brown, nor anything to say against his sentence, yet, sir, there are times in the history of men when there are such great evils that the motives of some men who attempt, although in an irregular manner, to eradicate those evils, will overshadow all the irregularities in the eye of posterity, although we here at the moment cannot forget or forgive them. There are times, sir, when posterity will look beyond the immediate step to see where a man proposed to land, what were his intentions and his motives, and they will judge according to the ulterior design. Now, sir, the motive of John Brown—honest, upright, but mistaken in his means—no man who loves freedom can help applauding, although none of us would justify the means. But upon the principle which I have mentioned, when the gentleman from New York and myself will be moldering in the dust and forgotten, or only unpleasantly remembered, the memory of John Brown, I will venture to predict, will grow brighter and brighter through coming ages; and the State of Virginia itself, by its own freemen and its own freedmen, will, within the lives of some now present, raise a monument to his memory upon the very place where his gallows stood.

Mr. Speaker, this is also traveling a little out of the record. But, sir, the gentleman says that he has dealt leniently with Major General Butler because he is a fallen man. Leniently! Why, in view of such "leniency," I should like to ask Beelzebub what he considers to be mercy. [Laughter.] Sir, the gentleman need not flatter himself that General Butler is a fallen man, or requires the sympathy of any one. His patriotism, his talents, his acquirements will hold him aloft amid the attacks of all his enemies. He has rendered services and shown a patriotic intention which will make him beloved throughout all this country. A single reverse may sometimes be endured and deplored; but that is not to destroy a man, for all men are liable to such reverses. Sir, I venture to declare this day, notwithstanding the recent defeat of General Butler, that if the question could be put to the loyal people of these United States whom they would select for their next President, a majority of them would vote for General Butler.

Now, sir, I do not wish to proceed much further, and perhaps I ought not to have proceeded thus far. But, sir, it seems to me a little strange that such men as the gentleman from Massachusetts should be rebuked by one who, after having slandered, scandalously slandered, one of the great men of the nation, after having uttered language fouler than ever issued from the mouth of the veriest drab that ever wallowed in Billingsgate, must, at the sight of a man in the United States uniform, run to this House, lay hold of the horns of the altar, and beg its protection. [Laughter.]

I have said all that I desire to say, and I withdraw the appeal.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Mr. Speaker, I renew the appeal. I desire to detain the House only a very few minutes. The gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS,] whom I have long admired for his talents, and esteemed for his patriotism, saw proper yesterday to impugn perhaps my motives, as well as those of the gentlemen who voted with me, because I moved to suspend the rules to allow the gentleman from New York [Mr. Brooks] to proceed; and the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania took occasion to say that he regretted that the yeas and nays had not been called, in order that we might appear before the country as sustaining such a motion, and that the finger of scorn might be pointed at us. I, too, sir, regret that the yeas and nays were not called upon the motion. Whatever I am willing to do by my unrecorded vote, I am ready to place upon the record.

My motives in moving a suspension of the rules were, as I conceive, entirely praiseworthy. The gentleman from New York had grossly assailed, if the charges were untrue, a major general of the Army and an eminent citizen of this country. The gentleman who had been assailed desired to be vindicated. The very evidence that has been presented to the House shows that the gates had been closed against him. In one of his letters he asks Mr. Pierpont, in substance, "What more can I do? I am assailed upon this question from all points; and how can I answer the accusations that are made? I have asked the Secretary of War to print my letter, but that request is denied me. What more can I do?" Sir, by my motion, I desired to open the gate that had debarred General Butler from his own vindication. I wished to permit either the gentleman from New York to sustain the charges, or the friends of General Butler to vindicate his character, so that, if the truth were in favor of General Butler, he might come out of this ordeal brighter and purer, and the gentleman from New York stand convicted as a slanderer and maligner. Those were my motives, and undoubtedly those were the motives of the gentlemen who sustained the motion.

Mr. Speaker, I have been an admirer of General Butler. I am an admirer of him to-day; and I am proud as any man upon this floor that he has been so successfully and triumphantly vindicated. I know that his vindication will be read by the country much to his credit and honor. I have admired what he has done at New Orleans, and what he has done elsewhere. I have admired him for what he has done for the country. I do not admire him for what he did at the Charleston convention.

I will state here, Mr. Speaker, that if any gentleman upon this floor sees proper to assail General Butler for his failure to capture Fort Fisher I will move the requisite resolution, in order to have a free fight; and I am willing to guaranty that Major General Butler will come out as triumphantly in that matter as he has done in this. I grant that the communication addressed by Major General Butler to the gentleman from New York [Mr. Brooks] smelt of blood.

A MEMBER. No, gunpowder.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Gunpowder, and perhaps no blood. I should construe that communication into the foundation at least of a challenge. I have great confidence in the personal bravery and courage of Major General Butler. His character had been grossly assailed by the gentleman from New York, and he wanted to hold him to account. So I understood it.

Mr. GOOCH. I should like to make a statement to the House, to come in at this place.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I yield to the gentleman for that purpose.

Mr. GOOCH. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from New York asserted to-day, if I recollect correctly, that Major General Butler was a man without fortune; that he was a lawyer in the interior of Massachusetts with a very moderate practice. If I have not quoted him correctly he can put me right. He does not correct me, and I presume therefore that my statement is correct.

Mr. BROOKS. I do not hear what the gentleman says.

Mr. GOOCH. I understood the gentleman from New York to say that when Major General Butler went into the Army he was a lawyer in the interior of Massachusetts with moderate practice and without fortune.

Mr. BROOKS. I said without large fortune, without much fortune. I qualified it with some adjective. I did not say that he was a poor man.

Mr. GOOCH. I think the gentleman said that he was a lawyer in the interior of Massachusetts, and of moderate practice. Now, General Butler was a man not of great fortune, like the millionaires of New York, to whom the gentleman has referred in this House, but he was a man of what would be considered in Massachusetts a liberal fortune. He was a lawyer in that State, of high standing and eminence, and had been for years.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Let me ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. GOOCH. Wait till I get through.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Let us hear the question now.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. How much was General Butler worth before he went into the Army?

Mr. GOOCH. General Butler was a lawyer of high standing and extensive practice not only in Lowell but in Boston and throughout the State of Massachusetts. He had an office in Boston as well as in Lowell, where he resided, within twenty-five miles of Boston. He had one of the largest incomes from his practice of any lawyer in Massachusetts. Yet, sir, he sacrificed cheerfully the lucrative emoluments of his profession and early went into the military service to fight for his country.

Mr. COX. With the permission of my friend from Illinois I will make a remark. He has stated to the House that he was an admirer of General Butler, and especially of his military qualities. I have never criticised the military capacity of any general in this House, but from what has occurred here I think there has been an attack on General Grant for having removed General Butler, as well as upon the President of the United States. I want the gentleman from Illinois to call for his inquiry, to know whether that favorite of Illinois, that favorite of the Army, is to be maligned indirectly in this House. [Laughter.]

Mr. INGERSOLL. I am very happy to know that the gentleman from Ohio, and I hope other gentlemen belonging to the same party, have at last come to the conclusion that General Grant is a great general, worthy of admiration, and that they are ready to defend him even upon the suspicion that he is assaulted.

Mr. COX. Will my friend join me in defending him against attacks, open and secret, of Major General Butler himself?

Mr. INGERSOLL. I will be in favor of defending and vindicating him, and of giving him an opportunity of vindicating himself, whenever, wherever, and by whomsoever he is assaulted.

Mr. COX. Now I ask my friend from Illinois what General Butler meant in that letter when he said he was removed from office because he would not sacrifice his troops as other generals did?

Mr. STEVENS. He did not say that.

Mr. COX. Needless sacrifice them.

Mr. STEVENS. He never said any such thing.

Mr. COX. It is in his letter.

Mr. BALDWIN, of Massachusetts. I rise to a question of order. I desire to know whether all this discussion is not out of order, and whether there is anything before the House which makes it in order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair very much doubts whether it bears upon the question of appeal. The Chair decided yesterday that the debate must be confined to the appeal; but the House took the matter out of his hands by suspending the rules, and the only question is whether that is extended and applied to this debate.

Mr. COX. I am upon the floor, and hold it by the courtesy of the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. BALDWIN, of Massachusetts. That applied to the appeal taken yesterday, but this is a new appeal.

The SPEAKER. That is true; but the Chair will, upon this appeal, till withdrawn, allow the same latitude that has been allowed upon the previous appeals, from the fact that no appeal can be taken now while there is one appeal pending, and latitude of debate has been allowed thus far without objection.

Mr. COX. I presume my friend from Illinois will allow me a little latitude and longitude. The gentleman from Pennsylvania has denied that such a statement was made by General Butler. I read from his letter dated "Headquarters of the Department of Virginia and North Carolina, Army of the James, January 8, 1865," sent with the compliments of Major General Butler to all the Congressmen:

"Soldiers of the army of the Potomac!"

Mr. INGERSOLL. Will the gentleman allow me to resume the floor?

Mr. COX. One paragraph, and then I will sit down.

Mr. INGERSOLL. A short one, I hope.

Mr. COX. I would not have all that order read here for the world. It would startle the galleries. [Laughter.]

Mr. SCHENCK. The gentleman so seldom asks the indulgence of the House that I hope he will be allowed to go on. [Laughter.]

Mr. COX. My colleague craved that indulgence all day yesterday, and he ought to be the last one to say anything about it. "I have refused," says General Butler, "to order the useless sacrifice of the lives of such soldiers, and I am relieved from command." Why, what does that mean?

Mr. STEVENS. I do not know. [Laughter.]

Mr. COX. Is it possible the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania comes here and professes his ignorance of Major General Butler's own rhetoric, after paying him such a handsome compliment as he paid him to-day? Why, the gentleman has even nominated him for the next President.

Mr. STEVENS. I suppose it means that he was relieved from the command. [Renewed laughter.]

Mr. COX. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is not relieved, however, from his condition. Now I want, since my friend from Illinois, in coming here for the purpose of defending General Butler, has indirectly attacked my friend General Grant—

Mr. INGERSOLL. The gentleman will not assume that I desire to attack General Grant, or that I have done so by any innuendoes.

Mr. COX. The gentleman says he did not intend to attack General Grant; but I notice that the attacks made in this House without intention are so frequent and so dangerous that they ought to be stopped. [Laughter.] I never knew a violent attack made here, in reference to which members, attention being called to it, have not got up immediately and disclaimed any intention of making an attack.

Mr. INGERSOLL. If the gentleman from Ohio has no further questions, I must resume the floor.

Mr. COX. Only one more. I want to explain to this House precisely what General Butler means by not ordering a useless sacrifice of life. I ask if it is not a direct stab at General Grant and the army of the Potomac that honors him?

Mr. INGERSOLL. As I understand it, it simply means, in the first place, that he did not assault Fort Fisher, and in the second place, that he had been suspended and was going home. [Great laughter.]

Mr. COX. I acknowledge that my friend's explanation is entirely satisfactory. [Laughter.]

Mr. INGERSOLL. I was about to remark further, when I was interrupted, that I moved the suspension of the rules for another purpose, and that was that I desired that no personal encounter should ensue between Major General Butler and the Representative from New York, for the reason that I desired to save to the country a great general and to the Congress of the United States a great legislator. [Laughter.] I now withdraw the appeal.

NIAGARA SHIP CANAL.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I now demand the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. The regular order of business is the consideration of the bill in relation to a ship canal around the falls of Niagara.

Mr. SPALDING obtained the floor.

Mr. LITTLEJOHN. I ask the gentleman from Ohio to yield to me to offer the substitute for the bill of which I gave notice, and which has been printed.

Mr. SPALDING. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. LITTLEJOHN. I offer the substitute.

Mr. ARNOLD. I ask the gentleman to allow me to offer an amendment to the substitute, and to ask that it be printed.

Mr. SPALDING. I yield for that purpose. The amendment was received, and ordered to be printed.

WASHINGTON AQUEDUCT.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a supplementary report of the chief engineer of the Washington aqueduct; which was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. COLE, of California. I desire to enter a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill reported by me this morning from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads was recomitted.

The motion was entered.

And then, on motion of Mr. LITTLEJOHN, (at seven minutes to four o'clock, p. m.) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, January 25, 1865.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Dr. BOWMAN.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The VICE PRESIDENT presented the memorial of Dr. Rudolph Wiczorek, asking that the public lands shall henceforth not be sold, not conveyed to any person or persons, nor given as an equivalent for services rendered to the United States; that no one in this Republic shall possess land exceeding the amount of six hundred and forty acres; that every citizen, or person who has declared his intention of becoming such, shall be entitled to one hundred and sixty acres of the public domain gratis, and free from all taxes and fees whatever; that any person owning more than one hundred and sixty acres of land in this Republic shall pay on the surplus an annual tax of not less than one per cent.; that any person owning more than six hundred and forty acres of land in this Republic shall give up the remainder to the people, and shall be entitled to a refunding of the original cost, added to a reasonable remuneration for the improvements thereon; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. TRUMBULL presented the petition of chaplains in the United States Navy, praying for an increase of compensation; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. WILLEY presented the petition of the heirs of Major Andrew Russell, praying compensation for services rendered by him in the revolutionary war; which was referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

Mr. WILSON presented four petitions of officers in the military service of the United States, praying for an increase of the pay of Army officers; which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

Mr. HENDERSON presented resolutions of a meeting of receivers and shippers of American leaf tobacco at Baltimore, Maryland, remonstrating against the proposed tax on leaf tobacco; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a memorial of the manufacturers and dealers of tobacco in the city of St. Louis, remonstrating against the proposed tax on leaf tobacco; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. POMEROY presented the memorial of Abelard Guthrie, praying to be allowed mileage and per diem as Delegate from Nebraska to the Thirty-Second Congress; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. CHANDLER presented a petition of citizens of the State of Michigan praying for a grant of lands to aid in the construction of a railroad from Lac La Belle to the Cliff mine, Keweenaw county, thence to some point on the Montreal river and the western boundary of the upper peninsula of the State of Michigan; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. JOHNSON presented the petition of the local board of steamboat inspectors of Baltimore, praying for an increase of salary; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented resolutions of a meeting of receivers and shippers of American leaf tobacco at Baltimore, remonstrating against the proposed tax on leaf tobacco; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. COWAN. I beg leave to present the petition of a large number of citizens of Pennsylvania, praying that the preamble to the Constitution of the United States may be amended so as to read in substance as follows: "We, the people of the United States, humbly acknowledging Almighty God as the source of all authority and power in civil government, the Lord Jesus Christ as the Ruler among the nations, and His revealed will as of supreme authority, in order to constitute a Christian Government, and in order to form a more perfect union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquillity, provide for the common defense, promote the general welfare, and secure the inalienable rights and blessings of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness to ourselves, our posterity, and all the inhabitants of the land, do ordain and establish this Constitution for the United States of America;" and also that such changes be introduced into the body of the Constitution as may be necessary to give effect to these amendments in the preamble. I ask that the memorial be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. HALE. I think the memorial just presented by the honorable Senator from Pennsylvania ought to be referred to the select committee to which various memorials in regard to the amendment of the Constitution have been referred, instead of to the Judiciary Committee; I do not think it relates peculiarly to that committee; I think it ought to go to the select committee, and I make that motion.

Mr. COWAN. What select committee?

Mr. HALE. The one of which the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SUMNER] is chairman.

Several SENATORS. The committee on freedmen.

Mr. HALE. Yes; the select committee on freedmen.

Mr. COWAN. I have no objection. I only desire that it shall have careful consideration at the hands of some committee.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The memorial will be referred to the select committee indicated, if there be no objection. The Chair hears none.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. GRIMES, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the memorial of Robert B. Riell, lieutenant United States Navy, praying that he may be allowed his proper promotion in the grade of commanders, which has been denied him in consequence of the report of a medical board, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON, from the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, to whom was referred the memorial of William A. Hammond, late Surgeon General of the United States Army, praying that inquiry may be made into all the circumstances connected with his recent trial and dismissal, and that the Senate will suspend action in the matter of confirming his successor in office until such inquiry shall have been made, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

Mr. TRUMBULL, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 692) in reference to prosecutions for libel in the District of Columbia, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 664) for changing the time for holding the circuit courts in the district of Virginia, reported it without amendment.

Mr. ANTHONY, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 530) for the relief of George Calvert, reported adversely thereon.

BANKRUPT BILL.

Mr. FOSTER. The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 424) to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States, have instructed me to report it back with an amendment. This amendment is by way of substitute for the original bill. It proposes to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert a substitute in lieu thereof. I ought perhaps to remark that this amendment is by no means a radical change of the original bill. The committee made divers modifications in the original bill, and thought it would be better to report a substitute so that the bills could be printed side by side, instead of having the amendments printed in the text of the original bill.

The same committee, to whom were referred memorials from divers citizens of Illinois, from the Board of Trade of Philadelphia, from the Board of Trade of Boston, and from merchants of the city of Boston, on the subject of a bankrupt law, have instructed me to report them back and ask that the committee be discharged from their further consideration.

Mr. HALE. I wish to say a word, as I am a member of the committee that has reported this bill. The committee had great difficulty in agreeing to its details. They were not all such as I could assent to; but I said to the committee that I was willing to vote with a majority to report the bill in order that the subject might be presented to the Senate, reserving to myself the right (without deceiving anybody, either the committee or the Senate), if I could not secure some material alterations in it, of voting against it although I consented to have it reported.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will go upon the Calendar, and the committee will be discharged from the consideration of the memorials.

BILLS BECOME LAWS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. NICOLAY, his Secretary, announced that the President had approved and signed the following bill and joint resolutions:

A resolution (S. R. No. 98) to present the thanks of Congress to Brevet Major General Alfred H. Terry and the officers and men under his command;

A resolution (S. R. No. 99) tendering the thanks of Congress to Rear Admiral David D. Porter and to the officers, petty officers, seamen, and marines under his command for their gallantry and good conduct in the recent capture of Fort Fisher; and

A bill (S. No. 72) supplementary to an act entitled "An act to prescribe an oath of office, and for other purposes," approved July 2, 1862.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. COWAN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 410) to enlarge the port of entry and delivery for the district of Philadelphia; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

SURVEYS OF LAKE HARBORS.

Mr. WADE submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be instructed to inquire into the expediency of compiling and publishing, from the reports on file in the Engineer Bureau of the War Department, a series of charts and surveys of the ports and harbors of the great lakes; said compilation to be made after the manner of the coast survey reports.

TAXES ON TONNAGE.

Mr. FARWELL. I offer the following resolution, and ask for its present consideration:

Resolved, That the Committee on Finance consider the expediency of relieving the tonnage of the country from all taxes and dues collected under the Internal Revenue act, and also consider the expediency of a reduction of the dues on chain anchors and canvas.

By unanimous consent the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. FARWELL. I wish briefly to call the attention of the Senate, and of the Finance Committee particularly, to the subject of this resolution. There are some articles which will not bear taxation. That principle has been admitted and has been acted upon by the Committee on Finance and by the legislation of Congress. It was stated as one reason why the reciprocity treaty should be rescinded, that it prevented the taxation of some leading articles in the country. Why does it prevent the taxation of leading articles? Simply because no adequate protection can be given to them by taxation of foreign articles which come in competition. Now, sir, the tonnage of the country comes particularly under this denomination. The tonnage of the country cannot receive any protection by legislation. It is obliged to compete not only with the tonnage of the British provinces, but it must compete in open market with the tonnage of the world. The only measure of protection that has ever been attempted in this country is to exclude from the coasting trade foreign tonnage.

I submit that this is not the least measure of protection unless it is the intention of the Legislature to reduce the tonnage of the country to that point which merely leaves enough to do the domestic carrying trade. Whenever the coasting trade pays better than the foreign tonnage, of course all foreign tonnage goes into the coasting trade; all our tonnage employed in the foreign trade goes into the coasting trade until the equilibrium is established.

I do not ask for the repeal of the taxes upon the tonnage of the country for the purpose of relieving a class of citizens. There is no class of citizens in this country, or any other, so completely independent of the legislation of the country, so far as their property is concerned, as the owners of tonnage. It is a property appreciated everywhere. Every market in the world is open to it; and in every maritime country except this the greatest facilities are offered for the nationalization of tonnage. You can make an English ship of an American bottom almost anywhere in the world; in Nassau, in Halifax, in Australia, or in Liverpool. The English law grants the authority to their consuls to give a national character to a foreign ship, and she may be sailed under the English flag merely with a consular certificate. The English Government, who have always fought, desired, and resolved to be all-powerful upon the sea, have invariably exempted her tonnage from all taxation. To be sure, the light dues have been paid by her tonnage in part, but they have been so assessed that they made no interference with an open and fair competition. All vessels going to England from foreign ports of whatever nationality pay the light dues for the support of the lights upon her coast. We have for years, while supporting our system of lights and buoys along our coast and giving the use and benefits of them free to England, been contributing largely to pay the expenses of her system of lights, which is managed by a corporation.

This I have always regarded as bad policy, and I think the Government should put upon tonnage arriving from foreign ports, both foreign and domestic, (as we must if we put it upon the foreign,) a tonnage duty. I think it would not be injurious to the tonnage of the country to place a tax upon it that should even yield as much revenue to the Government as is now collected from it, if it can be levied directly from the tonnage arriving in the United States from foreign ports, for that would leave us even competitors in the trade. If we pay it, foreigners pay it at the same time. I suggest, too, that this would be collected with very little or no expense or trouble, being paid at the custom-house upon the entry of the ship, instead of having the assessors all over the country assessing it in half a dozen different ways, as it is now assessed, and a great deal of it never collected in any way.

Sir, we have imposed a tax of two dollars a gallon upon whisky. Suppose we had done that and placed no tax on the imported article, what would have been the result? Simply that we should get no tax, that we should make no whisky, that the foreign article would supply the whole demand, and the men who have invested their property in real estate and machinery for the purpose of distilling would be ruined. The same principle will hold in regard to the tonnage of the country. If we tax the tonnage of the country, and it has got to compete with the untaxed tonnage of other countries, the result will be that our tonnage will go, as it is fast going, into the hands of foreigners, where it is not taxed. But the same result will not come to the owner of the tonnage that would come to the owner of the distillery. Why, sir, he can take it anywhere and sell it; he can whitewash it, as the phrase is, and, as a great deal of our tonnage is being done now, put it under foreign flags, and own it and pay no taxes at all upon it, depriving the Government of all the benefits and getting rid of all the burdens.

There are gentlemen, and many gentlemen, concerned in this species of property who will never do this, who will not own property covered by the British or any other flag except it is the flag of our own country; and I trust the legislation of Congress will be such that these men shall not be driven entirely from this class of property. It is a favorite class of property. It is a kind of property which gentlemen who have been engaged in owning dislike to abandon. There is a sort of lottery about it: sometimes it pays finely, makes magnificent returns, and again it is a blank, it is a failure. It is a favorite property in this country.

But, sir, within the last three years, I think, for we have no data brought up to a recent time; but I think when a data is brought up I shall be found to be correct that one half of all the sea-going tonnage of this country has gone from under our flag. This has not been entirely owing to the legislation of Congress. English pirates have been out preying upon our commerce. This has seemed to create a great hardship, and no doubt it has been to the people owning this sort of property; but upon the whole I am not sure that it has not been fortunate for the country that England has allowed these pirates to go out and prey upon our commerce. I saw it stated but a short time since that the Admiralty of England were compelled to haul up, dismantle, and lay up one of her largest-class frigates requiring something like a thousand men, because they could not ship the men to man her; and to-day England has more men in her commercial marine than any other country in the world. How have we got the fifty thousand sailors that have been enlisted in our Navy within the last three or four years? It is stated by the Secretary of the Navy that sixty-four thousand have been enlisted. It is because the English pirates have driven our flag from the sea, have driven our seamen from the ocean, and consequently they have gone into the Navy of the United States. So it will be with the English when there shall be a war between England and a great naval Power whose cruisers shall drive her ships to sanctuary; then, instead of laying up a vessel for want of men, she can man a thousand such vessels with her seamen.

It has been the policy of all enlightened statesmen to try to increase the commercial marine of their country. We have a navy of seven hundred vessels, a navy regarded, I think, as the most efficient for offense and defense of any navy that has ever been wielded or controlled by one Power; but what would the use of that navy be to Spain or to Austria? Undoubtedly Spain or Austria could build a navy in three or four years as strong as ours is; but without the sailors to man it, which they have not, and cannot procure, it would be as harmless for offense and defense and of as little use to them as the spear of Goliath in the hands of General Tom Thumb. If we expect to maintain our supremacy as a naval Power, which I trust we do, and I trust we shall, we must foster, we must encourage, we must build up, the commercial marine of the country. When Napoleon found that he was unable or would be unable to maintain his colonial possessions upon this continent against the naval power of Great Britain, he tendered them to this country, remarking to his minister that he would have them go to a Power which was so situated as to be the rival of Great Britain upon the sea, a Power that would be able ultimately to dispute, and successfully dispute, the control of the seas with Great Britain; and I trust that we shall not disappoint the expectations of that great statesman in this respect.

Outside of our domestic affairs no statesman has ever had any apprehension of a conflict upon this continent that would be any way troublesome to us upon the land. We have always regarded the conflicts which this country is liable to be engaged in as being strictly conflicts upon the ocean. We have upon one border the Canadas, provinces of England, and upon the other border the ward of France—the two great maritime Powers of Europe. We are more likely to be involved in contests with them than with any other Power. Therefore that contest, if it ever comes between either of those Powers and us, will be entirely upon the ocean; and it behooves us to husband our strength, to encourage the education of seamen, to encourage the employment of American seamen, in order that we may be prepared when the time shall come to enter into these contests—as probably they will come—with the prospect of a happy and successful termination.

I doubt very much if members upon this floor have any idea of the taxes that have been laid upon this species of property, which I contend, and which almost every Senator on this floor has contended, ought not to be taxed at all. The great lumber interests of our country were not taxed at all in the internal revenue tax, because the lumber of the British provinces could come in to compete with it, and we had no authority under the reciprocity treaty to lay any impost tax upon that production. In the first place, there is a tax of twenty dollars per ton upon the iron that goes into the construction of a ship. To build a ship of a thousand tons will take eighty tons of iron. There is a tax of $1,600 on the iron. The duck is taxed thirty cents a square yard, and twenty per cent. upon that; and that is $2,600 of a tax on the duck necessary to put on a ship of a thousand tons. Chains paying two and a half cents per ton and anchors two cents, it will take $2,000 to pay the duties on the chains and anchors necessary for such a ship. The tax of sixty dollars per ton on the rigging will take another thousand dollars, making more than seven thousand dollars in gold that is paid upon the leading articles that go into the construction of a ship; whereas in France and England, nothing that goes into the construction of a ship is taxed; every thing goes in free.

In England a ship may even go to the bonded warehouse and take out goods in bond which are subject to duty for consumption on board a ship. All our ships every time they fit out at home must take the goods and pay the regular duties for consumption. Then there is a tax of three per cent. upon the cost of constructing the ship, and at the same time an income tax must be paid upon all the earnings of the ship. Then there is a special tonnage tax of ten cents per ton upon all vessels arriving from foreign ports, which there is no complaint of, and also upon coasting vessels. If they make one voyage to the British provinces or to the West Indies, the tax is doubled upon them for the year; whereas a British vessel, running from the provinces to our ports constantly through the year, pays the ten cents but once. For a charter-party, the tax is from one to ten dollars, according to the amount involved in the contract. On every manifest of cargo there is a tax of from one to five dollars. The sale of vessels is taxed fifty cents on every thousand.

Then there is an additional tax which it is believed generally was not contemplated to be imposed on these vessels. It is a tax laid upon steamboats and common carriers; but the language is so construed by the Department as to be applicable to all coasting vessels; and that is two and a half per cent. upon the gross earnings of the vessel. If the cost of sailing the vessel, the cost of keeping her in repair, port charges, and other necessary expenses, shall have consumed every cent of the gross earnings, as is very frequently the case, then the owners must be assessed upon their other property or other incomes; they must pay this two and a half per cent.—an extremely hard tax to pay. Most of the coasting vessels are sailed on shares, the captain taking one half for his wages and the wages of his crew. All the other expenses of keeping the vessel in repair and the port charges are to be paid by the owners, and then they are to pay two and a half per cent. upon the gross earnings of the vessel as a tax to the Government, which in many cases is more than all the net earnings, and in the average is taking more than a tenth of all the net earnings of the vessel under this one single tax.

Under this state of facts, is it wonderful that our flag is disappearing from the ocean, as disappearing it is, and disappear it will, unless this system of taxation is changed? But if our tonnage can be relieved from these taxes, if tonnage dues can be collected at the custom-house every time a vessel arrives from a foreign port, whether foreign or domestic, then if the receipts shall be enough to give the Government as much revenue as they get now, I hold that it will not be particularly onerous against the tonnage of this country. Why, sir, more than three fourths of all the tonnage employed in our foreign trade duty is foreign. They go into New York or Boston, take their cargoes, go out, and pay no duties, no expense, no tax; whereas an American ship, which is to run the same voyage side by side, is taxed in every direction. Give us even competition; it is all that is asked. Why, sir, the tonnage of this country ran up from 1815, when it was almost nothing, to 1861, to be the second if not the largest in the world, all this time competing against the cheap money of Europe. But it was owing to the superior enterprise, the superior intelligence, of American shipmasters and seamen, who upon an average made their voyages to and from the north of Europe back and forth, for years in succession, in seven days less time than British ships employed in the same trade. This gave them the preference in the market, gave them the advantage in the freight. The saving of expense by the shorter voyages enabled our folks to compete with the cheap money of the old country. But when we have got to compete with these enormous burdens laid upon our tonnage by Congress, together with the cheap money of the old country to operate against us, the result will be as it has been and is being, to drive our tonnage from the ocean. I trust, Mr. President, that the committee will examine this matter carefully, and, if I am right, at an early day introduce a measure of relief. It is a matter that requires the careful consideration of the committee. It is an immense interest, not only in its value in direct money value, but in the position it gives us among the nations of the world, the power and the influence it gives abroad. The resolution was agreed to.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The joint resolution (H. R. No. 143) to facilitate the adjustment of certain accounts of the American Colonization Society for the support of captured Africans in Liberia, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Finance.

MEXICAN AFFAIRS.

Mr. ANTHONY. I move to take up a resolution which was reported from the Committee on Printing at the close of the last session but not acted on for the want of time, authorizing the printing of some papers relative to Mexican affairs communicated by the Secretary of State in obedience to a resolution of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to, and the following resolution was considered and agreed to:

Resolved, That the papers relative to Mexican affairs communicated to the Senate by the President of the United States on June 20, 1864, be printed.

SLAVES TAKEN INTO THE ARMY.

Mr. POWELL. I move to suspend all prior orders and take up the resolution I offered on Monday last. I have prepared an amendment which I think will meet the objections of Senators on the other side of the Chamber.

Mr. WADE. I must object if that resolution will lead to debate. I am anxious to take up the unfinished business of yesterday, and proceed with it until we get through with it.

Mr. POWELL. I do not think the resolution will lead to debate. I have prepared an amendment which I think will meet the objections of the Senators.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution submitted by Mr. POWELL on the 23d instant, calling on the Secretary of War to state why he has not appointed the commission required by the twenty-fourth section of the act of February 24, 1864.

Mr. POWELL. I move to amend the resolution so as to make it read:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to inform the Senate whether or not he has appointed a commission in each of the slave States represented in Congress "charged to award to each loyal person to whom a colored volunteer may owe service a just compensation, not exceeding $300, for each colored volunteer," as required by the twenty-fourth section of the act approved February 24, 1864, entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes,' approved March 3, 1863;" and if he has not appointed said commission, that he inform the Senate why he has not done so.

The amendment was adopted; and the resolution as amended was agreed to.

RETALIATION ON REBEL PRISONERS.

Mr. WADE. I move now to proceed with the unfinished business of yesterday.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The unfinished business of yesterday comes up regularly at this time without a motion. The joint resolution (S. R. No. 97) advising retaliation for the cruel treatment of prisoners by the insurgents, is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, the pending question being on the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WILSON] to the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. SUMNER]. Upon that question the Senator from Missouri [Mr. HENDERSON] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. CLARK. With the indulgence of the Senator from Missouri, I desire, before he proceeds, to submit an amendment which I have drawn. It is not now in order to offer it, but I ask that it be read for information, and that it be printed unless we come to a vote to-day.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The proposed amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire will be read, if there be no objection.

The amendment was read, as follows:

That Congress earnestly calls the attention of the President to the condition and treatment of our prisoners of war in rebel prisons and camps; and if, for reasons satisfactory to the controlling Executive, they cannot be exchanged, desires that he should employ every means in his power, embracing retaliation to such a degree as may be proper and effectual to prevent the continuance and recurrence of such barbarities, and to compel the insurgents to observe the laws of civilized warfare.

The VICE PRESIDENT. This proposed amendment will be ordered to be printed, if there be no objection. The Chair hears none.

Mr. HENDERSON. I believe it is not in order now, Mr. President, to offer an amendment to the resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is not.

Mr. HENDERSON. There is only one point in the amendment I have submitted informally, and which has been printed, to which I wish to call the attention of the Senate. I shall do so very briefly. It is this: I provide in the amendment that I design offering when it shall be in order, that the President shall appoint a commission, consisting of one or more persons, to proceed to the southern States and to examine into the condition of our prisoners, and to make a faithful report. I do not understand that that has been done recently; and I do not understand that at the time the commission proceeded there, which was spoken of yesterday by the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. SUMNER], the complaints which now prevail against the confederate authorities on this subject existed; but I am very well aware that there is ground for the complaints that are now made throughout the country in regard to the treatment of our prisoners.

It was stated by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HENDRICKS] yesterday that this complaint did not properly exist against the treatment at Libby prison. I believe, and I have always believed, that such is the fact. I have never heard such complaint against the treatment of prisoners at the Libby prison. If I understand it aright, the treatment complained of is at Andersonville and at Florence and other points in the extreme South. I think our prisoners generally have been treated well at Libby prison; that at least is the information I have received, but it may be incorrect.

But, Mr. President, the question arises before us now, what is the object, what is the design, of the resolution pending before the Senate? Is it revenge, or is it for the purpose of ameliorating the condition of our prisoners in the southern States? I think that we can come to the point at once, and I shall not detain the Senate, because that is the only point in this matter: is this resolution for the purpose of ameliorating the condition of our prisoners? If that be not the object, the resolution has no legitimate object. How is it best to accomplish that end? That is the question. This treatment, I have no doubt, to a very considerable extent exists. How is it best for us to get rid of this treatment on the part of the rebels? If we retaliate, may they not retaliate again and again, until, in the language of the President, this becomes a revolutionary strife in which all the principles of civilization will be entirely disregarded?

Then, assuming that the object of this resolution is to ameliorate the condition of our prisoners in the hands of the rebels, I ask if it is not in accordance with the rules of civilized warfare, and if we have not sufficiently acknowledged the belligerent character of the rebels, to enable us with the greatest propriety possible to appoint a commission to proceed there and see whether these complaints are just or not? Is there anything wrong in it? Have we not already entered into an arrangement for the exchange of prisoners? Can we not do with them what we have been in the habit of doing with other nations, foreign Powers, in time of war? Let us look back to the war of 1812. I find that during that war we had an arrangement with the English Government upon this subject, and I cannot see why humanity does not require that we should go just as far to ameliorate the condition of our prisoners now as we then went in the war with Great Britain. At page 354 of Twiss's Law of Nations I find this statement:

"The cartel of 1813, between Great Britain and the United States, provided that American agents might reside at Halifax and other places, and British agents at various places within the United States. It is usual, and obviously of the last importance, for carrying out the objects of a cartel, that a commissary of prisoners should reside in the country of the enemy."

We had agents superintending the exchange of prisoners residing upon British soil after the year 1813 and during the residue of the war of 1812. Now, if it be the object upon our part to ameliorate the condition of our prisoners in the enemy's hands, why in the name of sense can we not appoint, or ask the President, who has the control of this matter, to appoint, commissioners to go there and to examine into the treatment and condition of our prisoners, and demand of the confederate authorities that these commissioners be permitted to reside there and superintend this trust? Is it not possible to do so? Then we can have a correct report; and if we are driven to the dreadful thing called retaliation let us know for what we are doing it; let it be in such a shape that we can justify ourselves before the civilized nations of the earth.

I cannot say to what extent this doctrine of retaliation ought to be carried; it is impossible for us at present to determine, because I do not know how long this war will last; I cannot tell what will be the conduct of the confederate authorities toward our prisoners. I am not prepared to say, as the Senator from Massachusetts does in his amendment, that under no circumstances ought retaliation to be adopted. I cannot go to that extent.

Mr. SUMNER. If the Senator refers to me, I have not said that.

Mr. HENDERSON. I understand that the amendment of the Senator goes to that extent; that is, if the conduct of the rebel authorities be of a very aggravated nature, if it be barbarous—

Mr. SUMNER. My proposition is that there can be no imitation on our part of rebel barbarism in the treatment of prisoners.

Mr. HENDERSON. Then the question arises, what is barbarity? I would not be willing, any more than the Senator from Massachusetts, to starve a prisoner to death; the fact is that it is perfectly revolting to me. Nor if, in the language of this resolution, the rebel authorities give to our prisoners food that is not wholesome, and thereby cause their deaths, would I under any circumstances whatever adopt a policy of that sort. But I cannot pretend to say that retaliation of some other character, much more effectual than that, and not disgracing us in the eyes of the civilized world, might not be adopted which would accomplish all the ends that we desire.

Now, Mr. President, what is this resolution? I must confess that I was somewhat astonished at the introduction of it. The resolution declares that it is a fact known to Congress, that the knowledge has come to us, that these things have occurred; that our prisoners "have been subjected to treatment unexampled for cruelty in the history of civilized war;" and that "its parallels" are only to be found "in the conduct of savage tribes;" that our prisoners have been starved to death and assassinated; and the proposition is made, not that we retaliate in some way which will accomplish the end, but that we retaliate in the same manner, retaliate with a conduct and a treatment similar in quantity and style to the conduct of the rebels themselves.

Mr. BROWN. If my colleague will give way to me for a moment, I desire to say that I think he misapprehends the purport of the resolution in one point. I think, if he will peruse it again, he will find that such is the case. The resolution, as I understand it, and I was a member of the committee which reported it, does not propose that we shall proceed to-day and retaliate in kind for every barbarity that has been inflicted upon those of our soldiers who have been taken prisoners, but it does propose that we shall take a number of their prisoners now in our hands, and, after making inquiry, subject them to treatment similar to that which is persisted in against our own men. It is a resolution looking to future action, to be regulated by future action on their part as well as our part; and that is the intent and that is the meaning of retaliation, as used in the law of nations and as used between belligerents; that the same cup shall be commended to their lips which they commend to ours, and for the reason that they can best appreciate then any inhumanity that may exist in it. I think that was the intention of the committee, and I trust they have so expressed it in their resolution.

Mr. HENDERSON. I have no doubt, from my colleague's statement, that he is correct in reference to the intention of the Military Committee; but I think, on examination of the resolution itself as presented by that committee, he will find that I am correct in the construction I give it. I certainly cannot mistake the proper construction of the resolution. It asserts that certain treatment has been bestowed on our prisoners of war, and "that in the judgment of Congress it has become justifiable and necessary that the President should, in order to prevent the continuance and recurrence of such barbarities, and to insure the observance by the insurgents of the laws of civilized war, resort at once to measures of retaliation; that in our opinion such retaliation ought to be inflicted upon the insurgent officers now in our hands, or hereafter to fall into our hands as prisoners; that such officers ought to be subjected to like treatment practiced toward our officers or soldiers in the hands of the insurgents, in respect to quantity and quality of food, clothing, fuel, medicine, medical attendance, personal exposure, or other mode of dealing with them; that, with a view to the same ends, the insurgent prisoners in our hands ought to be placed under the control and in the keeping of officers and men who have themselves been prisoners in the hands of the insurgents, and have thus acquired a knowledge of their mode of treating Union prisoners; that explicit instructions ought to be given to the forces having the charge of such insurgent prisoners, requiring them to carry out strictly and promptly the principles of this resolution in every case, until the President, having received satisfactory information of the abandonment by the insurgents of such barbarous practices, shall revoke or modify said instructions."

Mr. BROWN. Those last words explain the whole resolution, showing that it is to cease at the moment of the abandonment of the same course on their part. It is to be parallel with it.

Mr. HENDERSON. But I will call my colleague's attention to the fact that it is stated in the preamble to the resolution, that—

Mr. BROWN. The preamble is no part of the resolution; it is a simple declaration of fact.

Mr. HENDERSON. It merely explains the circumstances on which the resolution is based. Now, what is that preamble? It is not stated in the preamble that it is believed by Congress that such is the fact. I only refer to the preamble as explanatory of the resolution; and it declares that it has positively come to the knowledge of Congress that such is the fact, and then it is said that now the prisoners in our hands ought to be subjected to this treatment until the rebels cease their treatment. Then this is to be done at once; we are right at once to commence this treatment because their treatment is going on, as we are told by the preamble, at the present time, and it becomes our duty, if we retaliate at all, to retaliate at once, until (and we are only to cease the retaliation when) the rebels themselves cease this business.

Now, Mr. President, let me call the attention of my colleague to the consequences of the principle he has stated. My colleague insists that the very same treatment should be accorded to the prisoners in our hands that they accord to the prisoners in theirs. He and I agree upon the policy of putting negro troops in the Army, and we have ever agreed upon the proposition that these negro troops ought to be exchanged, and that they ought to be exchanged for white men whom we may capture from the enemy. Now I believe as verily as I believe any statement made in this preamble, that the confederate authorities have on some occasions sold into slavery negroes captured from our Army. The resolution is that the same treatment ought to be accorded to those prisoners whom we capture from the rebels as they accord to ours. Let me ask my colleague if he would be in favor of taking an equal number of prisoners of the southern States and putting them upon the block and selling them to the highest bidder.

Mr. BROWN. I will answer my colleague very frankly and say that I would not, and I do not conceive that in making that answer I involve myself in any contradiction at all. I stated, not that we should in all cases apply the same modes of retaliation, but I stated that the law of retaliation justified the application, as far as might be necessary of the extremest modes in order to correct any such punishments inflicted on our own prisoners. How far I might deem any particular mode desirable; how far I might deem one thing more advantageous than another, is a question of judgment, upon which I should expect to exercise my judgment. I simply assert that the law of retaliation as practiced by all nations has justified extreme measures, even to the taking away of life for the purpose of preventing inhumanity to the prisoners that are in the hands of the enemy.

Mr. HENDERSON. My colleague has given the answer that I knew he would give to my question; and it only requires that the enormity of this proposition shall be fairly presented, in order to satisfy every Christian gentleman in this body that the resolution itself will not do. I will not disagree with my colleague in regard to retaliation in some cases; and, in fact, he and myself know perfectly well that retaliation as retaliation has frequently been necessary in the State of Missouri. I will give instances. The rebels seize upon prominent citizens, Union men, in a certain neighborhood, and we fear that their lives will be taken. How do we prevent it? What sort of retaliation do we resort to? We seize—we have done it repeatedly there—an equal number of prominent men who belong to the other side of the question, and notify the rebel officers that if any harm comes to the men whom they have arrested, punishment of an equal character will be visited upon those whom we have taken. Then it is a question afterward whether we shall carry out the threat thus made, or not. It is a question to be determined after we have seen the conduct of the rebel authorities toward those whom they have arrested. It frequently, I know generally, results in the turning loose of those men who have been arrested. Therefore, as my colleague has properly said, it will not do to declare that under no circumstances will we resort to retaliation.

But he says that we may retaliate properly under the laws of nations, even to the taking of life. It seems to me that this resolution does retaliate to the taking of life. What does it propose? It says that we know perfectly, we are perfectly satisfied already, that the rebels have administered to our men food of a poisonous character, and that thereby they have died; that we know perfectly well that they have assassinated them in cold blood, and we must turn round and do the same thing; that we know perfectly well that they have exposed them to the inclemency of the weather, and thereby caused their deaths; and we must do the same thing. Mr. President, that is not retaliation. It seems to me that it is revenge. If my colleague will insist that it is right to retaliate even unto death, I say to him with all candor it would be infinitely better to take fifteen or twenty or a hundred rebel prisoners and have them shot down by a squad of soldiers, than to subject them to treatment of this character.

Again, Mr. President, I cannot give my sanction to a resolution of this sort, because I am not willing to have such a resolution go forth stamping the character of this great nation. This resolution says that the rebels have starved our soldiers who were prisoners in their hands, and therefore we will slowly starve theirs who are in our control. What is that for? Is it to prevent the same treatment in the future, or is it mere revenge? If it be revenge, all will agree that it ought not to be resorted to. There was a code of morals laid down many years ago, which I believe individuals as well as nations may safely, under all circumstances, obey; and in that code of morals I remember it is said, "Recompense to no man evil for evil." I remember further that in that code it is said, "Therefore, if thine enemy hunger, feed him; if he thirst, give him drink." Is this in accordance with the resolution we are considering? I think not. I think we are told in this resolution that the enemy whom we have under our control is not to be treated in accordance with the divine command; but that because the rebels have starved somebody else this enemy is to be starved.

Mr. BROWN. I would inquire of my colleague whether he carries his doctrine to the extent of a condition of war, and whether he would advise General Grant and his army to present the other cheek to be smitten when one cheek has been smitten?

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. President, I certainly would not. I am speaking of a very different thing. I say that he who is assaulted has a perfect right to defend himself. That is a principle which I do not think the Bible ever denied. I know perfectly well that it is in accordance with the divine command, and in accordance with our own nature. This war has been brought against us, and it is our duty to defend ourselves; but I submitted the question whether it was in a spirit of revenge or really for the purpose of preventing the outrages complained of, that it is proposed to resort to the principles laid down in this resolution; and I am arguing against it upon the idea that it is revenge, and cannot be anything else. How will it accomplish anything? How is it to accomplish anything? Do we, by it, do anything else than disgrace ourselves in the eyes of the civilized world? I think not. Can we not make retaliation more terrible and effective than by thus disgracing ourselves? If the loss of life is necessary, is it not better to take these men out and shoot them? Is it not better to shoot ten or fifteen than thus to starve one to death? In the name of God, I do not wish to resort to any slow process of punishment of this character, because, I say, it is of the very essence of revenge. You can only finally accomplish the death of the man. Then why not accomplish it speedily? Why kill him by inches? Is not that revenge? I have quoted from the good Book in order to show that under no circumstances can we resort to revenge.

My colleague will not differ with me, I suppose, upon the subject of duty, even though we may differ upon this question: This resolution says that whereas the rebels have done certain things to us which are evil, we must do likewise. I think that in that code of morals to which I have referred we are taught this doctrine: "Therefore all things whatsoever ye would that men should do to you, do ye even so to them." I do not suppose that my colleague will dispute the authority of this duty by any means, and I say that, generally followed, it is safest for nations and safest for individuals. It is not our duty under the circumstances to do as others do. That is not the proper plan; it accomplishes nothing. The best idea in regard to this matter, in my judgment, is to do what we regard to be our duty, that which is right in the eyes of all men; and what is that? I say that under some circumstances retaliation may be resorted to, but not that cruel and barbarous retaliation which would merely bring disgrace and odium upon our own country.

Mr. President, I desire to state another consideration. I do not believe that the soldiers of this country generally, if these rebel prisoners were placed in their hands, would be disposed, or that you could compel them to adopt a course of policy such as is indicated in this resolution. I know too much of the soldiers of this country, their magnanimity, their generosity, their spirit, and feelings of mercy, to believe that they would adopt any such course of policy. If retaliation is to be resorted to, let it be resorted to in such manner as will take the life of the individual at once.

History records that in 1793 or 1794 the Committee of Public Safety at Paris, they themselves being perfectly secure in that city, adopted a resolution making it obligatory upon the French soldiers then in the army to shoot every English prisoner the moment he was captured. A short time after the battle of Fleurus, under Pichegru, some English soldiers were brought in captives before the commanding officer, and the question was propounded to the lieutenant who brought them in why he brought those English prisoners there. "Why did you not shoot them?" was asked. He said that his refusing to do so saved just so much powder and ball. "But," said the officer, "the committee of public safety have demanded at our hands that this thing be done, and I tell you that it must be done." The lieutenant promptly answered, "It is not we that will commit this deed; but send them to the Committee of Public Safety at Paris, and if they desire to shoot them they can do so, and eat them too; but I will not do it." The soldiers of the French revolution refused to carry out any such barbarous decree; it was never done by them under any circumstances; and I undertake to say that in consequence of that action of theirs much was gained for the humanity of the French nation, and much perhaps of the success that afterward crowned their arms was due to it. I have no question of that.

While upon this subject, Mr. President, I may refer to the matter of the exchange of prisoners, which is also embraced in the amendment which I propose to offer. I do not desire to reflect on the War Department, because perhaps the War Department has done all within its power to release our prisoners and ameliorate their condition; but it seems to me that it is high time the Congress of the United States should look into the matter. According to reports, there are some fifty or fifty-five thousand soldiers of ours who are prisoners in southern prisons. What has been of late years the course of civilized nations in relation to prisoners taken in battle? Has it not been immediately to exchange or parole them? It unquestionably has been. I know that the English Government, in the war of the Revolution, said that prisoners could not be exchanged with rebels; but the British authorities soon got over that. They found that it was necessary to make exchanges. Why not let us come up boldly to the proposition, and make these exchanges at once? During that war our privateersmen were seized, and the English authorities declared that they were guilty of piracy, and should not be exchanged. Have we not done the same thing during this war? In the early part of the war we convicted rebel privateersmen in Philadelphia of piracy; but we were compelled afterward to abandon that policy and to exchange them. Then, if we ourselves have yielded the proposition that the rebels are belligerents—and we ought certainly to yield it at once, magnanimously, as becomes a great nation—why shall we not proceed to exchange? In 1862, I find that a cartel was agreed upon, which used this language:

"The stipulations and provisions to be of binding obligation during the continuance of the war, it matters not which party may have the surplus of prisoners, the great principles involved being, first, an equitable exchange of prisoners man for man, officer for officer, or officers of higher grade exchanged for officers of lower grade, or for privates, according to the scale of equivalents; second, that privateersmen and officers and men of the different services may be exchanged according to the same scale of equivalents; third, that all prisoners, of whatever arm of the service, are to be exchanged or paroled in ten days from the time of their capture, if it be practicable to transfer them to their own lines in that time, if not, as soon thereafter as practicable;"

Remember, this is the agreement we ourselves entered into with the rebel authorities in 1862—

"Fourth, that no officer, soldier, or employé in the service of either party is to be considered as exchanged and absolved from his parole until his equivalent has actually reached the lines of his friends; fifth, that the parole forbids the performance of field, garrison, police, or guard, or constabulary duty."

I am told that some misunderstanding on this subject has arisen between our Government and the confederate authorities; but even in that agreement there was a provision of this character:

"And in case any misunderstanding shall arise in regard to any clause or stipulation in the foregoing articles, it is mutually agreed that such misunderstanding shall not interrupt the release of prisoners on parole as herein provided, but shall be made the subject of friendly explanations, in order that the object of this agreement may neither be defeated nor postponed."

Why has this cartel not been carried out? Why is it that our prisoners have not been exchanged within the ten days, or as soon thereafter as practicable, as required by the cartel? Can exchanges not be effected now? I do not know. I confess that I am not familiar with the conduct of the War Department on the subject, and therefore I am not qualified to speak; but it seems to me that it is worthy of investigation on the part of the Senate to ascertain why these exchanges have not been made. There are thousands of our men dying in prisons, I care not how well the rebel authorities may treat them. And I care not how well we may treat prisoners in our hands, we know that thousands of them must die. We cannot give them the comforts that we ought to do; it is utterly impossible. How many rebel prisoners have we now? Perhaps sixty or seventy thousand. Why not, then, proceed to exchange?

It was stated some time ago that an objection was presented on the part of the rebels to exchanging, in consequence of the fact that they declined to exchange negro troops. Why not proceed with the exchanges until we come to that difficult question? And now I submit to the Senate that whenever we arrive at that point in exchange, how is it possible that the rebels can refuse to exchange? They will not do it. Will they not be willing to give up a negro soldier to us for one of their men, and especially so if the position taken the other day by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. HARLAN] is correct? He said that one of their soldiers is worth to them, fighting behind fortifications and within garrisons, two or three of our men to us. You know, every Senator here knows, what opinion they have of negro troops, whatever may be our opinion on that subject; and will they refuse to give up for one of their men a negro soldier? I say they will not do so.

As was stated yesterday by the Senator from Indiana, this is a question on the part of this Government to its soldiers. It is a question of humanity. It is a question that we ought deeply to consider. If exchanges can be effected, they ought to be effected. I differ from the Senator from Iowa on that subject. I know that the rebels in the beginning of this war had the opinion that one of their men was worth some five or six of ours. I know that the boast was very common in my own State that every rebel soldier would be a match for five or six, and sometimes it was said for ten Yankees. That delusion has passed away. The rebels themselves now claim no such thing. They are fully satisfied that every man of ours is equal, if not superior to a man of theirs. Therefore we have nothing to lose by a fair exchange.

The only difficulty in my judgment in getting along with this war heretofore has been that we have refused to march upon their soil, as was recently done by General Sherman. There never was any difficulty in going upon their soil. There was always enough there to support armies. There is enough to-day in Georgia to support an army of the United States of any size whatever. There is enough to-day in Texas to support a United States army of three hundred thousand men, and to support whatever rebel armies can be put there. The difficulty has been that we have not been enabled to release from chains and from slavery the opinions and sentiments of men in the southern States.

At this point of distance from the oppression and outrages committed in that country we may very easily imagine that men can speak their opinions and sentiments there. Sir, it is becoming so, but it has not heretofore been the case. There was a period of time in my own State in the beginning of this rebellion when it was dangerous in my own town to speak a sentiment in favor of the Union; and yet we had an organized band of Union men at all times, and we on our side had the arms and they did not have them. How has it been in the southern States? This revolution was precipitated upon them, brought upon them almost in an instant of time. The arsenals were ransacked, the arms were seized; those who were determined to subvert the Government constituted the power of the land. How was it with the more peaceable? How was it with the men who were really in favor of the perpetuation of the Union? They had no arms; they had no power to get arms. We have never been enabled so far to relieve them. And why? Because our military officers heretofore have been afraid to leave their base of supplies. Sir, we did not want any base of supplies; there never has been a moment since the rebellion commenced that armies could not be maintained in any one of the southern States. It is the richest country in the world; the crops were then abundant, and they have every year been abundant; and it was an easy matter to have gone in upon the rebels at any time, torn down the civil authorities erected in the different States, taken possession of their capitals, and encouraged the loyal men to come up and to form the nucleus of a civil government around which the loyal element could rally.

Sir, it is the only way yet that we shall ever conquer the South. It is to take advantage of the loyal element in the southern States. How are you to do it? You must do it as the Senator from Indiana said yesterday—he was very correct in that—by doing as General Sherman has done at Savannah, take possession of their cities; take possession of their capitals; maintain your armies upon the country; do justice as far as it is possible to do under the circumstances; leave private property untouched wherever it can be done; encourage the loyal men to erect a civil government; call the loyal element around you; enable them by all the means in your power to establish and maintain a civil government, and let them pass the laws necessary to make the rebel property in the country tributary to the cause of the Union.

Mr. President, how was it that we saved Missouri? Missouri, I dare say, was as disloyal a State in the beginning as Alabama or Georgia. How was Maryland saved? Maryland and Missouri were both saved by the Union men securing the civil government in the State. Instead of permitting rebel authorities to conscript us; instead of permitting rebel authorities to pass laws for the purpose of making our property tributary to the cause of rebellion, we, having the control of the civil government of the State, passed laws to conscript rebels and put them into the service on our side, and also to take possession of their property and make it subservient to the purposes of the Union. It was in that way that it was done. As has been very properly stated here before by others, thousands and thousands of the men in the rebel armies whom we capture are mere ignorant, innocent conscripts who have been forced into military service in the different States of the southern confederacy.

I say then, Mr. President, that I am unwilling to resort to any such measures as this, while, at the same time, I am unwilling to declare that under no circumstances whatever will I resort to retaliation. But why not adopt a provision something like that which I have submitted? I do not wish to stop short on the subject of retaliation; I think we ought to make our voice felt as far as is in our power on the subject of the exchange of prisoners. If we can accomplish an exchange, let us do it. If we cannot, let us know the reasons why it cannot be made; let us at least know the truth. The first proposition of the amendment which I have submitted, and intend to offer at the proper time, is to let the President appoint a commission to proceed to the South. Will the rebel authorities refuse to receive it? That plan was adopted between England, France, Sardinia, and Turkey on the one side, and Russia on the other, in the Crimean war. Agents were sent into the different countries by the respective belligerents for the purpose of superintending the exchange of prisoners, just as we did in 1813 during the war with England. We had our agents stationed on British soil at all times during that war, ameliorating the condition of our prisoners and producing exchanges whenever it could be done. Can we not resort to the same plan now? Do we not wish to ameliorate the condition of our prisoners? Then let us send a commission to the South; let us see what the facts are. If our men have been mistreated, let honest commissioners go there and report the facts. Let them go not only to one prison, but to all. Let us see what the condition of our men has been; what their treatment now is, and what the rebel authorities propose to do in the future. Let us see what the defects of the system are. Let medical men of our Army who know what treatment ought to be accorded to our prisoners go and demand admission into that country. Will they be refused? Dare these men refuse admission to them on an errand of mercy of this character? No, sir, they dare not refuse it. They will be admitted. The rebels dare not go before the civilized world and say that they are mistreating our soldiers who are prisoners of war in their hands, and intend that we shall not investigate the subject. I say, therefore, let us appoint this commission, and let us have in an authoritative way before us the facts as to the condition of these men, and then let our medical officers suggest, as they ought to suggest, and as they no doubt will do, the treatment that ought to be accorded on our part to the prisoners in our hands.

But, Mr. President, suppose they are refused, or suppose when they go there they find a condition such as is represented in the preamble to this resolution, what then? I apprehend that we shall find that the rebel authorities are not exactly as well fixed for treating kindly prisoners of war as we are; and yet I am satisfied beyond any doubt that they resort to deliberate cruelty upon our prisoners, and these are the facts which I want to get at. I am not willing to declare before the civilized nations of Europe that we, as a nation, will resort to the same infamous cruelty that they have resorted to. What, then, shall we do? Shall we say, as I understand the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SUMNER] to declare, that when that cruelty is of the most barbarous character we must fold our arms and do nothing? I am not prepared to say that. Sir, extreme, strong measures of retaliation may be resorted to without staining our own hands so that all the water of the earth would not wash it out. We may resort to measures merely retaliatory that will not inflict a slow, cruel, and barbarous death upon those who are placed in our hands.

Mr. President, there is something due to ourselves in a merciful point of view. I do not think that it argues the magnanimity of a nation or the nobility of an individual to resort to extreme and cruel measures if they can be avoided. We are told that mercy—

"Is mightiest in the mightiest; it becomes The throned monarch better than his crown."

Mr. President, I believe it. Is it necessary for us to resort to this measure? Gentlemen tell us that the rebels do it and that we must do it. Are we no better than they? At what are they aiming? They are aiming at the everlasting overthrow of our Government. They are attempting to divide and segregate. What are we attempting to do? We are attempting to reunite. After we have reunited this country what do we want? We want the same feeling that once animated the nation. We want the causes of this rebellion removed. What are they? We say slavery is the cause. Let it be removed. Let us insist upon that in any reconstruction that may take place. I agree most heartily to that; but when that is done what else is to be done? Let us bring about a cordial reunion; let us bring about the union of hearts, the union of hands; and let us, if possible pursue such a course that when the present exigency has passed, we shall not be ashamed of what we have done in the eyes of the world, and so that there shall be nothing to which "the slow unmoving finger of scorn" can be pointed in the future. Let us resort to no measure that will lead the rebels hereafter to point to our conduct in this war with reproach. Let us be superior to them. Sir, they love their own rebels and they mistreat our men. If we mistreat rebels and love our own men, how much better are we than they? "Do not even publicans the same?" Sir, we must not only love the neighbor, but as far as consistent we must love the enemy. Such a command is upon us.

It is said you shall not be hearers only but you must be doers of these commands that are put upon you. He who heareth these things and doeth them not, we are told, is like the foolish man who built upon the sand, and the rains fell, and the floods came, and the winds blew, and the house fell, and great was the fall. Mr. President, I believe, as I have ever believed, that the true code of morals is the proper one to be followed. It is to do unto others as you would that others should do unto you. How would you have your prisoners treated in southern pens? Would you have them treated with kindness? If so, shall you not treat their prisoners in your hands with kindness? You are not commanded to do as others do, but you are commanded to do as you would that others should do unto you. It is not for me to determine how far these great rules of morality may be violated under circumstances of this sort, but I am satisfied that, so far as we can consistently with our own existence as a nation, and consistently with our own salvation in the present emergency, we ought to cling to them.

But, Mr. President, we are told by gentlemen that if we do not resort to this course of policy, the rebels will continue their inhuman treatment of our soldiers who fall into their hands as prisoners. I think we are told that the most effectual way of heaping coals of fire on the head of your enemy, is to feed him, and to give him drink when he thirsts. But it is said that if we do not resort to this policy our men will continue to die in southern prisons. Sir, I do not propose in my amendment to let them inflict these punishments with impunity. Let us send there and see what course of conduct is being pursued. When we ascertain that, or when they refuse to receive our commissioners so sent, my proposition is:

If the insurgents shall refuse such authority to the commissioners, and having granted it, the said commissioners shall find that our prisoners are being subjected to the wantonly barbarous and cruel treatment which we have reason to believe has heretofore been practiced by the insurgents—a treatment so shocking to the impulses of humanity and so disgraceful to the civilization of the age—it is the opinion of Congress that, however repugnant it may be to the feelings of a Christian people, the President should adopt such stringent measures of retaliation, consistent with the rules of civilized warfare, and not derogatory to the national honor, as will effectually put an end to such conduct in the future, and secure to our prisoners the treatment due to them at the hands of a people claiming to be civilized.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HENDERSON. Certainly.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I ask the Senator whether he will so modify his amendment as to grant to the confederates the same privilege to send commissioners or agents to inspect the prisons here and see how their prisoners are treated?

Mr. HENDERSON. Certainly. If I am not mistaken, it was very recently the case that, on complaints being made by both sides, confederate officers were released here and Federal officers were released in the South, and the confederate officers went to New York and purchased blankets to be given to their prisoners in our hands, and cotton was brought from the South in order to pay for them. Why can we not do the same thing again? Is it not amelioration that we are seeking? Unquestionably, if these prisoners must remain prisoners of war during the remainder of the war, however long it may last—I hope to God the war will soon have a close; but if they are to remain for a year, or two or three years longer, why shall we not adopt some measures to look into their true condition and to make it better if we can? Can we do anything toward it? When they suffered for clothing a short time ago, we made arrangements by which clothing could be furnished on both sides. Is it not strictly in accordance with humanity, is it not in accordance with the better impulses of a noble nature, that we shall again resort to the same means?

I am perfectly willing that their agents shall come here and examine the prisons. I can state to the Senator from Delaware that they will find, when they come, that their prisoners are treated with humanity everywhere. I have not any question about that. The prisoners of war in our hands have been treated with humanity. There may be cases of civil prisoners, political prisoners, in which the treatment was not proper. I am inclined to think so, from what I have understood; I cannot say that such is the fact; but I have never heard any complaint in regard to the treatment of the prisoners of war which we hold in our charge from the confederates. Then let them come, and let them report. I have no objection to it whatever. If the prisoners are to be retained during this bloody strife for a year, or even six months to come, let us ameliorate their condition in every way that we possibly can.

Then, sir, I desire that the second resolution which I have submitted shall also be adopted, in these words:

That the President is hereby earnestly requested to urge a speedy exchange of all our prisoners, white and black, now held by the insurgents.

I say nothing about the cartel adopted. We have already a plan adopted for the exchange of prisoners, the same that existed between Great Britain and our country in 1812. Let us resort to that. We have already agreed upon it. I say nothing about the mode and manner of exchange, because that has been agreed upon between the two parties.

Mr. President, if this course of policy be adopted I have no doubt but that the condition of our prisoners in the southern prisons will be better to a very great degree, and that cruelty which has existed heretofore will die away under this threat of retaliation; and I wish to make no threat of retaliation except such as may be adopted in strict accordance with the principles of civilized warfare, and which will not in any manner disgrace the civilization of our country. I wish none other adopted, and if we hold out none other we neither disgrace ourselves nor foreign nations, nor shall we hereafter look with regret upon our own conduct, but we shall have accomplished the end that we have in view; we shall better the condition of our prisoners, and save them the miserable deaths which they are dying in southern prisons. Therefore, sir, when the proper time arrives, I shall offer the amendment submitted by me a few days ago, and I hope that the Senate will consider it favorably. I think it accomplishes all the purposes that we desire.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President, as a member of the committee which reported this joint resolution I feel desirous of presenting some of the reasons that operated upon us in submitting it to the Senate, and also of indicating what was understood, at least by myself, and I believe by others of the committee, to be the true intent and meaning of the resolution itself.

The preamble of the resolution recites a condition of facts. It tells of the cruel treatment that our prisoners have received at the hands of the enemy. It specifies the atrocities that have been perpetrated upon those who have surrendered, and details what I venture to say is the common understanding of the country at large, the modes and manner of dealing with our prisoners by the enemy in the South. It is said by Senators that we have no technical evidence before us of these facts. That was not the view of the committee. They considered that there was evidence before them in the reports made by other committees of this body, one of which I hold in my hand. I refer to the report of the committee on the conduct of the war, in which the horrors of the Fort Pillow massacre and other matters connected with the condition and treatment of our prisoners are detailed at great length and substantiated by evidences. I think I shall be borne out fully in the remark when I say that that report, of which the Senate has ordered twenty thousand additional copies to be printed, will confirm every allegation made in the preamble to this resolution. I, therefore, feel that if there were nothing to rest its declarations upon other than the reports which we have before this body, they would be fully and fairly borne out; but in addition to that, I assert that we have the right, standing here and legislating for the country, to recognize and accept and act upon those common convictions which are the common property of the community, and which are as well known, evidenced by all the accepted modes of proof used among men, as could possibly be the fact that daylight is here present with us now.

Nobody can successfully call in question the fact that atrocities of the kind cited have been systematically perpetrated. The history of this whole war shows it. The reports of our generals declare it. The anguished narratives of our returned prisoners establish it. The common cry of the country proceeding from so many sources demonstrates it in a manner that we cannot longer doubt. Therefore I think that the quibble (if I may so term it) which has been raised against the report of the committee, that there was not evidence in official form before us of the exact condition and treatment of our soldiers in southern prisons, is unworthy of the occasion and not entitled to the weight which some Senators are inclined to give it. It was in that belief upon the grounds of evidence set forth that the committee proceeded to recommend that retaliation should be adopted. Such was their judgment—a deliberate judgment, too, arrived at in full view of the past, in full view of the future, and in full view of the appliances which had heretofore been used without success to alleviate this cruel wrong, and with these recognitions they concluded to recommend to the Senate this last resort of retaliation as the only mode left of getting justice and mercy out of the confederate authorities in this matter of the treatment of our prisoners.

It has been said by a Senator that retaliation is repudiated by all civilized nations. I deny the proposition. I do not believe there is any principle better recognized throughout the law of nations than that belligerents have the right to resort to retaliation of the extremest character, even to the taking away of life for the purpose of protecting their own soldiers who may fall into the hands of the enemy. I do not think that the proposition can be controverted with any show of authority from the books. I certainly have heard no authority here stated which comes in conflict with that doctrine, and I therefore cannot understand the bearing of the argument of the Senator from Pennsylvania touching the law of nations, failing as he did to show wherein it limited the modes of retaliations. On the contrary, I believe that it is fully recognized; and I state further that it has not only been commonly recognized, but that it has likewise been practiced in every war that has ever taken place in which any such cruelties have been initiated on the one side or the other. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SUMNER] yesterday cited a letter which was republished a few days ago in the Boston Advertiser, I believe, from General Washington during our revolutionary war. He cited it to sustain his argument. I submit whether the letter does not overthrow his argument, which was against the whole policy of retaliation. The letter is by General Washington in reply to General Gage, in regard to the treatment which our prisoners had received at his hands. I will read it:

HEADQUARTERS, CAMBRIDGE, August 11, 1775.

SIR: I understand that the officers engaged in the cause of liberty and their country, who by the fortune of war have fallen into your hands, have been thrown indiscriminately into a common jail, appropriated for felons; that no consideration has been had for those of the most respectable rank, when languishing with wounds and sickness; that some of them have been even amputated in this unworthy situation.

Let your opinion, sir, of the principle which actuates them be what it may, they suppose they act from the noblest of all principles, a love of freedom and their country. But political opinions, I conceive, are foreign to this point. The obligations arising from the rights of humanity, and claims of rank, are universally binding and extensive, (except in case of retaliation.) These, I should have hoped, would have dictated a more tender treatment of those individuals whom chance of war had put in your power.

Nor can I forbear suggesting its fatal tendency to widen that unhappy breach which you, and those ministers under whom you act, have repeatedly declared you wish to see forever closed.

My duty now makes it necessary to apprise you that for the future I shall regulate my conduct toward those gentlemen who are, or may be, in our possession, exactly by the rule you shall observe toward those of ours now in your custody.

If severity and hardship mark the line of your conduct, (painful as it may be to me,) your prisoners will feel its effects; but if kindness and humanity are shown to ours, I shall with pleasure consider those in our hands only as unfortunate, and they shall receive from me that treatment to which the unfortunate are ever entitled.

I am to be favored with an answer as soon as possible, and beg, my sir, your very humble servant.

G. WASHINGTON.

The letter is specific and emphatic, that he will retaliate, and retaliate precisely in the same manner in which punishment is inflicted upon his soldiers, prisoners in the hands of the enemy. There is no equivocation about the language. It is a full and original notification that hereafter he will treat their prisoners precisely as his prisoners are treated, and there is no limitation as to the treatment, or to the manner of that retaliation. I say, therefore, that so far as the practice during our revolutionary war is concerned, it fully bears out the statement that retaliation was there adopted as an extreme measure to extort from the enemy humane treatment; and I may add that it was a successful measure; it attained the object that was designed.

But I desire to call the attention of Senators to the further fact that the doctrine of retaliation has been recognized and has been applied by the Government of the United States and its officers in the present war; that it has been resorted to time and again in numerous isolated instances; and that in every instance in which it has been resorted to it has been successful in accomplishing its end.

Senators need scarcely be reminded by the fact that when our prisoners at Charleston were taken and placed in front of the breastworks of the enemy, and we were told that if we fired we should fire upon our own men, an equal number of theirs were taken and they were notified that the like treatment would be enforced against them; and the result of it was that the practice was promptly discontinued and our prisoners were removed to a secure position.

Nor can they fail to remember the further fact that when in the construction of a redoubt down near Richmond some of our soldiers held as prisoners were placed in front of the earthworks by the enemy while they were at work, and we were notified that we should have to shoot through them if we made any attack, immediately some of theirs were taken and placed in the Dutch Gap canal as a matter of strict retaliation, and it at once brought the rebels to a sense of their inhumanity, and our prisoners were removed.

Again, let me cite to Senators the further fact that when, owing to some transactions which occurred in New Orleans, it was stated by the rebel authorities that some of our prisoners would be executed in return and they were set apart for that purpose, on the other hand, a relative, I believe, of the rebel General Lee, held as a prisoner of war was set apart on ours, and they were notified that execution by them would be followed by retaliation in kind, and that that also accomplished its end, and they desisted from their threat.

There, sir, are three direct and specific illustrations of the application of the principle of retaliation during this war, in each of which it has served the purpose for which it was designed; and yet are we to be told that retaliation is inhuman? Was it inhuman to save the lives of our men by that mode? Did that result in redoubling murder, in making barbarians of us, or did it result in saving life, and in elevating the humanities of this war?

The committee, I need scarcely say to the Senate, were actuated by no motives of revenge. I will not do injustice to any Senator on this floor by assuming that any such bad passion reigns in his bosom; and I certainly would not do injustice to any committee of this body by assuming that so evil a spirit could influence their deliberations. I say, therefore, that the committee when taking this matter in hand were actuated simply and solely by the one object, the relief of our gallant soldiers who are now suffering in the prisons of the South, and upon whom these cruelties are being systematically practiced. They believed that all other means had been resorted to; they believed that the Executive Government of the country, with the power and with the disposition to use all its appliances to obviate their sufferings, had not been unfaithful to its trust, had not utterly neglected that great matter, but had made its endeavors, had filed its protests and appeals, had sent its representations through its commissioners of exchange and otherwise, and had failed in impressing upon the enemy a sense of the horrid barbarity that had been practiced toward us; and they believed that the time had come when, if we were to be true to those who had fought so nobly for us, and who were languishing in the South under these inflictions, we must come to sterner measures, and notify them that a change must take place, or retaliation would be surely and sternly inflicted. The committee in that view of the case believed likewise, not that retaliation would result in redoubling, as some Senators seem to think, those horrors of starvation and multiplying the muster rolls of death; but in their calm and deliberate judgment they felt assured that it would result in terminating them entirely. It was for the purpose of putting an end to these barbarities, and not for the purpose of enhancing them, that they recommended the joint resolution now before the Senate.

Sir, I believe that all the evidences we have upon this subject of retaliation, both in the present and in the past, justify us in assuming that, however insensible the enemy may be to the cruelties they practice upon our soldiers, yet, when that cup is commended to their lips, they will understand how bitter it is as practiced against their own officers. I feel persuaded that if we cannot through any appeal to their humanity, if we cannot through any reference to the moral sense of the civilized world, convince them that this course is inhuman, we can convince them when we apply it to their own relatives. They will then know what it is. They will then understand how bitter, how atrocious is such treatment; they will see it brought on by their own conduct; they will recognize the policy as determined, and they will desist. That is the animus of this joint resolution, and I should do very poor justice to the committee if I had not set forth in their behalf that their presentation of it was founded upon the thorough and exclusive conviction that the adoption of measures of retaliation would result in terminating this state of affairs, and that milder measures of negotiation, viewed in the light of past transactions, held out no assurance of any such success—no probability of any speedy relief.

I do not desire to prolong this discussion, but felt impelled to make that statement in behalf of the committee of which I was a member. I was not charged with the conduct of this measure before this body, but as a member of the committee myself, and being somewhat conversant with the views which were presented in support of the resolution, I felt it due that this statement should be made.

Now, as to the language of the resolution—Mr. HENDERSON. If my colleague will permit me, before he proceeds any further, I desire to inquire whether he alludes to any remark made by me as charging the committee with deliberating in a spirit of revenge? I did not intend to make any such charge, neither against the gentleman nor against the committee. I simply gave the construction which I thought the resolution would bear. I have no idea that any member of the committee desires to carry out against the enemy, or against anybody, a spirit of revenge. I merely desired to state that I thought such a construction could be given to the resolution, and that such a construction would be likely to be given to it in the eyes of the civilized world.

Mr. BROWN. I did not intend to impute such an intent to the Senator at all. It was in response to a remark that fell from some one else, I forget now whom, that the disclaimer was made.

Mr. President, I differ from some Senators who have preceded me in regard to the construction which should be placed upon this resolution. I think that the language, when read carefully and read in connection, shows that the whole of the resolution is prospective; that while it is predicated upon a state of facts that still exist, and which calls for retaliation, it does not necessarily imply that that retaliation shall be, instance for instance, case for case, the present for the past; but, on the contrary, it is intended to apply to the future, to go into effect now, and to have its efficacy in the hereafter, and to terminate this treatment of our prisoners. It implies notice, necessarily, to the enemy, and thereby gives them opportunity in advance to avoid retaliation by practicing humanity. If the language of the committee is defective in that respect, I am not at all wedded to it, and shall be very glad to see it corrected so as to correspond with the evident intent and meaning which a connected reading carries along with it. In proof of this, I will call attention to the last clause of the resolution, which says:

“Congress do not, however, intend by this resolution to limit or restrict the power of the President to the modes or principles of retaliation herein mentioned, but only to advise a resort to them as demanded by the occasion.”

That is the concluding sentence, and serves as a key-note to the whole context. It shows that the evident intent was that the principle should be asserted and should be applied, and that the President, as the Executive Officer of the Government, charged with its execution, was not to be understood as being limited in his action by any suggestion which might be contained in the body of that resolution. I think that language is sufficient to take it out of the exception which has been taken against it by several Senators. At all events, I say that such was the design; and if it has not been satisfactorily set forth, I will be glad if it shall be perfected so as to do so more explicitly.

One point, however, deserves a passing allusion here. The only detail in which the application of this doctrine of retaliation is suggested, is in regard to food, diet, medical attendance, &c., to be graduated toward their prisoners by the same scale applied to our prisoners. It was believed by the committee that the suggestion thrown out presented the most decisive mode of arriving at a true solution of this difficulty. It was felt that there could be no better criterion, no better mode of bringing the rebel authorities to a sense of what they were practicing themselves, than by this specific manner of retaliating in kind, which is here suggested. It would array their inhumanity on our side, and make it speak trumpet-tongued to their hearts, appealing to them to desist from such practices; not alone against our soldiers, but against their soldiers.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. Foor in the chair.) Will the Senator suspend his remarks to receive a message from the House of Representatives?

Mr. BROWN. Certainly.

DEFICIENCY BILL.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPherson, its Clerk, announced that the House had receded from its disagreement to the amendment numbered one, two, six, seven, and eight of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 620) to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1865, and adhered to its disagreement to the fourth amendment of the Senate.

Mr. CLARK. I ask the indulgence of the Senate to make a report from the committee of conference on that bill, in order to dispose of it.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the report; which was read, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments to the bill of the House (H. R. No. 620) to supply the deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1865, having met, after full and free conference, have been unable to agree.

DANIEL CLARK,
LYMAN TRUMBULL,
LAZARUS W. POWELL,
Managers on the part of the Senate.
R. C. SCHENCK,
D. W. C. LITTLEJOHN,
S. J. RANDALL,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. CLARK. I move that the Senate adhere to their amendment to the bill, and on that question I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. CLARK. I will state to the Senate what the amendment is, so that the question will be intelligibly before the Senate. There were six or seven points upon which the House of Representatives and the Senate disagreed. One of those points was the payment by the House of Representatives of twenty per cent. extra compensation to their employes for the last session. The House have agreed to every other amendment of the Senate but the one striking out that provision for the payment of the employes. I will give a little history of the matter, so that the Senate may understand it.

At the last session the House passed a resolution paying their employes twenty per cent. more than the regular salary for that session. This they could not do because it was in the face and eyes of the law of 1858, which provided that neither of the two Houses should pay to their employes any gratuity of that kind out of its contingent fund. When the matter came to the Comptroller of the Treasury he refused to allow it, and so it could not be paid and was not paid. When the deficiency bill came before the House they inserted in it a provision that that gratuity, if you call it so, it was not a deficiency certainly, should be authorized and legalized by law; that is, that the Senate should agree to it. The Senate struck out that provision, and would not agree that the House should pay this twenty per cent. out of its contingent fund. We had one committee of conference and they did not agree upon it. We had another committee of conference, and found that we could agree to everything else, but came to the conclusion that we could not agree to this. It then went back to the House. The House have agreed to all our amendments with the exception of the one striking out the provision allowing them to pay their employes twenty per cent. extra, and on that they have adhered. They choose that this deficiency bill shall fail unless they can force the Senate to agree to what is contrary to law. We decided it by a vote of 37 to 1 the other day, and I move now that the Senate adhere to its amendment, and let the bill fail rather than the Senate should be forced to do what is contrary to law by such a process as this.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. FOOT.) The Secretary will read the action of the House upon the bill before the question is taken upon the pending motion.

The Secretary read, as follows:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
January 23, 1865.

Resolved, That the House recede from their disagreement to the amendments of the Senate to the bill of the House No. 630, to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1865, numbered one, two, six, seven, and eight.

Resolved, That the House adhere to their disagreement to the amendment of the Senate to the said bill numbered four, which proposes to strike out all on page 4 from line twenty-two to line eight on page 5, inclusive, in the following words:

To enable the Clerk of the House of Representatives to execute the resolutions of the House of July 4, 1864, directing payment of additional compensation to its officers, clerks, and other employes, and to the House reporters for the Congressional Globe, a sum sufficient for that purpose, being $37,991 40, is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, and the same is hereby added to the contingent fund of the House of Representatives; but no payment shall be made under this provision to any other persons than the clerks, officers, and other employes of the House, and the reporters for the Congressional Globe.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate amended the House bill by striking out the words which have just been read. The House of Representatives disagreed to that amendment. Upon the first committee of conference the committee divided and disagreed in reference to that amendment and were discharged. A new committee of conference was appointed, and that committee disagreed as to this amendment. The House have receded from their disagreement to all the other amendments of the Senate and adhered to their disagreement to this amendment. The Senator from New Hampshire, as chairman of the committee of conference, now moves that the Senate adhere to this amendment, and upon that question the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 38, nays 1; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Brown, Buckalew, Clark, Colman, Conness, Cowan, Davis, Dixon, Doolittle, Farwell, Foot, Foster, Grimes, Harding, Harlan, Harris, Henderson, Hendricks, Hicks, Howard, Howe, Johnson, Lane of Indiana, Morgan, Morrill, Pomeroi, Powell, Ramsey, Richardson, Riddle, Saulsbury, Sprague, Sumner, Ten Eyck, Trumbull, Wade, and Wright—35.

NAY—Mr. Carlile—1.

ABSENT—Messrs. Chandler, Hale, Lane of Kansas, McDougall, Nesmith, Sherman, Van Winkle, Wilkinson, Willey, and Wilson—10.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion to adhere prevails, and the bill fails upon the disagreement between the two Houses.

RETALIATION ON REBEL PRISONERS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (S. R. No. 97) advising retaliation for the cruel treatment of prisoners by the insurgents.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President, if I have been successful in presenting the grounds upon which the committee arrived at the opinion that the time for measures of retaliation had come, and have carried forward Senators to concur in the argument so far, I think I shall have little difficulty in justifying the committee further in any suggestions it may have made as to the modes of that retaliation. With this specific understanding in advance, that it was not intended to limit or restrict the action of the executive department of the Government to any suggestions that have been made, it was yet deemed proper by the committee that they should make those suggestions, because they struck them as favorable toward the end to be accomplished. Now what is the clause to which exception is taken? After affirming the doctrine of retaliation, the resolution goes on to say:

"That such officers ought to be subjected to like treatment practiced toward our officers or soldiers in the hands of the insurgents, in respect to quantity and quality of food, clothing, fuel, medicine, medical attendance, personal exposure, or other mode of dealing with them."

And for that purpose, and in view of getting at appreciative justice in the case, it is submitted that those of our prisoners who have been in their hands shall be, as far as practicable, made their custodians. Now I ask Senators to put the question to themselves, where is the difference in principle between setting apart soldiers of theirs with the notification that they will be shot on the morrow if the putting our captured soldiers in front of their breastworks is not desisted from, or taking soldiers of theirs and placing them in such positions that they will be exposed to their own artillery in retaliation for like treatment on their part of our soldiers—where is the difference in principle between those measures—both of which, recollect, accomplished the desired result, and taking their prisoners, and saying, "We will subject you to the same treatment, in regard to diet and food, that you subject ours, and if you persist in systematically subjecting our men to such inhuman cruelties, remember you will cause the same to be visited on your own officers. You have the option. It rests with you." For one, I do not see the distinction; and for one, I am free to say that, so far as the question of humanity is involved, so far as any barbarism goes to the root of the question, the more inhuman and the more barbarous the treatment is, the greater the necessity for adopting the retaliation in order to make it cease. I say that the more you pile up the epithets in denunciation of this course, the more you accumulate the reasons why you should resort to the ultimate measure that will produce a stoppage of it in the face of the failure of all others to do so. At least such is the manner in which it strikes my own mind. If it be true that our soldiers are being systematically and intentionally starved to death, then I say that the call of this whole country is imperative upon us to give notice that we will resort to retaliation even in kind if it will produce the desired result and stop this process of destruction.

What shall we say to the rebels—If you are inhuman up to a certain point we will retaliate in order to make you cease, but if you go beyond that point then we shall stop; you may do so with impunity, we will not resort to the only mode that will bring you to a sense of your barbarism? Is that the doctrine Senators would advance? Must we offer them a premium on cruelty to our prisoners in our squeamishness and sensitiveness about the modes of retaliation and the measure of retaliation? Shall we say we are more sensitive about our own conventional modes of putting to the death, if it should ever come to that, which it never would, than we are about the starving, dying thousands of our soldiers being executed slowly in southern prisons? But that is the most extreme view that can be taken, and there is no likelihood that it would result in such infliction upon their prisoners up to the point of starvation or anything like it. That is all clap-trap. At least it cannot be thrown out with any propriety as a reflection against the committee, for their conviction, witnessed by the very introduction of this resolution that it would be efficacious to stop these barbarous practices of the enemy, is also conclusive against their having to be carried out to their extremity by ourselves. But do not let us indicate a point beyond which we dare follow, and say if you go on with your barbarism beyond that point you may be cruel with impunity inasmuch as I will not retaliate.

I do not think, therefore, that anything can be established against the justice of this resolution by depicting the inhumanity of the course of the rebel authorities. On the contrary, every argument which is presented showing it to be in contrast with the usages of civilized war goes the more conclusively to demonstrate the necessity of our taking such action here and now as will put a period to it summarily. We have seen by the results of retaliation in other instances that the surest and the swiftest mode of terminating such outrages is to give notice that we will retaliate like for like, even unto death. What then shall commend us to a sickly sentimentality in this instance and in presence of so dire a continuing outrage?

Mr. President, let me say, therefore, that while I believe I am naturally as humane as other Senators, while I claim to be as much influenced by the moral sentiment of the community at large and by those general principles which obtain among civilized people, I cannot in this matter, and with the facts that are so fully evidenced, hesitate to recommend that that very measure shall be adopted which now presents itself as the only one which in my estimation will produce the desired result of stopping the present treatment of our prisoners in the South. If Senators could show me any other mode that would produce the result more speedily, if they could show me any other mode that had not been tried, and failed, if they could show any feasible resort that would result in putting a period to these barbarities, I should be exceedingly glad to adopt it; but I say, that having been forced to the doctrine of retaliation as we now are, having predicated it upon the ground that a necessity has arrived for putting it in force, you have no right to shrink and cry horror at the modes of doing it and say those commissioned to give practical effect to your views are acting with inhumanity in recommending its most common application of like for like. Is it not inhuman to place one of the enemy's soldiers before your breastworks when they are firing upon it? So does the measure suggested by the committee partake of great harshness. Can you, however, draw the lines of inhumanity so that they will exclude the one and include the other? Clearly not. Therefore, such fact itself is evidence conclusive that that mode of reasoning cannot apply to the case; that in accepting the doctrine you accept its consequences, and you justify your resort and at last justify your own humanity, not in narrow technical modes of punishment and death, but in the broad fact that it will stop such barbarous cruelties on their part and necessarily preclude it on yours.

Nor can I understand the objection which is taken to this procedure by those Senators especially who proclaim that our soldiers in southern prisons are not being treated with inhumanity, who declare here that all this common sentiment of the country which has come to them by the skeletons who have returned from those prisons, and who have testified around all the firesides in the land, is a living lie; that these confederates are treating them with humanity, with kindness, with consideration, and with full and abundant living, and that they are not guilty of the gross barbarities charged. When that declaration is set forth by Senators, they deprive themselves of any retort upon this measure as a measure of inhumanity; they answer their own argument; they cut themselves off criminating others. If there is no such treatment going on there, if these evidences are all fallacious, if it is not true, how is it going to be an act of inhumanity to put their soldiers on the same rations? Facts will govern the case; notice will precede it; all the charities will guard the execution. Now, then, can it prove a measure of cruelty if there is no cruelty to measure it out by? The answer is conclusive, and cannot be gainsaid.

Mr. President, so far as the joint resolution is concerned, I am not wedded to the suggestion which is contained in the body of it. I am perfectly content that that matter should be left to the discrimination of the executive branch of the Government. I am not insisting that we shall set out here and now all the modes by which retaliation shall be exercised; but in one point I would be very glad if the resolution were somewhat stronger than it is. I would be better satisfied if this resolution, instead of being simply suggestive, were mandatory upon the Executive of the United States. I should be rejoiced if this Senate here to-day would take upon itself the responsibility to pass a joint resolution notifying the President of the United States that the time for putting a period to the suffering of our starving soldiers in the rebel prisons had come, and requiring it of him as a duty that he should apply the principle of retaliation. In that respect I should like to see the resolution more emphatic than it has been reported by the committee. I simply state that, however, as my own sentiment, not as the sentiment of the committee, for I believe that view was not concurred in when it was presented there.

Mr. President, in concluding what I have to say, permit me to add one other remark, and that is in reply to some allusions which have been made by Senators to those Christian principles, which should govern us in the conduct of our affairs. My colleague, I believe, presented the argument, and if I mistake not the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SUMNER] presented the proposition. Sir, I profess myself to be a Christian. I trust that I am as much actuated by such sentiments as any other Senator. I certainly hold myself amenable to the full force of all such arguments, and would be loth to cast any reflection upon any doubt that might arise in the most sensitive conscience; but I do not see the application in this instance of the moralities which the Senators have invoked, and I cannot understand how, unless they are carried up to the point of non-resistance altogether, you can make them obtain in a state of war. I do not see how you can apply specialties of the moral law designed to govern the individual relations of men in civil society to the treatment of prisoners, to the punishments of State, to the conduct of armies, to all the exigencies of a general state of war; and I, therefore, must confess very frankly that I do not feel the force of that portion of the argument, or that portion of the proposition which has been presented in this body which indicates that in all this matter we must return good for evil; that where our own prisoners are inhumanly butchered and maltreated, we must make it the text for exceeding excellent treatment on our side; that we must reciprocate, but we must reciprocate with increased tenderness and care; for, sir—and the argument with me is conclusive—if you are to apply it at all, it will obliterate your state of war; it will disturb your armies, and reduce you to the attitude of submission and non-resistance; a doctrine in which I do not concur in any sense. I believe, sir, that the doctrine of self-defense takes precedence of many of those tenets which otherwise are of binding force, and resting firm in that faith I propose to apply its principles here and now.

Mr. FOSTER obtained the floor.

Mr. WADE. Before the Senator proceeds I have an amendment that I intend to offer to this resolution.

Mr. FOSTER. I will give way to the Senator from Ohio to enable him to offer his amendment.

Mr. WADE. I propose to strike out all of the resolution after the word "retaliation," in the seventh line, leaving the preceding portion and the preamble to stand as they are, and insert what I send to the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be read for the information of the Senate, it not being in order now to consider it.

Mr. WADE. I do not ask for its present consideration. I only ask that it be read for information.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be read as an amendment to be offered when in order.

The Secretary read the amendment; which was to strike out all of the resolution after the word "retaliation," in the seventh line, in the following words:

That in our opinion such retaliation ought to be inflicted upon the insurgent officers now in our hands, or hereafter to fall into our hands as prisoners; that such officers ought to be subjected to like treatment practiced toward our officers or soldiers in the hands of the insurgents, in respect to quantity and quality of food, clothing, fuel, medicine, medical attendance, personal exposure, or other mode of dealing with them; that with a view to the same ends, the insurgent prisoners in our hands ought to be placed under the control and in the keeping of officers and men who have themselves been prisoners in the hands of the insurgents, and have thus acquired a knowledge of their mode of treating Union prisoners; that explicit instructions ought to be given to the forces having the charge of such insurgent prisoners, requiring them to carry out strictly and promptly the principles of this resolution in every case, until the President, having received satisfactory information of the abandonment by the insurgents of such barbarous practices, shall revoke or modify said instructions. Congress do not, however, intend by this resolution to limit or restrict the power of the President to the modes or principles of retaliation herein mentioned, but only to advise a resort to them as demanded by the occasion.

And to insert in lieu thereof:

That the executive and military authorities of the United States are hereby directed to retaliate upon the prisoners of the enemy in such manner and kind as shall be effective in deterring him from the perpetration in future of cruel and barbarous treatment of our soldiers.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The immediate question now before the Senate is on the amendment moved by the Senator from Massachusetts, the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, [Mr. WILSON,] to the amendment moved by his colleague [Mr. SUMNER.] That is the question now pending.

Mr. WADE. I will barely say that I shall move the proposition which has been read as an amendment at the proper time. I want to make this resolution mandatory upon the Executive.

Mr. HOWARD. Where does the Senator from Ohio propose that his amendment shall come in?

Mr. WADE. After the word "retaliation" in the seventh line.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will inquire of the Senator from Ohio if his proposition is a proposition to amend the original resolution by way of perfecting it before the question is taken on the motion to strike out?

Mr. WADE. Certainly.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If that be so, it is in order now, and must be considered prior to the amendment moved by the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. WADE. Then I offer it now.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. President, it ought, perhaps, to be no matter of surprise that upon a question involving the application of the doctrine of retaliation to prisoners of war there should be a difference of opinion. It is a great question; broad, comprehensive, imposing. It is difficult to make up one's own opinion, at least I find some difficulty in coming to a precise and definite conclusion as to the course we should adopt. That we should differ, therefore, among ourselves is to be expected, and I am not surprised at it.

But, sir, I am surprised that any gentleman in this Chamber, or any intelligent man in this country, should now express a doubt whether our prisoners in the hands of the rebels from the first day of the war have not been treated inhumanly, barbarously, cruelly, and that this treatment continues to the present time. I am astonished, astonished beyond measure, especially that an honorable Senator so intelligent, so well-informed as the honorable Senator from Indiana [Mr. HENDRICKS] should express a doubt, as he did yesterday, upon this subject.

Indeed, I understood him to go further, and to assert that from knowledge obtained by him of prisoners who had returned home from rebel prisons, he believed that the general treatment of our prisoners was good; and he referred to an officer, to a Captain Flynn, to whose good character he gave his own sanction, to corroborate his own statement. This man, having been a prisoner in Libby prison, at Richmond, for a considerable time, bore witness, as the honorable Senator from Indiana stated, to the good treatment of the prisoners in that prison. I certainly cannot deny that this man had the means of knowledge, and if the honorable Senator from Indiana affirms him to be a respectable man, and that he makes this statement, so far as that officer is concerned, far be it from me to deny or to contradict it; but, sir, I know men, and many of them, as respectable as Captain Flynn, let him be ever so respectable, who were confined in that prison for months, whose treatment, as well as that of their fellow-prisoners, was such as would disgrace savages.

The honorable Senator from Michigan [Mr. HOWARD] yesterday read from the report of a committee appointed by the Sanitary Commission; and the honorable Senator from Indiana, I will not say sneered at the document, but intimated that it was from no official source, and that testimony from such a quarter was scarcely worthy of credit. Sir, we all know that the gentlemen composing that committee are among the most respectable men in our land. It is true they were not members of Congress; they were not politicians; and there may be those in the country who think that their qualifications to perform this duty correctly were none the less for those reasons. They were intelligent, educated men; they were men of high moral and intellectual character, some of them I know personally; and the country knows them all. Those men have brought forward a mass of testimony upon this subject which it seems to me would convince the most skeptical.

One of the officers whose testimony they took, I think his name was mentioned by the honorable Senator from Michigan yesterday, Lieutenant Colonel Farnsworth, is a man whom I know intimately. He is a native of my own town, and was born next door to my own residence. I have known him from his cradle. He was an officer in our Connecticut cavalry, and served in the valley of the Shenandoah, a brave, dashing officer; no man more gallant, and he is a man whose word is entirely reliable. He gives his testimony in that report, and from personal conversations with him I know that the treatment of the prisoners in the Libby prison while he was an inmate was as I have before described it, disgraceful; it would disgrace savages.

The honorable Senator from Missouri who has just taken his seat [Mr. BROWN] alluded to the report of the committee on the conduct of the war. That certainly is not obnoxious to the charge made against the document read by the honorable Senator from Michigan. That document, which comes from a committee of our own body, at the head of which is the honorable Senator from Ohio, [Mr. WADE,] has also testimony upon this subject, conclusive, as it seems to me, to the mind of every intelligent man who reads it. And lost there should be those who would not believe what is stated there, it being almost too horrible to be credited, the portraits of the men who were subjected to this treatment—not portraits painted from fancy, but photographs taken from life, taken of men in the agonies of death—are added to attest the correctness of the fact that our prisoners were treated in the way I have described.

Sir, it is too late to make a question in regard to the manner in which our prisoners have been and are treated. Who of us does not get letters daily, or almost daily, in regard to our soldiers who come home famished, diseased, and perishing, from starvation and ill treatment, or whose remains are brought home for burial? I have one on my desk at this moment, written only a few days ago, on the 17th of January, 1865, from a neighbor of mine, a gentleman of the highest respectability. He says:

"On Friday of last week we buried Herbert Beckwith from our church. He was starved and frozen in a rebel prison, brought to Annapolis on the 24th of December very low, rallied a little at the sight of our flag and from knowing that he was under the protection of his Government, but died from actual starvation on the 30th. If there is any power at Washington which can by any possibility release our starving men from the fendish grasp of the enemy, they would only require to look upon the dead face of such a one as Beckwith in order to act with all their might."

This young man was a near neighbor of mine; I think under twenty years of age. He went into the service for the defense of his country as full of life and hope as any young man, served faithfully, was taken prisoner, and this is now his history.

Nor, Mr. President, is this treatment confined to any one locality. It was only the last week that I conversed with an officer of the seventh Connecticut volunteers who had but just escaped from Richland jail in Columbia, South Carolina. He succeeded, after several previous attempts, which failed, in finally making his escape. He made an attempt at escape in the early part of November. He, with two other officers, passed down the Congaree river in a very small boat, large enough to contain two persons, but not large enough to float three in safety. As they would be observed from the shore during the day, they had to lay up their boat to the bank, and conceal it, and pass down the river during the night. On a very dark, foggy night, following the 8th of November, the day of our presidential election, the boat struck a snag in the middle of the river, and upset near a railroad bridge, where the water was between twenty and thirty feet deep, and running rapidly. After struggling a long while, and until they had nearly perished, they finally succeeded in getting up the bank to the shore, but in such a worn-out condition that they were unable to stand. They were soon retaken by some rebel soldiers who were guarding the bridge, and sent back to Columbia.

This officer succeeded in again escaping in the latter part of December, I think on the 24th, and this time there were thirteen others with him. They procured, through the kindness of some negroes upon the river, a flat-boat large enough to carry fifty cords of wood, and upon that boat they made their way down the river again by night, laying by day, provision being supplied by the kind blacks upon the shore, every one of whom always offered them whatever they had. My friend had a considerable amount of Confederate money with him which he paid liberally to the negroes, they, by the way, saying they would give all they had to these Yankee officers, bidding "God bless them," and saying to them that if they could do it they would put wings on them that they might fly. That was the expression of one of the negroes: "God bless you, massa, I would put wings on you if I could, and you should fly home to your wife and children."

It was under these circumstances that they went down the river, and this time succeeded in getting to its mouth at the ocean, the Congaree being one of the branches of the Santee, which flows into the ocean near Georgetown, about fifty miles above Charleston, South Carolina. Here they signalized a gunboat which lay off shore, and they were taken on board in a pitiable condition, having been obliged to live for some days upon raw sweet potatoes, not daring to make a fire for fear they should be discovered.

I inquired of this officer, Captain Dennis, as to the treatment, so far as provisions were concerned, of these men at Richland while he was there and when he came away, and he gave me the ration. He said that five days' rations were now given out to them at once, and the ration for five days was five pints of Indian meal, a few pinches of salt, and occasionally—not uniformly, but occasionally—a small quantity of sorghum, which was little more than dirty molasses and water, the water predominating.

This was the whole ration for five days, and it amounts to one pint of Indian meal, a little salt, and possibly a little sorghum per day. No means were furnished for cooking it; no utensils, nothing at all but the bare pint of Indian meal with a little salt, and possibly a little of this sorghum; this alone to sustain life from day to day. Mr. President, will any man say that this is not inhuman, barbarous, shocking to humanity? It may keep men alive for a short time; but we all know that a man confined to such a diet after no very long period of time must either lose his health and impair his constitution or perish. It is impossible that human life should be sustained and that a man should be comfortable for any length of time on a diet so meager as that.

These and other facts to which I might allude, and which I presume all intelligent men of the country know as well as I do, make me wonder why anybody should entertain a doubt as to how our prisoners are treated. If such testimony does not satisfy them, they would hardly be persuaded though one rose from the dead.

This Captain Dennis, I can assure the Senate, is a most trustworthy and reliable man. He was a captain in the seventh Connecticut, a brave regiment worthy of their leader; and when I tell you that their leader was General Alfred H. Terry, that it was his old regiment, the Senate will understand me. After General Terry ceased to command it it was commanded by a man whose name is not unknown in this war, General Joseph Hawley. I say that Captain Dennis was a man worthy to be the peer of men like General Terry and General Hawley; and when he states facts of this kind every man may believe, and, indeed, may know, so far as we can know from human statement, that what he says is true. He was in six different prisons; the treatment varied, but it was best at Charleston, and as that locality has much to answer for it ought to be known, that they may have the credit for it.

So much, Mr. President, for the point whether our men are well or ill treated; but the question is, what shall we do? What shall be done so that this treatment may be changed? It is a question not without its difficulties; and although, as I suggested in the outset, it is not strange that there should be differences of opinion upon it, yet our differences—so far as they have been developed here—are by no means so great as at first they would seem to be. While on one side the doctrine of retaliation is insisted upon, is it denied on the other? No, Mr. President. I do not understand that anybody here has undertaken to assert that retaliation, to a certain extent, is not just and proper in time of war.

But as to how far this principle shall go there is a difference, at first a wide difference. On the one side it is asserted that the retaliation should be like for like; that is, whatever our enemy does to our prisoners in his hands, we should do, and do in the same way, to his prisoners in our hands. All cannot agree to that, and indeed I have hardly heard anybody assert that the doctrine to that extent is to be justified. If any Senator does assert it, when he comes to the practical question he shrinks from applying the test. When it is asked, "If the enemy scalp or burn a prisoner, shall we scalp or burn a prisoner whom we take from him?" everybody says no; nobody advocates that. If the rebels when they take our men prisoners sell them into slavery, shall we, when we take their men prisoners, sell them into slavery? I do not understand that anybody argues for that.

What, then, is the difference between those who assert that retaliation is a proper mode of proceeding, and those who assert that it is not? Simply this, that certain persons will go to one extent in applying the principle of like for like; certain others will go a little further, but all will stop at some point.

There is no question but that by the laws and practices of nations retaliation within certain limits is now recognized. It was practiced by us in former wars. It was practiced in the revolutionary war. It was practiced in the war of 1812. I remember a particular case. Commodore Hull, in the Constitution, captured the British frigate Guerriere and brought in the prisoners whom he captured on board that ship. A number of our men were at that time held as prisoners by the British at Halifax. They had been all, I think, but six discharged, exchanged in a cartel; and six were held, who they claimed were British subjects, although taken fighting in our Navy, and they claimed the right to hold them and hang them as traitors to the British flag.

Mr. COLLAMER. They claimed that they were deserters from the British navy.

Mr. FOSTER. Yes, as my friend from Vermont suggests, the British claimed that those men were deserters from the British navy, and that as deserters and traitors to their flag they were to be hanged under the rules of war. The prisoners of the British frigate Guerriere were placed in a cartel and put under the charge of an officer, and as he was sailing out of the harbor of Boston he met the frigate President, Commodore Rodgers, coming in, and Commodore Rodgers stopped this cartel, gave to her commanding officer this information from Halifax that the British were holding back six sailors under these circumstances whom they threatened to hang and would not exchange; then directed the officer in charge of the cartel to muster all the crew of the Guerriere who were on board, and as he passed along the line of those prisoners to select twelve of the finest and most athletic men of the lot and take them on board the President as he was going into Boston, and should hold those twelve men as hostages whom he would hang if the British admiral hung the six sailors in Halifax. Then the cartel went on.

When the British admiral at Halifax heard of this state of things, he discharged five of those men to begin with, and Commodore Rodgers discharged ten of the men thus taken from the Guerriere, holding two. Before the war was over, the man held at Halifax was exchanged and discharged, and then the two whom we held were also discharged.

Mr. President, I believe in retaliation to that extent certainly. I believe in retaliation to that extent, that if the rebels take our prisoners and shoot or hang them we should take their prisoners and shoot or hang them; but if they take our prisoners and torture them by scalping them or in any other mode practiced by savages and not by civilized nations, I do not think we should adopt the same practice, and I do not understand that any man here claims that we can or ought to do that.

I do not understand the honorable Senator from Ohio, who is very frank and very decided on this subject, to claim that any such practice as that should be resorted to by any means. He agrees with the honorable Senator from Pennsylvania on that point, I believe. As I before suggested, when we come to put a distinct case, the difference is much less than when we are talking about an abstract principle which we do not apply to a particular case. The honorable Senator from Ohio says, "I believe in this doctrine of retaliation, like for like; as they treat our men, so will we treat theirs." The honorable Senator from Pennsylvania says, "No, I do not believe in that." And when he asks the honorable Senator from Ohio "Would you scalp a man because the enemy scalps one of our men?" the latter answers, "No."

There is not, then, a difference in the application of the principle, although there is a difference on the general principle, and so, as I believe, in regard to every practical question that has been put here, there has been an agreement even between those who seem to differ most widely, unless it be on the single question of starving a man to death, and I have not heard anybody as yet avow the belief that it was right or just to put a man in prison and starve him to death, even although the rebels have done it and it may be are doing it.

It is urged, as I understand it, that the threat will be available, and that if we say we will do this thing it will work out the deliverance of our soldiers. If saying so will do it without our performing this deed of cruelty, I am for saying it; but I am not in favor of starving a man to death because the rebels starve our prisoners to death. Even in view of such letters as those I have read, showing such treatment to young men who were born, have lived, and grown up near my own house, I cannot agree to take a young man from South Carolina or anywhere else, and starve him to death in the same manner by way of retaliation. I can no more do that than I can vote to sell him into slavery, or to scalp him, or commit any atrocity on his remains after he is dead, which, as I suppose, has been done by the enemy more than once. As I suppose and believe, on what I think is good evidence, though I do not know the fact personally, even our dead who have fallen like brave men on the battle-field have been mutilated, their bones have been taken and used as ornaments, trophies of the prowess of the southern chivalry over the northern Yankee.

Sir, human nature shrinks back from retaliation of that description. And we are not, as compared with these rebels, standing on equal ground with them on this subject. We are a nation. We have a history. It is true we have not been a nation for centuries, but we have been a nation for many years, and I for one, as an American citizen, am proud of the history of the United States of America. I am not for doing anything which shall tarnish the fair fame and the glory of this nation either in peace or in war.

Who are our opponents? They have never yet been admitted into the family of nations, and I trust in God never will be. They are unworthy of a seat in a congress of nations. In any place where nations are recognized they are not, and ought not to be, and will not be recognized. They are a band of insurgents, robbers, traitors, malefactors on land, pirates on the deep; and because such men descend to what would disgrace savages in the treatment of prisoners, not disgracing any national name, for they have no national name to disgrace, shall we, who are citizens of the United States of America, each man feeling that he has a part of the national honor and character to sustain, do that which disgraces them? No, Mr. President; no, no, no.

I would go as far, I trust, as the honorable Senator from Ohio to relieve our men; but I believe that if that Senator and myself were set to guard prisoners under an order that they should be kept on such rations that they would starve and perish, the honorable Senator from Ohio, quite as soon as I, would from his own pocket take his last crust or his last morsel rather than see a fellow-being perish with hunger. I know he would. The generosity of his own heart would compel it.

The honorable Senator from Indiana who is near me [Mr. LANE] made a mistake, if he will allow me to say so, in suggesting that if this policy were adopted and carried out the soldiers and officers who had been in southern prisons, and had been subjected to this treatment, should be the men set to guard the prisoners and carry into effect these orders. These men having felt the awful pangs, which none but he who feels knows, of dying by hunger and starvation, would not inflict even upon one who had inflicted it upon them the same torture. They might blow his brains out with a musket, or run him through with a bayonet, but they would never starve him to death and stand by looking on. Much less would such a man do it to one who had been taken in fair fight—fair, I mean, so far as the fight itself was concerned, not fair in the fact that the man was properly engaged in it—who had surrendered, dropped his weapons, and given himself up to the mercy of his captors as a prisoner of war.

The honorable Senator from Indiana has himself been a soldier, and a brave one, before he was a Senator. He would not do this thing, I am sure he never would. He must get some other guard around these men than brave soldiers who have served in battle and suffered in prison. The brave are always generous. The pirates and robbers who do these deeds are not brave men. Even those men who have suffered tell us over and over again that occasionally some brave man who had fought against them, perhaps in the field, has surreptitiously, and in danger sometimes of being punished, slipped a loaf of bread or a piece of meat into the hands of these starving men. It is impossible but that nature will finally assert her dominion in the minds of men who have a heart; and brave men have a heart that can always be appealed to.

Now, Mr. President, in regard to these propositions that are before the Senate, I esteem the one introduced by the honorable Senator from Massachusetts, the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, [Mr. WILSON,] as the one which is the most likely to work out a practical result. I am for that which is the most practicable, believing that the great object which we have in view is to relieve these men. I know it is the object of the honorable Senator from Ohio [Mr. WADSWORTH] and the honorable Senator from Indiana, [Mr. LANE,] I am sure it is. It is a principle of humanity which moves those Senators to the course they advocate, and I respect them for it. I go with them as it regards the result to be obtained, but I am compelled to differ from them in regard to the means to be used.

The proposition of the honorable Senator from Massachusetts, the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, it seems to me will be the most practically beneficial to our men; meantime, certainly, the Executive can, as I suggested, and it is his duty, take all means which he can take lawfully, constitutionally, properly to ameliorate the condition of those men if he cannot secure their exchange, which is his first duty. If this proposition shall succeed, it will succeed sooner than any other, because it can be the soonest made available. The other process of course would be one comparatively slow, for we have in the first place to give notice to the rebel authorities that unless they change their course we shall retaliate. That is contemplated. It may be that I am wrong in saying that notice is to be given.

Mr. COLLAMER. It is not contemplated in the resolution.

Mr. FOSTER. It may not be in the resolution, but of course it would be understood that the rebels should at some period, and that very early, understand that we have adopted this plan, or it would be of no use. Every one would say that it is certainly of no use to adopt a policy of starving men by way of retaliation unless we let them know it. That would be mere wantonness. We are, then, to let them know it.

Mr. JOHNSON. But to starve first, according to the resolution.

Mr. FOSTER. I hardly believe that is what the honorable gentlemen who advocate the resolution intend; I do not so understand them. I do not understand that anybody would advocate the shutting up of a given number of prisoners here, and going immediately to commence the process of starvation. I suppose that is not meant, but, as I suggested, the meaning is that they shall have reasonable notice of this intention; and that we shall proceed then promptly and energetically with this mode of retaliation in order to relieve our men. That will take time. It will take time to ascertain whether they have changed their policy, and meanwhile our prisoners are suffering.

We can send, or at least make the proposition to send, to Richmond in order to ascertain whether steps may not be taken to relieve our prisoners from this terrible suffering. If it can be done, and done at once, the object is accomplished. If it is refused, and nothing can be done in that way, then the course which the gentlemen propose is certainly open to us, and it seems to me we shall lose very little by the short delay of making this attempt first. I am therefore for the proposition of the honorable Senator from Massachusetts who heads the Military Committee. He is not now in his seat, and I can therefore say, and it is but a proper tribute to him to state, that, being connected as he is with our military affairs, he knows, I will not say better than the rest of us, but he knows, I confess, better than I, what will be most likely to effect the object we have in view.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Before the Senator from Connecticut closes his remarks I wish to correct him in one respect. He did me the honor to refer to the argument that I presented to the Senate on this subject yesterday evening. I know the Senator would not designedly misrepresent what I said, for there is no person within these walls, or outside of these walls, who, I think, would be more frank in the statement of the position occupied by one with whom he does not agree than the Senator from Connecticut. But he evidently did misunderstand my remarks on the subject to which he alluded in the commencement of his speech. I understood him to say that I had assumed that there were not cruelties inflicted on our soldiers in southern prisons. Sir, I did not say that; I did not wish to be so understood. The Senator from Michigan [Mr. HOWARD] asked me a very pointed question, and in reply I said—I read from the Globe, as taken by the reporter, without my having seen it from the time I spoke until it appeared in print—

"The Senator asks whether he understands that I have said that our own prisoners were treated as well as their guards. I did not say so. He has read testimony here taken by a commission in respect to Libby prison. I have given the statement of an honest man who was a prisoner there for months, a part of the time in a dungeon, selected by lot to be shot. When he came home he made this statement to his neighbors. I have no doubt that there have been cruelties inflicted on the Union prisoners in southern prisons, and that is one reason why I want them brought home; but I do not believe that it has gone to the extent reported in the country."

That is my judgment. I have no doubt there were cruelties very shocking indeed, but not to the extent as reported in the country. I further said:

"I do not believe, upon the information I have on the subject, that it is at all to the extent stated in the pamphlet from which the Senator read to-day."

This is the substance of what I said on the subject. I do not doubt now, I will repeat, that there have been cruelties, not justified by the usages of Christian warfare, inflicted on our prisoners in the South. That is a reason, and a very strong reason, governing me in demanding that an honorable exchange shall be made, and that they shall be brought home.

Mr. FOSTER. I certainly did not, as the honorable Senator does me the justice to state, intend to misrepresent him. I did understand him as I stated. Perhaps I was wrong in so understanding him; of course I was wrong if he disavows it; but when he spoke of the testimony borne by Captain Flinn in regard to the treatment, I think he said that Captain Flinn represented his treatment at Libby to have been good, so far as provisions were concerned, and that he was as well provided as the soldiers of the rebel army, or something like that.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I will read what I said about that.

Mr. FOSTER. While the honorable Senator is looking for the paragraph I will say another word. It is certainly not my desire to place the Senator in any false position. If I understood him, as I certainly did, after his explanation, incorrectly, I am most happy in making the correction. Indeed it pained me for a moment to think that a Senator so intelligent as the honorable Senator is should have such an impression. I was wrong in it, and I am glad of it.

Mr. HENDRICKS. This is what I said of Captain Flinn:

"I took a great deal of interest in his case. He was my personal friend. He wrote to me that he thought an exchange could be secured. I saw the President at once, and the President, a kind-hearted man, made the order on the part of this Government, and Captain Flinn was exchanged; and when he returned to his neighbors he told them that the prisoners were as well provided as the men who guarded them. I take his word on that subject while he was there as equal to the word of any man."

This as I was informed by his neighbors with whom he conversed immediately on his return. Of course that is confined to Libby prison. I suppose Captain Flinn knew nothing about any other.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, I presume every Senator concedes the principles of retaliation. The principles and spirit of the speech of the honorable Senator from Connecticut [Mr. FOSTER] in the main concur with mine. I make no essential difference with him. But, sir, it is just as well settled by the laws of nations and by the uniform usages of nations, that retaliation has its limitations, as that the principle of retaliation exists. The laws of war have been very much ameliorated in the last five or six hundred years, and the law of retaliation as a part of the laws of war has been progressing toward the same amelioration. The question is not what retaliation was in the time of Edward III and of the Black Prince, nor what it was two hundred years ago. The question is, what is the law of retaliation in the present age of Christian civilization? I will read from two American authorities that treat upon the subject of retaliation. One of them I believe was read by the honorable Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SUMNER] yesterday. Kent says:

"Cruelty to prisoners and barbarous destruction of private property will provoke the enemy to severe retaliation upon the innocent. Retaliation is said by Rutherford (Inst. 2, c. 9) not to be a justifiable cause for putting innocent prisoners or hostages to death; for no individual is chargeable, by the law of nations, with the guilt of a personal crime merely because the community of which he is a member is guilty. He is only responsible as a member of the State in his property for reparation in damages for the acts of others; and it is on this principle that, by the law of nations, private property may be taken and appropriated in war. Retaliation, to be just, ought to be confined to the guilty individuals who may have committed some enormous violation of public law."—Kent's Commentaries, part 1, page 93.

In a note to the same page I find this:

"In the case of the Marquis De Someruelles, (Stewart's Vice Admiralty Reports, 482,) the enlightened judge of the vice admiralty court at Halifax restored to the Academy of Arts, in Philadelphia, a case of Italian paintings and prints, captured by a British vessel in the war of 1812, on their passage to the United States; and he did it 'in conformity to the law of nations, as practiced by all civilized countries,' and because 'the arts and sciences are admitted to form an exception to the severe rights of warfare.' Works of art and taste, as in painting and sculpture, have, by the modern law of nations, been held sacred in war, and not deemed lawful spoils of conquest. When Frederick II of Prussia took possession of Dresden, as conqueror, in 1756, he respected the valuable picture gallery, cabinets, and museums of that capital, as not falling within the rights of a conqueror. But Bonaparte, in 1795, compelled the Italian States and princes, including the Pope, to surrender their choicest pictures and works of art, to be transported to Paris. The chef d'œuvres of art of the Dutch and Flemish schools, and in Prussia, were acquired by France in the same violent way. This proceeding is severely condemned by distinguished historians, as an abuse of the power of conquest, and a species of military contribution contrary to the usages of modern civilized warfare. (Alison's History of Europe, vol. 3, p. 42. Sir Walter Scott's Life of Napoleon, vol. 3, pp. 58-63.)"

I will now read a short paragraph from Professor Woolsey, an American writer on international law, from the State of the honorable Senator from Connecticut:

"That retaliation in war is sometimes admissible all agree. Thus if one belligerent treats prisoners of war harshly, the other may do the same; or if one squeezes the expenses of war out of an invaded territory, the other may follow in his steps. It thus becomes a measure of self protection, and secures the greatest amount of humanity from unfeeling military officers. But there is a limit to the rule. If one general kills in cold blood some hundreds of prisoners who embarrass his motions, his antagonist may not stain himself by similar crime, nor may he break his word or oath because the other had done so before. The limits of such retaliation it may be hard to lay down. Yet any act of cruelty to the innocent, any act, especially, by which non-combatants are made to feel the stress of war, is what brave men shrink from, although they may feel obliged to threaten it."—Woolsey's International Law, page 293.

These high authorities lay down distinctly that there is a limit to this right of retaliation. The first author from whom I read, who was one of the most enlightened writers upon public law in this or any other country, lays down the general principle that the law of retaliation cannot be properly inflicted upon an innocent man. Before it can be justified by the laws of nations and the usages of the civilized world and by the principles of humanity, you must first lay your hands upon the guilty; that a man is responsible only personally in his person and by personal punishment for his own individual crimes; and that he is not responsible for the acts of his nation, of his countrymen, or of his Government, in their violations of national law in any other regard or relation except in his property. That is what Chancellor Kent lays down. Woolsey lays down the same principle in effect, when he says:

"If one general kills in cold blood some hundreds of prisoners who embarrass his motions, his antagonist may not stain himself by similar crime."<sup>28</sup>

What were the laws of war and what were the rights of retaliation two hundred years ago, especially four hundred years ago? They recognized the principle distinctly that if one army defeated another and took a larger amount of prisoners than it could secure, the conquering army had the right to put the prisoners to death. The laws of nations of the present Christian and civilized age utterly reprobate and reject that principle. The laws of war in this Christian and civilized age reject the principle of devastating the property of non-combatants and the inflicting of the ravages of war on the monuments and the fruits of the arts of a country. What is proposed in the present resolution? It is one of the most striking features in the proposition to retaliate upon the rebels by starving their prisoners to death because they have starved our prisoners to death. There is no power on this earth that would ever win or wring from me my sanction to such a barbarous principle of retaliation as that. It would be torture.

Would the Senate pass a resolution requesting the President to bring confederate prisoners to the thumb-screw, to all the tortures that prevailed in the dark and barbaric ages of Europe? If the proposition were made in that form, it would be rejected unanimously by the Senate. Is it not now made in a form equally cruel and more horrible—in the form of starvation? Sir, what greater torture is there than for a man to be starved to death? None. I am astonished that the monsters of the southern confederacy, or of any other country, could be found to look patiently upon the wasting health and energies of a captive prisoner and see that prisoner condemned to the slow torture of starvation. The honorable Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SUMNER] is true to the highest impulses of human nature and of Christian civilization when he protests against any such principle of retaliation as that.

Sir, I will revert to retaliation in my own State. There has been retaliation there by the commander of the department to this extent: he has captured guerrillas, and he has taken prisoners of war that were captured in battle, as I understand, from their prisons, from their captivity, men who had no connection whatever with those guerrilla acts that brought murder and desolation upon particular sections of our State, and he has caused them to be shot to death. I say that retaliation to that extent even is condemned by the Christian and enlightened principles of Chancellor Kent and of Professor Woolsey; and I maintain that that form of retaliation is a mistake; it corrects no evil; it prevents no crime upon the part of those who committed the first crime. We know in Kentucky that for the forty or fifty men who have thus been seized and shot to death without trial by order of the general, on the principle of retaliation, the guerrillas and the confederates, whenever they have taken captives, have killed and murdered, in the same summary manner, two or three for each one that was executed by the order of our officer.

Mr. President, I would, in some extreme cases, vote for retaliation even to the execution of an innocent man, where that execution would promise to do any good in restraining crimes and excesses and violations of the laws of war by our enemy; but I would have to be thoroughly convinced that there was a reasonable promise of those results before I would ever give my sanction for retaliation upon an innocent man that was entirely disconnected, free from and unstained by the particular crime for which retaliation was about to be resorted to. But, sir, if I could be induced to come to make such an exception as that, I would limit it to the officer. The private soldier, by the military discipline of every army, be that army insurgents, or an army maintained by a regular Government in the waging of a regular war, is bound by the penalty of death to obey the order of his superior; and in no case would I ever vote for or give my sanction to the punishment by death of a private soldier for having obeyed the orders of his superior officer. The utmost verge to which I would press the principle of retaliation would be to execute that law upon officers or some class of officers whose example by way of punishment might be presumed reasonably to have an effect in restraining the cruelties and the excesses of their Government in the administration of the laws of war.

The honorable Senator from Iowa, [Mr. HARLAN,] a few days ago, assumed the position that it was no more cruel and no greater outrage upon the laws of humanity to starve a man to death than to shoot him. From that position I dissent altogether. I could and would vote in some particular cases to have a captive of the enemy, an officer, executed by a file of men; but I never would doom an officer or a soldier to the horrible torture of death by starvation upon any principle of retaliation whatever, and there is no influence on God's earth that would ever bring me to give my sanction to any such horrible mode of execution.

The honorable Senator said, furthermore, that he thought from this time henceforth there should be no exchange of prisoners; that our prisoners in the rebel prisons were starved; they were exhausted in their energies and strength and health; that if they were relieved from their prisons by exchange their times would be about to expire; or that they would be in such a condition of physical health that they could render no service to their country by reëntering the Army.

Mr. HARLAN. Does the Senator attribute that remark to me?

Mr. DAVIS. Yes, I do.

Mr. HARLAN. I have only to remark that the Senator misapprehended my statement entirely.

Mr. DAVIS. Well, sir, I will read the Senator's statement. Here are his words:

"This is the present condition of the contest. The rebellion has been so far suppressed that they are no longer able to meet us in the open field; they are now ensconced behind the strongest works that human skill and energy can produce. We are the assailing party; we are compelled to fight them in those works, and to capture those garrisons by assault, or the tedious process of a siege; in order to secure complete success. I think, therefore, it is very doubtful whether we are damaged by the refusal of the rebels to make a fair exchange; an exchange man for man will make the rebels relatively stronger. It is therefore doubtful, to say the least, whether a far-seeing, sagacious humanity would not induce this Government to refuse to exchange prisoners from this time forward. If this course should be adopted, then of course if the rebels treat Union troops held by them as prisoners of war with premeditated cruelty and inhumanity, it will furnish a just occasion for retaliation.

"Such retaliatory measures should not be adopted rashly or needlessly, because it will always seem hard to compel the innocent to suffer for the guilty; on the surface it may seem cruel and inhuman, but only in the same sense in which it is cruel and inhuman to shoot a prisoner of war in retaliation for the murder of one of our own soldiers held by the enemy. Yet this is in accordance with the usage of all civilized nations. It is resorted to in order to compel the enemy to treat with humanity those whom they may capture in battle. There is nothing more cruel, it seems to me, in putting a rebel prisoner on lean fare than there is in shooting a rebel prisoner in retaliation.

"I desire that this resolution, if it is to pass, shall be amended somewhat so as to require the punishment to be strictly retaliatory; to be inflicted on officers and men of equal number and of the same rank; and so as to instruct the President to notify the rebel authorities that this punishment is inflicted in retaliation for the inhuman treatment of our troops held as prisoners by them, and will be continued only until they treat our prisoners with the humanity demanded by the usages of civilized nations."

"I would rejoice to see every prisoner of ours held by the rebels released at once, but when I know that the release of a Union prisoner by the rebels requires the release of a rebel prisoner by our Government, and that he will be at once thrown into strongly fortified works, and that you will be compelled to recruit three other soldiers to unite with our returning prisoner to make the combat equal; that four lives are to be put in jeopardy to recapture the rebel whom we have released, I cannot criticize the Secretary of War if he should refuse to exchange prisoners from this time forward until the close of the war, even if a fair exchange could be secured; but I apprehend there are very few Senators here who believe that a fair exchange can be effected. They so analyze all prisoners that they hold of ours as to release those whose terms of service have expired or are about to expire. Their soldiers are mustered in practically during the war. Every southern citizen able to bear arms is enrolled as a soldier during the continuance of the war. Then when we release a rebel prisoner we put him into their army during the continuance of the war, while in nine cases out of ten, probably, the soldier received by us in return will be at once ill fed and mustered out of service. In addition to this, we know from the facts that have been developed by the committee on the conduct of the war that they do not return to us able-bodied men, but only exchange the sick and dilapidated for those that are able-bodied and vigorous. We cannot, as I am informed, secure a fair exchange. If a fair exchange could be secured, I probably would accept it; but when a fair exchange cannot be had, I cannot complain of the Secretary for insisting on it with pertinacity when the delay is ruinous to the rebel cause and is hastening their ultimate overthrow."

There is the argument of my honorable friend. I listened to it with immense surprise and with great regret. More than twelve months ago I endeavored to bring the attention of the Senate to this identical subject of our suffering countrymen in rebel prisons. I proposed in the Senate a resolution calling upon the Executive for all the correspondence between the two Governments on the subject of exchanges. The Senators will recollect that I made a lengthy speech, and with all the little power that I possessed I endeavored to enlist the reason and the sympathies of the Senate and of the country for our suffering prisoners in rebel prisons, but all without any success.

Now, Mr. President, there are two parties to this treatment of our unfortunate and gallant men who have been perishing in rebel prisons. Who are the two parties? The one is the rebel government and rebel authorities; the other is our own Government and our own authorities. I stated on this floor that about eighteen or twenty thousand Union prisoners had been taken into Libby prison and the prison on Belle Isle in twelve months, and that a friend of mine who had returned from there informed me that while he was there one third of the whole number perished from exposure and want of sufficient food and attention in their sickness.

Mr. CLARK. I ask the Senator from Kentucky to give way for a moment to allow me to introduce a bill, if it is agreeable to him to do so.

Mr. DAVIS. Certainly.

Mr. CLARK. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to introduce a bill of which no previous notice has been given. It is a bill precisely in the words of the deficiency bill which has failed, with the exception of the items to which the Senate refused to agree. I desire that it may be received and put upon its passage.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Hampshire asks the unanimous consent of the Senate to introduce a bill. Is there any objection?

Mr. SUMNER. I would rather have it lie over until to-morrow morning.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator object?

Mr. SUMNER. I do object.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Then it is not admissible.

Mr. JOHNSON. With the leave of the Senator from Kentucky, as it is now past four o'clock, I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, January 25, 1865.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by Rev. W. Y. Brown, chaplain of Douglas hospital.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

CONFERENCE COMMITTEE APPOINTED.

The SPEAKER appointed as the second committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the deficiency bill, Messrs. SCHENCK, LITTLEJOHN, and RANDALL of Pennsylvania.

MINING LAWS IN ARIZONA.

Mr. POSTON, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Lands be, and they are hereby, instructed to inquire into the expediency of adopting the code of mining laws passed by the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Arizona hereto appended.

The papers accompanying the resolution were ordered to be printed.

PAY OF MEMBERS OF ARIZONA LEGISLATURE.

Mr. POSTON presented the memorial and joint resolution of the Territory of Arizona, asking Congress to increase the pay of members of the Legislative Assembly and territorial judges; which were referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

COLORADO INDIANS.

Mr. POSTON also presented the memorial of the Territory of Arizona, asking of Congress an appropriation of $150,000 for placing the Indians of the Colorado on a reservation; which was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

NAVIGATION OF THE COLORADO RIVER.

Mr. POSTON also presented the memorial of the Legislative Assembly of Arizona, asking an appropriation of $150,000 for the improvement of the navigation of the Colorado river; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

WAR AGAINST THE APACHES.

Mr. POSTON also presented the memorial of the Territory of Arizona, asking of Congress an appropriation of $250,000 in aid of the war against the Apaches; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

ARMS FOR ARIZONA.

Mr. POSTON also presented the resolutions of the Territory of Arizona, requesting arms; which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

MAIL FACILITIES FOR ARIZONA.

Mr. POSTON also presented the resolutions of the Legislature of Arizona, requesting mail facilities; which were referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, and ordered to be printed.

BOUNDARIES OF ARIZONA.

Mr. POSTON also presented joint resolutions of the Legislature of Arizona, instructing the Delegate from that Territory to ask of Congress the appointment of commissioners to fix the boundary line of the Territory of Arizona and other Territories; which were referred to the Committee on Territories, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. POSTON also presented the memorial of the Territorial Legislature of Arizona asking for a change of the boundary line between that Territory and the State of California; which was referred to the Committee on the Territories, and ordered to be printed.

SALTING RAILROAD TRACKS.

Mr. STEELE, of New York, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee for the District of Columbia be instructed to inquire into the expediency of adopting such measures as may be necessary to prevent the use of salt on the tracks of the street railroads in said District, and to report by bill or otherwise.

EXCUSED FROM COMMITTEE SERVICE.

Mr. STEELE, of New York. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask to be excused from service on the select committee to investigate the charges against Hon. LUCIEN ANDERSON, to which the Speaker did me the honor to appoint me. My reason for asking to be excused is that Mr. ANDERSON is a member of the same committee of which I am a member; and in consequence of the continued absence of the chairman of the Committee for the District of Columbia, I have been, by the request of my associates, and am still, acting as chairman of that committee; and of course my time is very much occupied.

There being no objection, Mr. STEELE was excused.

TRADE WITH REBELLIOUS STATES.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I am directed by the Committee on Commerce to ask the adoption of the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the resolution of the House of Representatives of the 20th instant, directing the said committee to inquire into the matter of a permit granted by the chief agent of the Treasury Department to G. W. Lane, of Baltimore, to proceed to North Carolina and exchange provisions with the rebels for cotton, is hereby directed further to inquire into all the facts and circumstances connected with the trade with the rebellious States since the breaking out of the rebellion, either by permit from the Treasury Department or otherwise; that the said committee have leave to sit during the sessions of the House, and to report at any time; and that the Clerk of the House be directed to pay all the expenses of the said committee out of the contingent fund of the House on the certificate of the chairman.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I object to that resolution. I do so because that whole matter is now before the Committee on Military Affairs, by order of the House.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. NICOLAY, his Private Secretary, informed the House that the President had this day approved and signed bills and a joint resolution of the following titles:

An act (H. R. No. 607) to provide for an advance of rank to officers of the Navy and Marine corps for distinguished merit;

An act (H. R. No. 390) for the relief of Emily A. Lyon;

An act (H. R. No. 598) making appropriations for the consular and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the year ending 30th June, 1866; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 140) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to give the necessary notice stipulated, pending the intention of the United States to purchase the building known as the Merchants' Exchange, in New York city, now used for custom-house purposes.

HENRY KARSTAU.

Mr. PRICE, by unanimous consent, introduced a joint resolution for the relief of Henry Karstaus; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

NORTHWESTERN SHIP CANAL.

Mr. ALLISON, by unanimous consent, presented a memorial to the President and Congress of the United States, by the Northwestern Ship Canal Convention, assembled at Dubuque, Iowa, May 4, 1864; which was referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals, and ordered to be printed.

NIAGARA SHIP CANAL.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I demand the regular order of business. I desire that the committees may be called.

The SPEAKER. The question pending at the adjournment yesterday was the bill (H. R. No. 126) to construct a ship canal around the falls of Niagara. It is, therefore, the regular order, unless it be set aside by unanimous consent or postponed.

Mr. SPALDING. I move that that bill, with the pending amendment, be postponed until Monday next, and made the special order for that day after the morning hour.

The motion was agreed to.

CABINET OFFICERS IN CONGRESS.

Mr. PENDLETON. I rise to a privileged question. I desire to call up the motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill (H. R. No. 214) to provide that the heads of Executive Departments may occupy seats on the floor of the House of Representatives was recommitted to the select committee.

Mr. STEVENS. Will the gentleman yield to me a moment?

Mr. PENDLETON. I yield to the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means.

TAXES IN INSURRECTIONARY DISTRICTS.

Mr. STEVENS. I report back from the Committee of Ways and Means, with an amendment in the nature of a substitute, Senate bill No. 171, entitled "An act further to amend an act entitled 'An act for the collection of direct taxes in the insurrectionary districts within the United States, and for other purposes,'" approved June 7, 1862. I move that this bill be recommitted, and be ordered to be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

INCREASED PAY OF GOVERNMENT EMPLOYÉS.

Mr. STEVENS. I also report from the Committee of Ways and Means a bill to provide for the temporary increase of the compensation of certain clerks and employés in the civil service of the Government. I ask that this bill be made the special order for Thursday of next week.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I must object to this bill being made a special order. I object to making any bill for raising salaries a special order to the exclusion of public business.

Mr. STEVENS. It is not to the exclusion of public business.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. It does exclude everything else, as a matter of course, if it is made a special order.

The SPEAKER. To make the bill a special order at this time requires unanimous consent, and the gentleman from Illinois objects. It can be postponed by a majority, or acted upon now by a majority.

Mr. STEVENS. I move, then, that the bill be postponed until Thursday of next week after the morning hour, and be ordered to be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

CABINET OFFICERS IN CONGRESS—AGAIN.

Mr. PENDLETON. Mr. Speaker, I now propose to call up the motion to reconsider the vote by which House bill No. 214, to provide that the heads of the Executive Departments may occupy seats upon the floor of the House of Representatives, was recommitted to the select committee.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Does the gentleman desire to go on with the subject to-day?

Mr. PENDLETON. I desire to go on with it for a period, as there are one or two gentlemen who wish to discuss it, and whose convenience will be subserved by discussing it to-day.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I ask the gentleman to consent to postpone the bill till after the morning hour. The committees have not been called for a long time.

Mr. PENDLETON. If that will subserve the convenience of the House I certainly have no disposition to object.

Mr. STEVENS. I am anxious to go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union to pass several appropriation bills; but I do not, of course, want to interfere with the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. PENDLETON. I have only to say, in reference to this measure, that I am inclined to do anything which will suit the convenience of the House. I have waited, as my colleague on the Committee of Ways and Means well knows, in order to have a convenient time to bring it up so as not to interfere with any important business of the House.

Mr. STEVENS. If the gentleman proceeds at once, we can after a while go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; but if he waits till after the morning hour, there will be no time left to do so.

Mr. PENDLETON. I hope, then, that the gentleman from Illinois will not persist in his request, as I am unwilling to decline, and yet it is evident I cannot accept.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. The committees have not been called for weeks, and I know that many have a large amount of business to report. The Committee on Commerce has, for one.

Mr. PENDLETON. How soon will the morning hour commence?

The SPEAKER. It has already commenced. Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I ask consent to make one report from the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. PENDLETON. Will it give rise to debate? Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I do not think that it will.

Mr. PENDLETON. I will yield for that purpose.

TRADE WITH REBELLIOUS STATES.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, from the Committee on Commerce, reported the following resolution, and demanded the previous question on its adoption:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the resolution of the House of Representatives of the 20th instant, directing the said committee to inquire into the matter of a permit granted by the chief agent of the Treasury Department to G. W. Lane, of Baltimore, to proceed to North Carolina and exchange provisions with the rebels for cotton, is hereby directed further to inquire into all the facts and circumstances connected with the trade with the rebellious States since the breaking out of the rebellion, either by permit from the Treasury Department or otherwise; that the said committee have leave to sit during the sessions of the House, and to report at any time; and that the Clerk be directed to pay all the expenses of the said committee out of the contingent fund of the House, on the certificate of the chairman.

Mr. SCHENCK. I ask the gentleman to withdraw the demand for the previous question for a moment.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I withdraw the call for the previous question to hear the gentleman.

Mr. SCHENCK. Mr. Speaker, this whole matter of trade across the lines with the rebel States has once already been referred to the Committee on Military Affairs. They are now engaged in collecting information on the subject and have been considering it. Therefore, to my mind, when the whole subject has been referred to one committee, there is a manifest impropriety in referring it to another committee, and that too when we are in the midst of the investigation. I hope, therefore, that the resolution will not be passed, or, if passed, that the Committee on Military Affairs will be discharged from this subject.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I do not rise merely to reiterate the statement of my colleague on the Committee on Military Affairs. By a resolution introduced into this House by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BOWWELL,] the Committee on Military Affairs was charged to investigate the whole question of trade with the rebel States, the transit of the products of the loyal States to those States, and the purchase of their products in return. Subsequently another gentleman from Massachusetts submitted a resolution calling upon the Secretary of War for the correspondence with General Canby. Then the letter of General Canby and other correspondence were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs. That committee has been for some time engaged in collecting the facts and statistics in regard to this trade.

It seems to me that it is a proper subject for the investigation of the Committee on Military Affairs. It appertains very much to the conduct of military affairs. It is a question of trade across the lines, between the loyal and the rebellious States. I agree with my colleague, that when this subject was referred to one committee it is certainly an impropriety to charge another committee with its consideration. It was for this reason that I objected when my colleague asked unanimous consent, a short time since, to introduce this resolution.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. The House will recollect that a few days since the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. DRIGGS] introduced a resolution which directed the Committee on Commerce to inquire into a specific case which was mentioned in the resolution. The committee proceeded to discharge that duty; and they have had brought to their attention, while examining that particular case, other cases in precisely the same channel.

Now, sir, I desire to say, on behalf of the Committee on Commerce, that this is an investigation which that committee does not court. We have no feeling whatever in relation to the matter. The subject was sent to them by the House, and in good faith they have entered upon the discharge of that duty, and the committee deem it proper, if the House desire this investigation, that they should have this resolution to work upon.

That is the whole question. If the House desire that the Committee on Commerce shall go forward and make this investigation, they can adopt this resolution. If they do not desire it, but desire that the Committee on Military Affairs shall make the investigation, the Committee on Commerce is satisfied. We are satisfied from what has already appeared before us that this subject opens a wide field for examination, and will require the attention of any committee pretty much all the time from this to the end of the session. If the Committee on Military Affairs have time to attend to it, and the House determine that that is the proper committee to make the examination, the Committee on Commerce are entirely satisfied.

Mr. FRANK. I would inquire of the gentleman from Illinois what will be the expense attending this investigation?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. It is impossible for me to answer that question. I think I can assure the gentleman from New York that there will be no unnecessary expense incurred; but all the expense necessary to a full investigation will be incurred.

Mr. UPSON. How is it proposed to continue this committee beyond the present session?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. There is nothing in the resolution which contemplates any continuation of the committee beyond the present session. Of course everything falls with the Congress.

Mr. SCHENCK. I do not wish any misunderstanding about this matter. I suppose no committee courts an addition to its labors. I do not know how it may be with the Committee on Commerce, but sure I am that very little time can be bestowed upon that, beyond what we are now called upon to give to any special subject, by the committee over which I have the honor to preside.

I simply desire to call the attention of the House to the fact that this whole subject has once been referred, with instructions, to the Committee on Military Affairs, and that committee is now engaged, according to the best of its ability and time, in the investigation. And it is now proposed that another committee shall be charged with the same investigation. The Committee on Commerce, it appears, has been charged to look into what has been done in a specific case, having no relation to the general investigation of the whole policy. What is now asked is, that in addition to the inquiry committed to them, their power shall be extended over the whole subject, and they be instructed to report in regard to the whole policy of trade with the rebel States, thus covering, in addition to what they are now charged with, precisely the ground occupied by instructions given in the former resolution to the Military Committee.

Having no particular desire to engage in these investigations, under these circumstances, if the courtesy of the Committee on Commerce and this House is such as to make it seem to them proper to charge the Committee on Commerce with the precise subject of investigation before the Committee on Military Affairs, and with which that committee is now occupied, I shall, after the resolution is passed, ask that the Committee on Military Affairs be discharged from any further consideration of the subject.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I demand the previous question.

Mr. ALLEY. I ask the gentleman from Illinois to yield to me a moment. I will renew the demand for the previous question.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I will withdraw my demand, under the circumstances.

Mr. ALLEY. I believe no more important resolution has been presented to this House since the commencement of this session, and I hope it will be adopted. For one, I should prefer that this subject had been referred to a select committee, owing to its importance and to the labor necessarily involved in the investigation of the matter, which precludes the possibility of such complete investigation by most standing committees as we desire. I know that great complaint has been made in some quarters, and I fear justly, in regard to this subject. If the allegations that have come to my ear are true, then this matter ought to be investigated, and investigated speedily and thoroughly.

I have great confidence, of course, in the Committee on Military Affairs; no one more so, I know. Everybody in this House understands that that committee is more burdened with work than almost any other committee of this House. Its labors are very arduous; and an important subject of this character, which requires a speedy and thorough investigation, and involves such a great amount of labor, seems to me should be referred to some other equally appropriate committee.

As I said before, I should have preferred that this matter should have been sent to a special committee; but as the House refused to do that, I am for the next best thing, and hope the resolution will be adopted, and that the Committee on Commerce will be charged with the investigation, and by their report let the House and the country know what truth there is in the reports that a few favored individuals are granted exclusive privileges, of immense value to the recipients, which are denied to the great mass of equally worthy applicants.

I renew the demand for the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the resolution was agreed to—ayes 66, noes 30.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted, and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I demand the yeas and nays on the latter motion.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The motion to lay the motion to reconsider on the table was agreed to.

Mr. SCHENCK. I now ask that the Committee on Military Affairs be discharged from the further consideration of all questions relating to trade between the loyal and the rebel States, heretofore referred to them by resolution of the House. We will not pay any attention to that resolution, whether we are discharged or not.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I would like to inquire what the subject is from the consideration of which the committee ask to be discharged. Is it the same that we have just referred to the Committee on Commerce?

Mr. SCHENCK. It is precisely the same.

The SPEAKER. It is the subject of trade between the loyal and rebel States.

Mr. SPALDING. Is it in order to move that the Committee on Military Affairs be discharged with the thanks of the House? [Laughter.]

The motion of Mr. SCHENCK was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. Reports are still in order from the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. ELIOT. I am instructed by the Committee on Commerce to report a bill for action at this time.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I feel bound to suggest to my colleague on the committee that it was the understanding with the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. PENDLETON] that he was only to give way for a single report.

Mr. ELIOT. Then I withdraw my report.

CABINET OFFICERS IN CONGRESS.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. PENDLETON] calls up the motion to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution of the House (No. 214) to provide that the heads of Departments may occupy seats on the floor of the House of Representatives was recommitted to the special committee on that subject.

Mr. STEELE, of New York. I appeal to the gentleman from Ohio to allow me to make a single report from the Committee for the District of Columbia. It will take but a moment.

Mr. PENDLETON. I will yield for that purpose.

FRANKLIN INSURANCE COMPANY.

Mr. STEELE, of New York, by unanimous consent, reported back from the Committee for the District of Columbia bill of the Senate No. 384, to amend the act entitled "An act to amend and extend the charter of the Franklin Insurance Company," approved 2d March, 1838.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. STEELE, of New York, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. HOLMAN. I now demand the regular order of business.

THANKS TO MAJOR GENERAL SHERIDAN.

Mr. DEMING. I wish, with the permission of the gentleman from Ohio, to report back from the Committee on Military Affairs the resolution of thanks to Major General Sheridan.

Mr. HOLMAN. I will withdraw my demand for the regular order of business for that purpose only.

Mr. DEMING. I am instructed by the Committee on Military Affairs to report back the joint resolution of the House, (No. 142,) giving thanks to General Sheridan, with an amendment in the nature of a substitute.

The substitute proposes to resolve that the thanks of Congress are hereby tendered to Major General Philip H. Sheridan, and the officers and men under his command, for the gallantry, military skill, and courage displayed in the brilliant series of victories achieved by them in the valley of the Shenandoah, and especially for their services at Cedar Run on the 19th of October, 1864, which retrieved the fortunes of the day and averted a great disaster; and it further requests the President of the United States to communicate this resolution to Major General Sheridan, and through him to the officers and soldiers under his command.

The substitute was agreed to.

The joint resolution, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. SCHENCK demanded the yeas and nays on the passage of the joint resolution.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 131, nays 2, not voting 49; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. James C. Allen, William J. Allen, Allison, Ames, Ancona, Anderson, Arnold, Ashley, Augustus C. Baldwin, John D. Baldwin, Baxter, Beaman, Blaine, Blair, Blow, Boutwell, Boyd, Brooks, Broomall, James S. Brown, William G. Brown, Ambrose W. Clark, Cobb, Coffroth, Cole, Cox, Cravens, Henry Winter Davis, Thomas T. Davis, Dawes, Deming, Denison, Dixon, Donnelly, Driggs, Eckley, Edgerton, Eliot, Farnsworth, Plack, Frank, Ganson, Garfield, Goodell, Grider, Griswold, Hale, Harding, Charles M. Harris, Higby, Holman, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Julian, Killebrew, Kossow, Kelley, Kernan, King, Knox, Lacey, Littlejohn, Loan, Longyear, Mallory, Marvin, McAllister, McBride, McClurg, McDowell, McCluskey, Samuel F. Miller, William H. Miller, Leonard Myers, Morrill, Daniel Morris, Morrison, Ames Myers, Leonard Myers, Noble, Norton, Charles O'Neill, John O'Neill, Orth, Patterson, Perham, Pike, Price, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, William H. Randall, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Robinson, Rogers, Edward H. Rollins, James S. Rollins, Ross, Schenck, Scofield, Scott, Shannon, Sloan, Smith, Smithers, Spaulding, John B. Steele, William G. Steele, Stevens, Strouse, Stuart, Thayer, Thomas, Townsend, Upton, Van Valkenburgh, Wadsworth, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburne, Webster, Whaley, Wheeler, Joseph W. White, Wilson, Windom, and Yeaman—131.

NAYS—Messrs. Benjamin G. Harris and Chilton A. White—2.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Alley, Bailey, Bliss, Brandegee, Chanter, Freeman Clarke, Clay, Creswell, Dawson, Dumont, Eden, Eldridge, English, Hall, Harrington, Horrick, Hubbard, Hutchins, Philip Johnson, William Johnson, Francis W. Kellogg, McKelvey, McKelvey, Knapp, Law, Le Blond, Long, Kellogg, McKelvey, Middleton, James R. Morris, Nelson, Odell, Pendleton, Perry, Pomeroy, Pruyn, Starr, Siles, Swart, Tracy, Voorhees, Ward, Williams, Wilder, Winfield, Benjamin Wood, Fernando Wood, Woodbridge, and Worthington—49.

So the joint resolution was passed.

Mr. DEMING moved that the vote just taken be reconsidered, and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

DEFICIENCY BILL.

Mr. SCHENCK. I rise to a privileged question. On behalf of the managers on the part of the House in the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments to the deficiency bill, I submit a report; which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read, as follows:

The second committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 620) to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1865, having met, after full and free conference have been unable to agree.

ROBERT C. SCHENCK,
SAMUEL J. RANDALL,
D. C. LITTLEJOHN,

Managers on the part of the House.

DANIEL CLARK,

LYMAN TRUMBULL,

L. W. POWELL,

Managers on the part of the Senate.

Mr. SCHENCK. Mr. Speaker, before any action be taken by the House on that report, I desire to submit a brief explanation.

When this second committee of conference met, we found that, in consequence of the action of the House and Senate respectively, there remained but six amendments about which there was question between the two Houses. These were all of them amendments which had been added to the bill by the Senate. The first of these was an amendment in relation to a small appropriation of some four or five hundred dollars for the Denver mint. There was exhibited to us a letter from the Department, explaining the necessity for that appropriation, which satisfied the managers upon the part of the House that the House ought to recede from its disagreement to that amendment.

The second amendment is a large appropriation attached by the Senate for deficiency in the appropriations for the support of the mint at San Francisco. This, being considered by the committee of conference, was found to rest on this state of facts: last year only $50,000 was asked for the support of that mint in one of its items, and altogether some two hundred thousand dollars. This year there is asked for that mint an amount exceeding that by more than two hundred thousand dollars. This deficiency is explained in the papers as having been occasioned by the difficulty in procuring services, by the increased pay for subsistence, by the derangement of the currency, and the difficulty about the use of the paper currency in California. These facts are alleged as explaining why $134,000 more is asked to make up the deficiency of last year. If that deficiency be allowed, the appropriation will still be less, by a very considerable sum, than the appropriation made the present year. Yet the appropriation is large. The committee turned their attention to the papers which were before them, and found that the head of the Department states, upon his authority, that the difficulties stated are such as to render necessary this further appropriation for that deficiency; and he states this with the additional knowledge he is presumed to have, he having had the subject specially under his attention, not only as Secretary of the Treasury, but while serving as a Senator upon the Finance Committee of the Senate. All things considered, the committee were not unwilling to agree that the House should recede from its disagreeing vote on that amendment.

There are three other amendments, numbers six, seven, and eight, of like character, founded upon a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury to the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means of this House, showing the necessity of supplying deficiencies, which had not been brought to the attention of Congress, in three of the bureaus of the Navy Department. This letter is understood not to have reached the Committee of Ways and Means of this House, nor the House, until after the bill had been acted upon here, and consequently these amendments were added in the Senate. The committee were not unwilling to agree to these.

There remained then, Mr. Speaker, the fourth amendment, providing for an addition of twenty per cent. to the pay last year of the employés of this House. The objection made to that on the part of the Senate is this: that there had prevailed a custom in both the Senate and House of Representatives through a long succession of years of voting by resolution at the close of each session of Congress, in the hurry of adjournment, an increased compensation, a gratuity to its employés, to be paid out of the contingent fund of that particular branch where the vote took place. In 1858, to break up this custom, an act of Congress was passed which prohibited the Senate or House from making such an appropriation out of the contingent fund, and requiring that every such appropriation should be made by law. It is claimed by the Senate, and is, I believe, according to the fact, that since 1858 there has been no infringement of this law, or an attempt to infringe it by either House of Congress till this time. On the 4th of July last, on the last day of the last session, the House passed a resolution giving a gratuity of twenty per cent. to its employés. The Senate passed no such resolution. In the deficiency appropriation bill of this session a provision was introduced appropriating some thirty thousand dollars to pay this twenty per cent. additional salary to the employés of the House. It was to pay them what it seems they could not receive under the act of 1858.

So far as the managers of the committee of conference of the House are concerned, they felt that the House had committed itself in some degree to its employés by the resolution of the House at the last session of Congress. I do not know what would have been the opinion if the question had been an open one. The first committee of conference on the part of the House adhered to that amendment, and were sustained with a good degree of unanimity. The second committee of conference therefore felt itself instructed upon this point by the House.

Now, sir, in order to narrow the whole question, I move that the House recede from its disagreement to the first, second, sixth, seventh, and eighth amendments of the Senate, relating to Denver, San Francisco, and the bureaus of the Navy Department, so that there shall be left open between the two Houses nothing but this question in reference to the employés of the House. This will narrow it down to such a point that the House will be enabled to determine whether to abandon the bill or recede from the disagreement to this amendment.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. In order to test this whole question, I move to amend the gentleman's motion by receding from our disagreement to all the amendments of the Senate, and to recede from our disagreement to the amendment which is specially objected to. The gentleman from Ohio has stated plainly and clearly the differences between the two Houses.

At the suggestion of gentlemen, I withdraw my amendment so as first to let the vote be taken on the motion of the gentleman from Ohio. When that is disposed of, I will renew my motion to recede from our disagreement to the fourth amendment of the Senate, and to agree to the same.

The SPEAKER. The first question will be on agreeing to the report of the committee of conference, and will then recur upon the amendments pending before the House.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, having been a member of the second committee of conference on the part of the House, I have had the opportunity to make a deliberate investigation of the merits of the differences between the two Houses. I am convinced, sir, that there is no propriety in the action of the other House in so far as it attempts to interfere with the disposition of this House in reference to its own domestic affairs, if I may be permitted to use the expression. It is well known that this has been an extraordinary year in respect to the increase of all the articles of living; and it is also well known that this increase falls with great hardship upon the recipients of small salaries.

Now, as a member of the committee on the part of the House, and with a disposition to yield everything except where the faith of the House is pledged, let me say that many of the employés of the House have regulated their financial matters with reference to this increase of pay. This action of the Senate stands, so far as my knowledge goes, and all the information I can get, without precedent. Never has a successful effort been made upon the part of either House to interfere with what I might term the domestic relations of the other House.

I have, therefore, and I say it with great frankness to the House, clearly been convinced that this money should be voted. I do not want to stop the passage of the deficiency bill, nor do I want to lack the proper dignity which I conceive to be due to the House in connection with its own officers; and therefore I move, as an amendment to the motion of the chairman of the committee, that the House adhere to the amendment disagreed to by the Senate.

The SPEAKER. The first question before the committee is upon agreeing to the report of the conference committee. The gentleman can make his motion to adhere, but the question must first be taken upon the motion to recede, as that has priority.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. That would make my amendment inappropriate.

The SPEAKER. That would depend upon what disposition is made of the first motion.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. My motion will be in order if that is voted down.

Mr. SCHENCK. My motion to recede applies only to the first, second, sixth, seventh, and eighth amendments, leaving out the one relating to the extra compensation.

THE CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

THE OFFICIAL PROCEEDINGS OF CONGRESS, PUBLISHED BY F. & J. RIVES, WASHINGTON, D. C.

THIRTY-EIGHTH CONGRESS, 2d Session.

FRIDAY, JANUARY 27, 1865.

NEW SERIES.....No. 27.

Mr. STEVENS. I wish to state a matter of fact which the chairman of the conference committee seems not familiar with, which the Senate seemed to overlook, and which was entirely misstated in some remarks made in that body. It has been the habit of the House, since the passage of the act of 1848, to increase the salaries of its employes—and that was the only thing provided for by that law—by making at the end of the session a gratuity to its employes, payable out of the contingent fund. I have offered more than one resolution of that kind, which has been passed, and the money paid under it. I remember that there was a special case where one of our clerks, Mr. Mehauffey, had an addition made to his salary by way of a gratuity, and it was paid out of the contingent fund. I recollected that that was so; and when I told the chairman of the Senate committee that it was so, he doubted it, and I thereupon consulted with the clerks and was told that I was right in reference to my recollection. Now, if the Senate are inclined to interfere with our domestic institutions and overthrow them, I do not feel disposed to let them.

The question being put upon agreeing to the report of the committee of conference, it was decided in the affirmative.

Mr. SCHENCK. I now move that the House recede from its disagreement to all the amendments of the Senate except the one relating to the twenty per cent. extra compensation.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to amend by including all the amendments disagreed to by the House.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Pennsylvania. As that motion comes from this side of the House, I desire to say a word in opposition to it. It is unnecessary, I think, for any gentleman to stand here and speak to the members of this House, or to persons who may be present in this city, upon the subject of the necessity of an increased compensation to those employes who are compelled to live and discharge their duties in this city. It is well known to every person who has been about Washington city for any number of years past that the cost of living is far greater in this city now than it ever was before; and that the cost of living is far greater in this city now than it is in any other city in the United States.

I am aware that there are gentlemen to whom this is a matter of light consideration, but I do not consider it so very high an honor for persons to come here to swing doors, to act as messengers, and to do the bidding of members from morning to night in the streets and through the storm, that they should work for nothing, find themselves, and live in back streets at that. I do know that no messenger can live in a front street in Washington comfortably, and pay his bill out of the compensation he now receives. Every gentleman knows that. Then why any squeamishness about increasing the compensation of this class of persons? We have heard considerable said from time to time about increasing the compensation of the soldier. We have increased his compensation, and he occupies a different position from the employes of this House, for he is furnished his living, and therefore the increased price of living does not affect him. It does not come out of his pay. The Government furnishes it to him. But the messengers of this House, the civil employes of the Government, (and these remarks apply to the employes in the Departments as well as to the employes of this House,) are bound all of them to find themselves, and the increased cost of living in this city over what it was two or three years ago, besides the increased cost in this city over other cities in the United States, demands, as an act of justice on the part of this House, that this compensation shall be increased.

I am sorry to see my friend from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN,] who has been so active upon all occasions in his efforts to increase the pay of the soldier, now turning round on the faithful employes of the House and of the Government in a different capacity, although, perhaps, not voting in his district, and undertaking to confine them to what he must know is an inadequate compensation.

Mr. HOLMAN. I know that it is a very ungracious task to oppose, especially in the presence of the gentlemen who are to be affected, a measure increasing their official compensation, and argue in favor of a uniform and general rule by which the employes of the Government in all its departments shall receive a just compensation for their services; and it is a very easy and grateful task for the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. JOHNSON] to argue before the very courteous and affable gentlemen who are around us, and who, from day to day aid us so much in the performance of our official duties, in favor of this increased compensation. It is very pleasant indeed, sir, and I should, if it were consistent with my sense of duty, aid the measure with the greatest pleasure, and would even attempt to rival him in its advocacy, for to support the interests of friends is always a pleasant employment.

But, sir, what strikes me with astonishment is that the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SCHENCK,] chairman of this committee of conference, is willing to concede appropriations of hundreds of thousands of dollars which the first committee of conference, under the lead of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS,] thought were totally unadvisable, that the House may by possibility be able to secure this appropriation of $37,000 for the benefit of gentlemen around us, the employes of the House.

Mr. SCHENCK. The gentleman will allow me to correct him. In the first place, I will inform him that the present committee of conference considered the merits of these amendments as well as their amount; they were willing to yield them, although not the other amendment, upon their merits and upon the papers submitted to us. Further than that, the former committee of conference, as we were informed, came to the same conclusion.

Mr. STEVENS. The gentleman has no knowledge of that fact.

Mr. SCHENCK. I had the assurance of each one of the members composing the conference committee on the part of the Senate that the sole question which could have remained open, if they could have acted separately upon these amendments, which the committee of conference cannot do, for it must either agree in the whole or disagree altogether, would have been this one relating to the compensation of the employes of this House. But I want the gentleman from Indiana to understand that the decision on the part of the managers of the conference last held was upon the merits of each case, and the papers before them, and was not regulated by this particular amendment. The intimation, therefore, that we were willing to yield thousands and hundreds of thousands of dollars for other purposes and stood out on this particular point, is not a generous one, and not in accordance with the fact that we made special inquiries in each particular case.

Mr. HOLMAN. I do not think, judging from the record, that it can be said that the intimation is an ungenerous one. With this statement it would be, but I simply judge, as other members must do, by the record. The first committee reported a total inability to agree with the conferees on the part of the Senate without any explanation.

Mr. SCHENCK. So do we, for the simple reason—which the gentleman is parliamentary enough to understand—that committees of conference have to report either an entire agreement or an entire disagreement.

Mr. HOLMAN. I inferred from the absence of any statement that the disagreement in the committee of conference was on all the points. I know that the practice has prevailed here on the part of committees of conference, when they were unable to agree on all the points, to report that they were able to agree on certain points and not on others. But the fact remains that the other five or six items on which the first committee differed are to be yielded, and the only question which remains is whether this item of $37,000 is to be retained in the bill or not. I can scarcely believe that gentlemen the employes of the House, as excellent officers and citizens as I know anywhere, are very anxious to receive a compensation for their services of one fifth more than is paid under the general system of compensation in other departments of public employment. I do not think it would be very agreeable to them to receive this increased compensation by an invidious discrimination. It is not, as the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. JOHNSON] seems to intimate, a general compensation of all the employes of the Government, but of a particular class of employes whose duties are similar to others. If there has been such a depreciation of the currency as to justify increasing the cost of all the necessities of life and requiring a general increase of twenty per cent., well and good; but let the increase be general, let the Government be equal and just in dealing with its citizens. I think that a body like the Congress of the United States ought to deal out justice equally, not on a system of favoritism. The benefits of the Government and even its favors should fall, like the dews of heaven, on all alike. Here we discriminate in favor of our own employes. However worthy they are, they are not more so than the employes of the Senate or of other departments of the Government. It does seem to me that the earnest anxiety on the part of gentlemen to effect this increase of salaries is almost without precedent in our legislation.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. The gentleman from Indiana has suggested that there ought to be a general increase of compensation. I desire to ask the gentleman whether he would vote for a general increase of twenty per cent. throughout all the departments of the Government?

Mr. HOLMAN. No, sir; I would not vote for a general increase of twenty per cent. But I say that the question before the House is very different from what it would be if, instead of this partial act of legislation, it were a proposition for the equal benefit of all persons in the employment of the Government. Gentlemen cannot fail to remember that the officers of our Army, whose compensation was fixed so far back as 1861, before any depreciation of the currency, are demanding an increase of compensation. They would be very willing, I presume, to receive an increase of twenty per cent., and yet there has been no movement on this floor in favor of such increase. But it is salaries now ranging from eighteen hundred to three thousand dollars a year that must be increased twenty per cent., while the great body of our citizens, thousands of whom are qualified for any position, now in Government employment, are receiving a pittance of sixteen dollars per month—$192 a year—and with bounties and all not amounting, so far as the Government pays, to $350 per annum. What are we thinking of? Here are republican legislators favoring a partial increase of compensation in one department of the Government, now respectably paid, to the extent of one fifth, while not a voice has been raised in favor of an increase of the pay of those who are imperiling health, life, and fortune for the salvation of the Republic. Are some to make all the sacrifices and others none at all for the public safety? Neither the Committee of Ways and Means nor the Committee on Military Affairs have taken any legislative steps to increase the pay of the soldier in the field. I, for one, protest against that partiality which discriminates in favor of one class of Government employes in a matter in which all are equally interested.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Pennsylvania. Is not the gentleman from Indiana aware of the fact that when the war commenced the pay of the soldier was eleven dollars a month? It was increased by legislation to thirteen dollars a month, and afterward to sixteen dollars. Thus, in addition to large bounties, the pay of the soldier has been increased twice within three years, while the compensation of the officers of this House has not been increased at all.

Mr. HOLMAN. My friend from Pennsylvania will recollect that there has been no increase of compensation of the officers of the Army since the beginning of the present war. Their compensation remains, as a general thing, what it was. My friend talks of the increased pay of the soldier. If you will point to me valuable citizens in the pay of the Government, who were receiving eleven, thirteen, or sixteen dollars per month when the war began, I will admit the parallel. But it is the increase of these mere pittance of compensation that you put against the increase of salaries which were $1,200, $1,600, or $3,000, when the war began, and which it is now proposed to increase. I believe, sir, there is no employé of this House whose compensation is less than fifty dollars per month; I think I can say that there is none whose compensation is less than sixty dollars per month.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman allow me to correct him? I think that in the employ of this House there is a class of men who receive but $1 50 per day. How the gentleman can make that sixty dollars per month I do not know.

Mr. HOLMAN. My friend is laboring under a misapprehension.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Pennsylvania. I think not.

Mr. HOLMAN. I think that if the gentleman will look over the reports made by the Clerk to this House, he will find that there is not a single employé of the House whose compensation is less than sixty dollars per month.

The salaries paid to the employés of this House vary from sixty dollars per month to three thousand or three thousand five hundred dollars per year. Yet the gentleman compares the salaries paid to these civil employés with the pittance which is paid to the soldier; and I am told as a Democrat, and told by a Democrat, that it is an ungrateful task to resist this increase of salaries on this partial principle of legislation. The Democracy have become very generous indeed, sir! I remember, when they have had the power of this Government in their hands, that their motto was a rigid economy in public expenditures, and that, too, with a full Treasury. Then, sir, no extravagance in salaries or anything else was tolerated. If the citizen engaged in the public service it should not be with the view to a compensation far exceeding that which is ordinarily received in private pursuits. I have yet to learn that the Democratic party of this country are becoming eager, by extravagant expenditure and large salaries and costly establishments, to make this a brilliant Government, a splendid Government—splendid in the emoluments to be realized by those who are in public employment, but miserable to those who bear the burdens.

Sir, when gentlemen tell me that the pay of the employés of this House is small, I will ask their attention to a single fact: that such is the expenditure of this single branch of the national Legislature, so extended and extravagant is the list of employés by this House, that an increase of only one fifth—twenty per cent., as now proposed—on their compensation amounts to the magnificent sum of $37,000. Thirty-seven thousand dollars! This sum is required by the bill for an addition of one fifth of the amount which is now paid. How long ago was it that $37,000 paid the whole expenses of the House? Yet gentlemen talk about our employés as being insufficiently and poorly paid. Sir, if this Government rose to the true dignity of a republic—if it were not simply a republic in name but one in fact—instead of the employé in civil life receiving from sixty dollars per month to $3,000 per year, it would be the soldier, imperiling all for his country, meeting the leaden hail of death, who would receive the highest compensation, and not the citizen who, in the peaceful security of private life, advances as he may his own fortunes without any direct regard to the welfare of his country. Sir, while I remain upon this floor, representing a constituency who have made, in common with every other constituency, sacrifices for the public safety, I never will consent to any increase of salaries where they are reasonably sufficient for the honorable subsistence of the officer, while the fact remains that the soldiers in our Army—an Army that is the pride and boast of the nation, and filled with the intelligent and aspiring youth of the nation—are not receiving a compensation that begins to be commensurate with that which is paid even for labor in the more peaceful, quiet, and secure pursuits. Gentlemen talk about an increase of salaries for the purpose of enabling our employés to live. Yet the soldier lives on his sixteen dollars per month, from which he must support his wife and his little children; and this meager pay is earned, not in the secure pursuits of peace, but amid the perils of war. Are the soldiers alone to make sacrifices?

Mr. Speaker, I object to this method of increasing salaries, and especially to the precedent now attempted to be set of appropriating money by the action of a single House, for the argument for the increase is a resolution of last session. It is unwise, sir, for either branch of Congress to attempt to increase the compensation of its own employés except by the enactment of a law. The Senate may well resist the action of the House. I desire, just as other gentlemen do, to stand very well with the excellent gentlemen who constitute the officers and employés of this House; I shall not forfeit their good opinion, if I possess it, by the independent performance of what I deem my duty, however much it may affect themselves. But, independently of this, I should not care. I am responsible only to my constituents for the performance of my duties, and I should perform them fearlessly and earnestly, however much I might regret that my sense of duty as a Representative came in conflict with the interests of worthy gentlemen or of proved friends.

I oppose this amendment because it is partial in its benefits; because I would not see a dangerous precedent established, by which virtually either House, without the concurrence of the other, may increase salaries; and because the salaries are not so poor as to demand an increase at a time when sacrifices may well be made by all. The Senate expresses its opinion against us, I cannot say with what unanimity; and there must be gentlemen upon this floor who, not simply upon the score of economy, but upon the ground of equity and justice, are opposed to this partial increase because it is partial, because it applies to only one class of our citizens, when the principle of legislation ought to apply equally to all classes of citizens in public employment. If these gentlemen have their compensation increased, the same principle should apply to every citizen similarly circumstanced in public employment whose duties are of the same character.

Mr. J. C. ALLEN. Mr. Speaker, I have listened with some interest to the discussion of this question, and beg leave to ask the indulgence of the House to one or two words in reply. I understand that the House during the last session of Congress passed a resolution increasing the pay of its employés, and that the Clerk, owing to some construction which was placed upon the general law by the Department, did not feel authorized at that time to execute the resolution of the House. In this bill I understand there is a provision to carry out what was the declared purpose of the House at the last session of Congress in reference to the increased pay of its employés. I say that we cannot, without a violation of the faith of the House, refuse to adhere to that provision in behalf of those employés who have been faithfully discharging their duties from that time to this.

And, sir, it does seem to me that the arguments of my friend from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] are indeed most strange. Why, sir, the expenses of living here, and to which the employés of the House are especially subjected, have increased threefold since their compensation was fixed. Yet the gentleman from Indiana insists that that compensation shall not be increased, but must remain as it is. He talks about making these officers exalted in a great Government! There is nothing of the kind. We only propose to give them what we have already promised, without increasing their importance whatever. The gentleman ought to be ashamed to make such an argument before this House. If he were a farmer, I presume, in order to carry out his own principle, when one of his employés called upon him and informed him that he could not live upon his pay and subsist his family, and that he must have it increased, he would turn upon him and use the argument that he used this morning. If he were a man of business, and one of his clerks demanded an increase of pay in consequence of the increased cost of living, he would I suppose use the same argument, that his pay had been fixed already in former times, and therefore he could not grant any increase.

He alleges that he could not grant this increase of pay, looking to his Democratic proclivities. I, for one, as a Democrat, protest against his doctrine on that point. As Democrats we have felt it to be our duty for years to pay our employés liberal salaries for the labors which they are called upon to perform; and in justice to them, as the cost of living increased, we have increased those salaries; it is only just to those who serve us. And I am not to be moved from that position by any argument addressed to the popular ear in reference to the discrimination of the pay of our employés and the pay of our soldiers in the field. I have been ready to go with my friend from Indiana step by step for the increase of their pay; but that is not the question before the House.

The question is, what shall we pay our employés? The question is whether their compensation is sufficient for their support. Do we pay them a reasonable compensation for their labor? We have already answered that it was not; and we cannot recede from that position without a violation of our faith to those men who have been diligently and faithfully discharging their duties.

It seems to me that this House ought to be prompted to take care of its own interests by giving to its employés such compensation as it thinks reasonable. It is a fact not disputed that the employés of the Senate receive and have been receiving more pay than the employés of the House. We have not complained of that; we have only asked in this exigency of the times that we shall be allowed to pay to our employés such compensation as will afford them reasonable remuneration for their labors. We have done that and nothing more. We have done nothing more than we are entitled to do. I, for one, do not feel like receding from the position taken by the House upon this question. I will not recede at the dictation of the Senate of the United States upon a question which affects our own employés.

Mr. MORRILL. I demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question was ordered to be put.

The SPEAKER. There are three propositions before the House: first, the motion of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] to recede from the disagreement of the House to all the amendments of the Senate except the one which has been under discussion, the appropriation out of the contingent fund to pay the twenty per cent. extra compensation to the employés of the House; second, the motion of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] to amend by including all the amendments in the motion to recede; and lastly, the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] that the House adhere to the disputed fourth amendment in reference to the payment of the extra compensation.

The first question is upon the motion of the gentleman from Indiana to amend the motion of the gentleman from Ohio so as to include all the amendments in the motion to recede.

The question was put; and on a division there were—ayes 33, noes 90.

Mr. PIKE demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

The question recurring on the motion of Mr. SCHENCK, that the House recede from its disagreement to all the amendments of the Senate except the fourth, it was put; and there were, on a division—ayes 70, noes 43.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Pennsylvania. There is evidently a misapprehension, and I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. STEVENS. I would suggest to the gentleman that we had better reserve the yeas and nays for the last proposition, as that is the important one.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Pennsylvania. I will withdraw the demand.

So the motion was agreed to.

The question recurring upon the motion that the House adhere to its disagreement to the fourth amendment of the Senate.

Mr. HOLMAN. What will be the effect of agreeing to that motion?

The SPEAKER. The House will determine by that vote that they will adhere to that provision of the bill. [Laughter.]

Mr. HOLMAN. Will it prevent another committee of conference?

The SPEAKER. It will not. It will prevent the House itself from asking another committee; but it will leave the Senate free to ask another committee.

Mr. PIKE. I move that the House recede.

The SPEAKER. That motion has just been voted down.

Mr. LITTLEJOHN. Will not the gentleman change his motion to a motion to insist, so that the House may ask another committee?

Mr. STEVENS. To adhere is the proper motion.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move that the House insist upon its disagreement.

The SPEAKER. That motion is not in order now, as the previous question has been sustained.

Mr. MORRILL. I desire to ask what condition the bill will be in provided the House vote to adhere? Will not the bill be lost unless the Senate recede?

The SPEAKER. It will not. A message will be sent to the Senate that the House recede from its disagreement to all the Senate amendments except the fourth, and in reference to that, that they adhere. The Senate can then recede, or ask another committee of conference. The Senate have sent a message to the House stating that they further insisted on their disagreement, and asked a second committee of conference, which was granted by the House. They have not notified the House that they adhered, for they could not, under any rule known to the Chair, adhere and ask a conference of the House; nor has the House been informed of any adherence by the Senate. But after one House adheres, the other can recede or ask a conference, as by the Manual, page 125, where four such instances are cited from 3d Hatsell, and even one case where there was a conference after a second or final adherence. But more familiar instances are found in House Journal, first session Thirty-Fourth Congress, page 1600, where the House adhered to their amendment to the Army appropriation bill, August 23, 1856, but granted a conference asked by the Senate thereon; and in House Journal, first session Thirty-Fifth Congress, page 604, where the House adhered to their amendment to the Senate bill for the admission of Kansas into the Union, and yet, a few days after, on April 14, 1853, page 620, agreed to a conference thereon asked by the Senate.

Mr. PIKE. Upon the motion to adhere I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was put; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 91, nays 46, not voting 45; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. James C. Allen, William J. Allen, Ancona, Anderson, Ashley, Bailey, Blair, Bliss, Blow, Boyd, James S. Brown, William G. Brown, Chandler, Coffroth, Cox, Cravens, Dawson, Deming, Denison, Dixon, Driggs, Eckley, Eden, Edgerton, Eldridge, Eliot, Farnsworth, Ganson, Grider, Griswold, Benjamin G. Harris, Charles M. Harris, Herrick, Hotchkiss, John H. Hubbard, Jencks, Philip Johnson, Kalbfleisch, Kelley, King, Knox, Law, Le Blond, Loan, Longyear, Mallory, Marvin, McAllister, McBride, Middleton, Moorhead, Daniel Morris, James R. Morris, Morrison, Leonard Myers, Noble, Charles O'Neill, John O'Neill, Orth, Pendleton, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, William H. Randall, Robinson, Rogers, James S. Rollins, Ross, Scheuck, Scott, Shannon, Smith, Smithers, Starr, John B. Steele, William G. Steele, Stevens, Strouse, Stuart, Swent, Thayer, Townsend, Van Valkenburgh, Wadsworth, Ward, Webster, Whaley, Wheeler, Chilton A. White, Joseph IV. White, Williams, and Yeaman—91.

NAYS—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Ames, Arnold, John D. Baldwin, Baxter, Beaman, Blaine, Boutwell, Broomall, Ambrose W. Clark, Freeman Clarke, Cobb, Cole, Garfield, Gooch, Grinnell, Hale, Harding, Harrington, Higby, Holman, Hooper, Asahel W. Hubbard, Ingersoll, Julian, Kasson, Orlando Kellogg, Kernan, McClurg, McIndoe, Samuel F. Miller, Morrill, Norton, Patterson, Perlman, Pike, Price, Edward H. Rollins, Sloan, Spalding, Thomas, Tison, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, and Wilson—45.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Augustus C. Baldwin, Brandegee, Brooks, Clay, Creswell, Henry Winter Davis, Thomas T. Davis, Dawes, Donnelly, Dumont, English, Finck, Frank, Hall, Hubbard, Hutchins, William Johnson, Francis W. Kellogg, Knapp, Lazear, Littlejohn, Long, Marcy, McDowell, McKinney, William H. Miller, Amos Myers, Nelson, Odell, Perry, Pomeroy, Pruyn, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Seefeld, Stiles, Tracy, Voorhees, Wilder, Winford, Winfield, Benjamin Wood, Fernando Wood, Woodbridge, and Worthington—43.

So the House determined to adhere to a disagreement to the fourth amendment of the Senate.

During the roll call,

Mr. PIKE stated that his colleague, Mr. Rice, was unavoidably absent, but that if present he would have voted "no."

The result of the vote having been announced as above recorded,

Mr. STEVENS moved to reconsider the vote by which the House adhered to its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate, and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. HOLMAN. I now renew the demand for the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. The regular order of business is the consideration of bill of the House No. 214.

Mr. SCHENCK. I ask my colleague [Mr. PENDLETON] if he will allow me to offer, in behalf of the Military Committee, two or three resolutions calling for information.

Mr. PENDLETON. If they can be passed without objection, I shall not object; otherwise I must—

Mr. HOLMAN. I insist on the regular order of business.

CORRECTIONS OF THE JOURNAL.

Mr. GRISWOLD. I rise to a privileged question. I desire to correct the Journal of the House. I find that my name is not recorded against the joint resolution that passed the day before yesterday reducing the duty on paper to three per cent. I voted "no."

The Journal was, by unanimous consent, ordered to be corrected.

Mr. BALDWIN, of Massachusetts. I find myself recorded as voting "no" yesterday, on the motion to lay on the table the resolution concerning the Dictionary of Congress. I voted "ay." I ask that the Journal be corrected.

The Journal was, by unanimous consent, ordered to be corrected.

OFFICERS IN SUBSISTENCE DEPARTMENT.

Mr. SCHENCK, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Military Affairs, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to communicate to this House at as early a day as practicable a list of the officers of the subsistence department, showing severally their rank and where each of them is employed, and for how long they have been respectively employed.

MAJOR GENERAL HALLECK.

Mr. SCHENCK also, by unanimous consent, and from the same committee, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to inform this House what is the duty or command to which Major General H. W. Halleck, United States Army, is assigned; whether he is drawing double rations; and if so, under what order such allowance is made, and by what authority of law.

OFFICERS IN QUARTERMASER'S DEPARTMENT.

Mr. SCHENCK also, by unanimous consent, and from the same committee, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be instructed to communicate to this House a list of all officers assigned under the tenth, eleventh, and twelfth sections of the act to provide for the better organization of the quartermaster's department, approved July 4, 1864, stating the duty to which each of said officers has been assigned, the rank that assignment entitles him to, and whether selected from the volunteer service or from the regular Army, and from what former duty taken.

CABINET OFFICERS IN CONGRESS.

The House then proceeded to the consideration of the motion to reconsider the vote by which joint resolution of the House, (No. 214,) to provide that the heads of Executive Departments may occupy seats on the floor of the House of Representatives was recommitted to the select committee upon that subject, and upon which Mr. PENDLETON was entitled to the floor.

Mr. PENDLETON. I desire to yield the hour which is accorded to me by the rules in opening this debate to my colleague upon the committee from New York, [Mr. GANSON.]

Mr. GANSON. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. PENDLETON] at the last session, on the 6th day of April, introduced into the House a joint resolution providing that the heads of the Executive Departments might occupy seats on the floor of this House, which resolution was referred to a select committee of seven for consideration and report. That committee reported at the present session in favor of that resolution, recommending its passage with two amendments, and also recommending an amendment to the rules providing the proper machinery for carrying out the proposed project.

The resolution, when it was introduced, did not embrace within its terms the Secretary of State or the Attorney General. The committee, upon consideration, saw no reason why the privilege proposed to be extended to the other heads of the Departments should not also be extended to the Secretary of State and the Attorney General, and why also they should not be subjected to the same duty that it is proposed to impose upon the heads of the other Departments by the second section, to wit, to attend the sessions of the House to answer such questions as may be put to them relative to the business in their respective Departments.

The resolution, as reported, contains two sections. The first provides—

That the Secretary of State, the Secretary of the Treasury, the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Navy, the Secretary of the Interior, the Attorney General, and the Postmaster General, shall be entitled to occupy seats on the floor of the House of Representatives, with the right to participate in debate upon matters relating to the business of their respective Departments, under such rules as may be prescribed by the House.

The second section provides—

That the said Secretaries, the Attorney General, and the Postmaster General, shall attend the sessions of the House of Representatives, immediately on the opening of the sittings on Mondays and Thursdays of each week, to give information in reply to questions which may be propounded to them under the rules of the House.

It will be seen that the resolution by its first section extends a privilege to the heads of the Executive Departments which they do not now enjoy; that is, to occupy seats on this floor and to participate, to a limited extent, in the debates of the House, that limitation being confined to matters which relate to the business of their respective Departments. The other section imposes on them the duty to attend the sittings of the House on Mondays and Thursdays in each week, to answer such questions as may be propounded to them, in accordance with the rule, relating to the business of their respective Departments.

The first question that naturally presents itself in considering this resolution, is whether there is anything in the Constitution conflicting with it; and the next is whether, if we have the power to pass the resolution, it is expedient to do so. The House will perceive that it is not contemplated to confer any other privileges on, or vest any other rights in, those officers than the right to occupy seats on the floor, and to participate to a limited extent in the debates. It confers no other right of membership on these executive officers. The Congress has exercised, ever since the organization of the Government, the same power which it is proposed to exercise in this instance. Congress confers on persons who come here claiming to represent Territories, a right to seats. It also extends the privilege of the floor to those who come to contest the seats of sitting members. It gives to Delegates the right of participating in debates, and to contestants the right of speaking to the question in which they are interested.

On the 2d day of September, 1789, Congress, in the law creating the Treasury Department, provided expressly that it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to make report and give information to either branch of the Legislature in person or in writing, as he may be required, respecting all matters referred to him by the Senate or House of Representatives, or which shall appertain to his office. The committee saw no constitutional objection to this proposed measure. It saw that the measure harmonized with the action of previous Congresses since the formation of the Government. While the Secretary of the Treasury stands bound to appear here at the call of the House and give information, when interrogated, as to the business relating to his Department, the committee saw no reason why the same duty should not be imposed on the other heads of Departments. The committee thought also that it was just to those officers, while they were required to attend here at specified times and for specified purposes, that there should be extended to them the privilege of seats on the floor, and the right of participating in debate relating to matters proposed by them.

In order, Mr. Speaker, that the House may the better understand what is proposed by the second section, I will ask the Clerk to read the amendments to the rules which the committee recommended.

The Clerk read, as follows:

Amendments to the Rules, reported by the Select Committee.

That the Clerk of the House of Representatives shall keep a notice-book, in which he shall enter, on the request of any member, any resolution requiring information from any of the Executive Departments, or any question intended to be propounded to any of the Secretaries, or the Postmaster General, or Attorney General, relating to public affairs or to the business pending before the House, together with the name of the member and the day when the same will be called up.

The member giving notice of such resolution or question shall, at the same time, give notice that the same shall be called up on Monday or Thursday of the succeeding week: Provided, That no such resolution or question shall be called up, except by unanimous consent, within less than three days after notice shall have been given.

The Clerk shall, on the same day on which notice is entered, transmit to the chief officer of the proper Department a copy of the resolution or question, together with the name of the member proposing the same, and of the day when it will come before the House for action.

On Monday and Thursday of each week, before any other business shall be taken up, except by unanimous consent, the resolutions and questions shall be taken up in the order in which they have been entered upon the notice-book for that day.

The member offering a resolution may state succinctly the object and scope of his resolution and the reasons for desiring the information, and the Secretary of the proper Department may reply, giving the information or the reasons why the same should be withheld, and then, without further debate, the House shall vote on the resolution, unless it shall be withdrawn or postponed.

In putting any question to the Secretaries, or the Attorney General, or Postmaster General, no argument or opinion is to be offered, nor any fact stated, except so far as may be necessary to explain such question. And in answering such question, the Secretary, the Attorney General, or Postmaster General, shall not debate the matter to which the same refers, nor state facts or opinions other than those necessary to explain the answer.

Mr. GANSON. At present, Mr. Speaker, there is no authorized mode of communication between these executive officers and the House in regard to matters of legislation. The object of the resolution is to enable Congress to avail itself of the best possible means of information in regard to measures of legislation on which it may be called to act. The heads of Departments have necessarily a more thorough and intimate knowledge of what is requisite in legislation, so far as their Departments are concerned, than members of the House. They also have the experience of heads of bureaus, men who have been engaged for a long time in their public duties, and who are familiar with the details of their respective Departments. It is necessary that the knowledge thus acquired shall, in some manner, be communicated to this House for its proper action in reference to various measures of a public character.

The President of the United States is expressly authorized by the Constitution to require the heads of these Departments to give their opinion in writing in regard to any matter relating to their respective Departments. But this House cannot compel the giving of this information. The necessity for it is so great that it has grown into a uniform custom for the Executive to transmit with his annual message, and at other times, communications from these officers to the House, recommending legislation. The necessity for this communication is so great that the heads of these Departments seek private interviews with the members of the House; they attend the sittings of the various committees; they have oral and written communication of an unauthorized nature, necessarily. Now, we propose that, instead of this, they shall have the right to come upon the floor of the House, and in the face of the Representatives of the people and before the nation, not only give the information which they possess in regard to proposed legislation, but that they may urge the passage or the defeat of these measures, as the public interest and the welfare of the country may require.

It may be objected to this that we are giving to the heads of these Departments additional and dangerous powers. I have no doubt, Mr. Speaker, that if this bill be adopted it will give to the heads of these Departments an influence which they do not now possess; but it will be a due influence, instead of one that is undue. It will remove from them the necessity of having secret, unauthorized, irresponsible communications with the members of this House or its committees, and to substitute for that their duty to appear upon the floor of the House, in the presence of the Representatives of the people and before the nation, to disclose the objects and purposes of the measures that they may desire to have passed. When this privilege shall have been conferred upon them and this power given to them, it will be unbecoming the heads of the Executive Departments to have these secret, silent, irresponsible interviews—this secret, private solicitation of the measures necessary for their Departments. When the doors of this House are thrown open to them, when they can come directly into the presence of the Representatives of the people and advocate their measures, they will have no occasion to use this invisible, intangible, irresponsible influence which every one now feels but cannot touch.

It may be objected that the project does not harmonize with the theory of our Government. But, sir, why are we here? To represent the people, and to provide such legislation as the welfare of the country and the interests of the people require. In order that this may be well and faithfully done, it is our duty to procure all the knowledge in our power to enable us to act intelligently upon these subjects. That knowledge is necessarily, in many instances, lodged exclusively in the Departments over which these executive officers preside. We have now no mode of reaching it with certainty and bringing it before us with promptitude. On the 21st day of December last a resolution was introduced into this House to ask what communications had passed relative to the exchange of prisoners. One month having expired, on the 21st of January we have a report upon that subject. If this bill should become a law, three days' notice will be served upon the head of any Department, and he will be required to come here and answer the questions propounded. It will facilitate our business; it will aid us in our legislation.

Furthermore, (and this I regard as its most important feature,) this measure will impose upon these officers a direct responsibility to the people, in the presence of their Representatives, for the faithful discharge of their executive duties. In addition to that, it will enable these officers, if they are improperly charged by any portion of the public, to come upon the floor of this House and make known the truth, so that if they are right they may be justified, and if they are wrong they may be condemned.

I would ask the attention of members of the House to some illustrations appended to the report in regard to the difficulty in obtaining information, and of its unreliable character. After reading those, and after recalling to their recollection numerous instances of the same kind that have occurred, they will, I think, be satisfied of the merit of this measure in this respect.

Mr. Speaker, it was the practice, in the earlier and better days of the Republic, for the heads of these Departments to come upon the floor of the House to furnish information of facts and to submit to inquiries; and I ask the Clerk to read from page 6 of the report some circumstances of this character.

The Clerk read, as follows:

"Wednesday, July 22, 1789.—The Secretary of Foreign Affairs [Mr. Jefferson] attended, agreeably to order, and made the necessary explanations.—Annals of Congress, First Congress, vol. 1, p. 51.

"Saturday, August 22, 1789.—The Senate again entered on executive business. The President of the United States came into the Senate Chamber, attended by General Knox, [Secretary of War,] and laid before the Senate the following statement of facts, with the questions thereto annexed, for their advice and consent.—Annals of Congress, First Congress, vol. 1, p. 66.

"And again, on the Monday following, the President and General Knox were before the Senate.

"Friday, August 7, 1789.—The following message was received from the President of the United States, by General Knox, [the Secretary of War,] who delivered therewith sundry statements and papers relating to the same.—Proceedings of House of Representatives, Annals of Congress, vol. 1, p. 684.

"Monday, August 10, 1789.—The following message was received from the President, by General Knox, [Secretary of War,] who delivered in the same, together with statement of the troops in the service of the United States.—Proceedings of House of Representatives, Annals of Congress, vol. 1, p. 689.

"Instances of this kind might be almost indefinitely multiplied, but these serve sufficiently to exhibit the practice established at an early day by those who framed the Constitution."

Mr. GANSON. These instances occurred in the regular proceedings of the House, it never being in executive session. I make these remarks because, as I understand, the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] has denied that it was the practice for these persons to appear upon the floor.

Mr. MORRILL. I merely contended that such instances never occurred in the House, but only in the Senate, with regard to executive communications.

Mr. GANSON. Two of these instances are from the proceedings of the House of Representatives, not of the Senate.

But, Mr. Speaker, I do not see why it is proper for the heads of these Executive Departments to go upon the floor of the Senate and participate in its proceedings to this limited extent, and not proper for them to have an opportunity to do so upon the floor of the House. The only objection that I can see to it is that it will enable them to exercise this influence to which I have referred. If any influence is to be exercised over the members of the House it should be open, authorized, done in the presence of the Representatives and before the people of the country. And the point I make is that we are subject to that influence now, and that it is exercised in a secret, unauthorized, private, irresponsible manner. We desire, sir, by this measure to substitute a responsible exercise of this influence for one that is irresponsible.

I regard the proposed measure as a decided step toward the people. I regard it as important in securing popular rights. I know that the project has been proposed frequently of electing these public officers in order that they may be directly responsible to the people for the faithful discharge of their public duties. This is a measure of like character, only not so direct as the one which would confer upon the people the right to elect these officers. They have no control over them other than to compel them to come in the presence of members and give reasons for their conduct.

I regard it as important, not only as being just to the officer himself, but as furnishing additional means for detecting faithlessness in the discharge of executive duty. Does any gentleman suppose, if this right had existed in 1860–61, when privy conspiracy was being concocted in this House and in the Departments; that if this right had then existed in the Representatives of the people to call the heads of Departments upon this floor to explain why they were disposing of the public property, why they were removing vessels at such distance so that they could not be used in time, and why they were selling the arms and munitions of war of the Government; does anybody doubt that there would have been an earlier disclosure and defeat of that conspiracy? I think not. The House was then required to go through the forms of creating committees for the purpose of instituting investigations, and the Sergeant-at-Arms had to be sent with subpoenas for the persons who were to be examined. All these difficulties had to be encountered to reach these concoctors against the Government of the country.

It was my purpose, Mr. Speaker, to do nothing more at this time than to explain to the House the provisions of this measure, and to give some of the leading considerations which induced the committee to report it favorably to the House. I leave to my associates on the committee, and the other gentlemen who may engage in the debate, the duty of discussing in detail the merits of the measure.

I hope, sir, that it will pass, believing, as I have said already, that it is a direct step toward the people and the security of popular rights. If it is adopted it will furnish more direct means of communication between this House and the Executive Departments. It will be open, authorized, responsible. It will give the House power to detect faithlessness in its officers. It will relieve us from private solicitations, and from acting upon private and unreliable information. It will enable us to discharge our duties more satisfactorily. I hope, therefore, the resolution will be adopted.

Mr. PIKE. If it is in order to move an amendment at this stage of the resolution, I have one to suggest. The resolution provides that all the heads of Departments may occupy places upon the floor of this House. I notice a very grave omission, that the head of the Department of Agriculture is not included.

Mr. GANSON. There will be no objection to include that, if the gentleman desires it.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. Speaker, not having the time necessary to prepare a minority report, I shall yet use the materials gathered for that purpose in the form of a speech. The framers of our system of government incorporated so much that is wise and good from the British constitution, steering clear, however, of its aristocratic features; the rights and liberties of the people of both countries are so similar, save that here they are multiplied and expanded by the American sentiment of universality; and the statutes and legal literature of the American and English courts have so much in common, that it is not wonderful to find some untransportable prescriptions or usages, tolerable enough for Englishmen, but hitherto rejected by us, still exciting the lingering regret of some gentlemen whose democratic affinities remain unimpeachable.

The project introduced by my friend from Ohio, [Mr. PENDLETON,] that members of the President's Cabinet shall hold seats in the House of Representatives, it is, perhaps, not unfair to presume, results from a study and admiration of the British example, as it could hardly be asked of us to copy from the rebel States or from Spain, Costa Rica, or even Hayti. He proposes to modify the custom by giving the Secretaries seats with power of speech, and to compel them to be present two days of each week to answer to resolutions and interrogatories of which previous notice shall have been given, but without the right of voting.

Not having been able to agree to this proposition as now presented, I shall, as one of the minority of the select committee, present some of the reasons for my dissent, and try to show that the plan is opposed to the genius of our institutions, that it would be cumbersome, expensive, unwarranted by the Constitution, and accompanied by evils which would far more than counterbalance the advantages sought to be obtained. As the question is now seriously presented, I hope that gentlemen of more ability and more knowledge of the subjects involved than I possess, will discuss the negative and, as I think, the American side of the question.

It is obvious that what may harmonize with the British constitution might prove very incongruous and even mischievous to that of the United States. It may be useful to point out some of the broad distinctions, the incompatibilities, between the two.

The English idea is the conservation of monarchy, nobility, and an established church. The American idea is to maintain the principles of 1776, or that all men were created equal, with certain inalienable rights, including that of worshipping God according to the dictates of conscience. The American Congress, though having many similar functions, is very unlike the British Parliament. The House of Commons is elected for seven years. Here the House of Representatives is elected for two years only. We have a salary, equal to a moderate support, and no man is excluded on account of his poverty. A member of the House of Commons draws little or no pay, is subjected to heavy expenses, and cannot be sworn into office unless possessed of an annual rental of a specified amount. None but wealthy men can there afford to be even candidates, and poor men are wholly precluded. The House of Peers is mainly hereditary or composed of members for life, and all new appointments emanate exclusively from the Crown. Each peer in the House of Lords is there in his own behalf and represents nobody else. Here the Senate is elected by State Legislatures for six years only, and represents the several States. Great Britain is governed by the aristocracy and the monarchy. The House of Peers and the wealthy aristocracy really nominate or control a majority of the House of Commons. Compromises have nearly always been made between the monarchy and aristocracy. Only when they have been at variance has the power of the Commons increased. With the appointing power in the hands of the Crown, threatening an augmentation of members and a dilution of the peerage whenever a sufficient exigency arises—a measure always dreaded by the existing peers, whose value diminishes in proportion as they are multiplied—these titled parties are nearly balanced if they happen to be in conflict. When they act together they are, irrespective of the people, omnipotent, and the people have no check upon them except through a free press, that great agitator in behalf of human rights and common avenger of wrongs. The United States Government was ordained, has been sustained, and will be maintained by the people. It has confidence in and relies upon the people. The policy of every Administration is biennially reviewed and approved, or disapproved by the ballots of not less than four or five million jurors. A verdict thus given, next to the fiat of Heaven, commands and receives our acquiescence.

The President is almost as much the representative of the people as the House of Representatives. He is elected for four years, or twice as long as a member of the House and two thirds of the term of a Senator. He has constitutional rights not to be invaded by Congress. His Cabinet are his confidential and constitutional advisers, and responsible to him, and only to him, within the law and the Constitution. If he does not choose wisely or they act wrongly, four years is sure to terminate his and their career. The people decide the whole matter, unless such cases of delinquency arise as merit impeachment, and the people will and should hold the President to a just responsibility. They will not consent to a bureaucracy—a government by the heads of Departments, not elective, but holding their offices by executive appointment. The President should not be permitted to shirk off his responsibilities upon subordinates. He can call around him the ablest men of the country, as it is his duty to do, and if he does not do so, or if, having done so, he takes no counsel at their hands, he alone is accountable.

It is otherwise in Great Britain. The throne is never vacant, and by a considerable fiction it is assumed that the Crown can do no wrong. There the ministers alone are held to responsibility. If they advise measures which Parliament in face of their tact and eloquence determines against them, it is equivalent to a vote of want of confidence, and they lose their official places, or must venture upon the result of a dissolution of Parliament and a new election. But the mass of the British people are only lookers on, while a few electors decide the issue presented.

The number of Englishmen and Welshmen voting in 1852 was only 341,830 out of an adult male population of 4,500,000. If all had voted who were entitled to vote not more than one man in five could have done so. In a population of 20,000,000 less than one in twenty are voters. The whole number of registered voters was 918,683. Of these the average number required to make a member of Parliament was 691, and a majority of that number is 346, the actual number necessary to elect. Representation in proportion to numbers or population is entirely set at naught. The counties, with 507,754 registered electors, return 159 members, but the less populous boroughs, with only 410,929 registered electors, return 339 members, or more than twice the number of members and at the same time with 100,000 less voters.

The ministry govern only by parliamentary majorities, and to this end seats to them become indispensable. They strive to absorb the men of distinction, the Broughams, Peels, and Gladstones, and the task of leading the crowd of undistinguished "voting members," as they are called, is thus made easy. Such a form of government may be well enough adapted to a small island, but would most likely fail in a large continental country. If England had conceded to the American colonies the right to representation she would soon have become democratized, and the character of her Government would have been wholly changed. To talk of her as a representative Government like that of the United States is an absurdity. Words are said by a distinguished writer to have power when we see a man behind them. Representatives certainly should have power in proportion to the number of men behind them. With such a test my friend from Michigan, [Mr. UPSON,] with his 25,000 voters should count about equal to thirty-five members of Parliament, and our Speaker, [Mr. COLFAX,] with his 28,000 Indianians, should be equal to forty. And this is the difference between the American and the British standard of representation.

The excitement of an English election, even with so few participants, is far from inconsiderable. The multitude, who look on while the voting proceeds vis à voce, cheer or hiss the voter as they may be pleased or displeased with the vote. The expense is not small, and the corruption is formidable. But whatever the result, whether the ins or outs are Whigs or Tories, the inevitable rule of the aristocracy prevails. The Whigs in power are almost as reluctant to press reforms as their adversaries, and the Tories out of power are as eloquent in popular cries as those who have got their places by more liberal votes when in an irresponsible minority. The only difference between the oligarchical parties would seem to be that one party yields nothing, for example, in the way of extending the right of suffrage, lest in the end it should be forced to yield all; the other party would concede something now lest in the end it should be forced to give up all. Neither are believers in universal suffrage. Both are alike averse to it, and they only disagree as to the wisest method of warding it off. With such issues an oligarchy, dwelling compactly together within a small territory, may be able to maintain itself for an indefinite period, or until the masses discover that, whosoever wins, they are lost. North, Pitt, Peel, and Palmerston, each prolong their premiership for years, and yet British statutes present few ear-marks by which the Tory or Whig would be discovered.

If the Government of the United States had to bear the strain of a new national election, in addition to elections already provided for, whenever an Administration measure should be defeated, it would keep us in endless confusion and instability. The periodical return of these excitements is enough without the cometary visitations incident to a change of ministry to perplex the nation still more. The acquiescence of the American people in the decisions of the majority has been prominently evinced in our whole history, with but a single exception, and that exception we are so rapidly washing out with blood and erasing with the sharp points of the bayonet that it will be remembered only to be shunned and execrated. Let us concede that it might not be possible for Great Britain to adopt our form of Government—universal suffrage, voting by ballot, and frequent elections—and succeed. By her own confession she has less than a million people capable of self-government, for less than that number are permitted to vote. It would be quite as unwise for us to adopt many things which are the daily food of Great Britain, especially the commingling of the executive with the legislative department.

The examples to be found in some other Governments, where the sovereign power is lodged in the Executive, furnish an argument not for but against the adoption of the scheme proposed. It is not inconsistent with their theory, and their example is one we strove and yet strive to avoid. In France it makes no difference whether Richelieu and Louis XIV, or the Revolution and Napoleon, nor whether Louis Philippe or Louis Napoleon are triumphant, the grand march of centralization proceeds ever the same, and the executive power, by whomsoever wielded, maintains its primitive vigor with no signs of feebleness or decrepitude. Because Louis Napoleon permits his ministers to enter one or both of the legislative bodies which he has ordained and licensed, and insists that they shall be heard, it by no means follows that the United States should be swift to copy the latest French pattern. Nor can Spain or even modern Greece yet be invoked as our instructors. If all Europe led the way, and Brazil and all the twinkling stars of Central America followed in the train, our own time-honored example, in a case of this character, would be for us a higher, nobler, and safer precedent for abiding reverence and future practice.

I know that it is not proposed to extend this measure beyond a seat in this House to members of the Cabinet, with the liberty of speech. No greater innovation is at present contemplated. But it may be doubted much whether the half of the British example is better than the whole.

The Secretaries, if the measure passes, may be interrogated and fail to give satisfactory answers. They may lose the confidence of the House, and, retaining the confidence of the President, there they are still to remain till the end of the term. Their failure may be only an inaptitude of speech or want of cleverness in explanation, so that a good cause may be sacrificed by forcing the client to become his own advocate. Legal gentlemen here, with strong partisan predilections, may desire to put a Cabinet to which they are opposed to the torture of a cross-examination, not for the single purpose of eliciting substantial information, but to gratify the passion of prosecutors, and to figure in frequent petty impeachments.

On the other hand, a Secretary may wield a large measure of persuasive power, and thus gloss and carry measures devoid of those solid merits upon which alone they ought to stand. Such a Secretary would be dangerous as a leader, or rather as a misleader.

It may be argued that the scheme would keep men of inferior capacity out of office. If this could be assured, it would certainly be a strong argument in favor of the measure. It is my belief, however, that incapacity would be more apt to fold itself and its victims in the suffocating embrace of unscrupulous patronage or to hide itself in nimble words and flippant rhetoric. Unfortunately, executive ability and knowledge of mankind, such as guaranty the selection of the best instrumentalities for the accomplishment of great purposes, are not always found in connection with eloquence or with readiness in debate. Some ancient orators, not to mention any modern, were disgraced when they took the field, and we may well doubt whether they would have succeeded any better as national financiers. Albert Gallatin was no debater, but he was one of our most successful Secretaries of the Treasury. Jefferson was a great man, but on this floor he would have been overmatched by Mike Walsh. Executive ability, the mastery of great principles as well as of minor details, coupled with knowledge of affairs and of men, is as rare as the possession of genius or the power of magnetism in debate, and we have to regret that it is a quality among our countrymen now more desirable than abundant.

The evils experienced in Great Britain in the practice of this measure, the worst part of which, when all parts are bad, we are now asked to copy, have been so great that the number of the Cabinet allowed seats in Parliament has been more than once reduced and limited. The goal of British ambition is the Cabinet. If men of mark are assembled there, yet the bulk of such men appear to shun the House of Commons; the place is too tame, and its glory is disappearing. Bright and Cobden almost alone represent the great commoners, the Chathams, Foxes, and Burkes.

When we build up the Executive Departments of our Government let us not do it at the expense of the Representatives of the people.

If we look at the details of this bill, and the practices, voluntary and compulsory, that will be generated by it, these will be found no less obnoxious than its fundamental principles.

Section first of the bill, as reported, gives the right to all the Secretaries and members of the Cabinet to occupy seats in this House, and to participate in the debates under such rules as may be prescribed by the House, and these rules may of course be modified at any time according to the pleasure of any accidental majority.

Section second requires that they shall absolutely attend the sessions of the House immediately on the opening of the sitting on Mondays and Thursdays of each week to give information in reply to questions which may be propounded to them under the rules of the House.

Thus it is proposed to change the rules of the House at the start of this new programme, so that the first business on Mondays and Thursdays shall be to consider the resolutions and questions of which any member shall have given notice, to the exclusion of all other business. It is also provided that the mover of the resolution or question may state succinctly the object and scope of his resolution and the reasons for desiring the information, and such arguments, opinions, and facts as may be necessary to explain his questions. The Secretaries are to reply—but suppose they refuse, what then?—giving the information or the reasons why the same should be withheld, stating facts and opinions so far as may be necessary to explain the matter; and then, without further debate, the House is to vote on the resolution, unless it shall be withdrawn. The amendments to the rules are put in the form of a negative pregnant—that no more than this shall be done—and the logical conclusion and ruling would be that so much might be done and would be in order.

Any one tolerably conversant with such rules knows the latitude of debate which would spring up or could be achieved with such nominal restrictions, and that a fair parliamentarian would be able to give utterance to all he might desire without let or hindrance. Should it turn out otherwise, the rules would be changed or the decisions of the Speaker overruled. Except when answering to resolutions or questions, the Secretaries, upon business relating to their Departments, are to have the same latitude of debate enjoyed by members of the House, and would of course be liable to be interrupted by questions even without the three days' notice. Any bill containing a charge upon the Treasury could be debated by the Secretary of the Treasury; any proposed law whatever would be open to the Attorney General; and thus no matter of legislation could come up where the Executive Departments might not actively interfere. Even now, our "resolution days," so called, though often convenient, coming upon every alternate Monday—to say nothing of suspension day—are subject to great abuse, and are used by all parties more or less for the classic purposes of Buncombe. Old members on both sides of the House feel that these days are, as to legislative objects, mainly wasted, and they hail an early adjournment as a relief. It is here that smart gentlemen bring in cunningly-worded resolutions to obtain the weather gauge of their opponents—such resolutions as one party may swallow and such as another party must not refuse, but which, like Macbeth's amen, will stick in the throat. It is the perpetual entertainment of the fox and stork—dishes palatable to the hosts but unapproachable by the guests.

If we were to adopt this scheme we might thereby throw away eight days every month instead of two or four, and in this toilsome but useless labor the partisans of the Secretaries would be driven to a ceaseless activity, equal to and as conspicuous as that of their opponents. Instead of attending to legislative duties, the House would be the arena for skillful political fencing-masters, and the chief interest would soon center upon these eager encounters, where the victors would be congratulated and the vanquished derided.

Nor is it until after this takes place that the House reaches any vote. Any member may offer as many resolutions, wise or crude, as it may suit his pleasure, or may propound as many questions, restrained only by his sense of propriety. The Clerk's notice-book, where all these are to be entered, would soon be, in learned phrase, "a big thing." Any malignant outsider, who could obtain the kind services of a member willing to ask crooked questions, might here find the highway of his ambition. Now, in resolutions calling upon the Executive for information, anything frivolous is apt to be excluded, for we must have the sanction of a majority, at least, of the House, and usually the vote of the entire House is obtained when the object is truly legitimate, and then the response becomes a permanent record for all coming time. The document remains to be examined by every member, and does not pass away with the hour. It seems to me that this method is by far the most satisfactory.

Again, the House is to vote, but upon what is the House to vote? If the information sought has been communicated, what will be left to vote upon? And yet the resolution can only be withdrawn by the mover. If the information has been withheld for reasons satisfactory to the Secretary, what shape is the vote to assume? Is it to be "content" or "non-content"? Is it to be complimentary or censorious? The amendment to the rules leaves all this quite in the dark. If it was proposed to have the decision one of confidence or want of confidence, and the retention or dismissal of the Cabinet pending upon that decision, the proposition would not appear, as it now does, so objectless. To have a vote of "content" and yet to have the Cabinet go out, or to have a vote of "non-content" and yet have the Cabinet retained, would leave the position of the House quite as ridiculous as that of the Cabinet.

It will scarcely be denied that the new practice, if once inaugurated, would consume much valuable time and greatly prolong the sessions of Congress.

The information now communicated to Congress, in fullness and variety, as to the annual condition of public affairs, is unsurpassed by that of any nation in the world. The President's message, the reports of the Secretaries, and the statements of the heads of all the different bureaus, in their elaborateness and completeness, rarely leave anything to be desired. If anyway at fault, it is that they are too voluminous and too minute to be seasonably read. It might gratify some members to have this abbreviated and given in concentrated doses, but I submit whether, in addition to the original sources of information, we shall institute abridged oral communications for the gratification of the indolently blind and halt? Let us not be dazzled by the idea of reform when only a change is offered, and that change the surrender of the substance for a vain shadow.

The proposition now made was of course not overlooked by the framers of our Constitution, and was, as most of our people have always thought, properly rejected, nothing having been provided unless it be its prohibition and avoidance. The power is nowhere directly granted, and if inferentially assumed it will be seen to be a maladroit assumption.

It is claimed by the majority of the committee that the power is found in the clause of the Constitution which declares that the President "shall from time to time give the Congress information of the state of the Union, and recommend to their consideration such measures as he shall deem necessary and expedient." How can it be seriously contended that Congress, under this clause, can compel the attendance of the President, either in person or by proxy, upon the sessions of either or both Houses of Congress? He alone is made the judge of what information or measures are "necessary and expedient" for him to communicate, and yet it is now proposed to make a law by which any member of this House may dictate as to the time and then bring the House to a direct vote upon the necessity and expediency. A clause which merely defines the duty of the President cannot be strained into a definition of the power and duties of Congress, nor will it justify the admission or coercion of seven gentlemen, however elevated in position, into this House with all the liberty of speech which may be accorded under the rules.

Washington and the elder Adams read their annual speeches to Congress, but Jefferson did not, and the practice has never been resumed. This practice, however, bears no relation to that of Cabinet ministers holding seats with the privilege of participating in debate, nor more especially of being catechised in this House. This involves principles of the utmost gravity. The reading of a speech in person, or the sending of it as a written communication, is a question of mere etiquette, of no possible consequence except as a bauble among monarchists, and properly belongs solely to the President. It is a matter of taste and without dignity in a constitutional argument. It will not be pretended that the President could hold a seat and participate in debates in our House. How, then, can you authorize him, far less compel him, to do by proxy, by seven agents, that which he cannot do as principal?

Nothing, perhaps, better exhibits the straits to which the advocates of this measure are driven for constitutional authority than the fact that they fly from one part of the Constitution to another, and finally alight on that which provides that "each House may determine the rules of its proceedings!" That is to say, in parliamentary proceedings each House determines the rules for itself and its own members, not for anybody else. Surely this clause does not confer power upon one House to determine the rules for the proceedings of the President, and if not upon one House certainly not upon both Houses. With equal propriety, under such a latitudinarian construction, and possibly with greater usefulness, might the Chief Justice of the United States be compelled to attend our sessions for the purpose of giving information and answering questions touching all legal matters.

If it had been intended to confer upon Congress the power to compel by law the attendance of the President's Cabinet in this House, then the power of enforcing such a law would also have been given. But it was not. If the Secretary should refuse to appear, what are you to do about it? Can you punish him? The House can only punish members for disorderly conduct. Would these Secretaries in fact be members? If so, would their silence be disorderly? The maximum of punishment which the House can inflict is expulsion upon a vote of two thirds of the members present. How much punishment would expulsion be to a recalcitrant Secretary who had already chosen to absent himself?

The Constitution unmistakably declares that "no person holding office under the United States shall be a member of either House during his continuance in office." Language more absolutely denunciatory of this measure cannot, it appears to me, be found, and yet it may be said that it does not apply in this case. If its force applies to full membership, it cannot be parried by any contrivance of half membership or members in all respects save the right of voting. A member or semi-member cannot be hidden even in the robes of a minister. Any Delegate from a Territory to this House, holding office under the United States, would, for analogous reasons, be at once excluded.

I do not think it is going too far to say that the project indorsed by a majority of the committee is not warranted by anything in the Constitution, and this view is fully sustained by its earliest and best expositors. The question came up in the session of Congress in 1790—so far as the question could come up upon the admission of the Secretary of the Treasury for once only into the House of Representatives—upon the question of allowing Alexander Hamilton, Secretary of the Treasury, to make his celebrated report upon his plan for supporting the public credit, and, though the temptation could hardly be greater from the pressing nature of the subject and the eminent character of the man, it being the discussion of measures vital to our young Republic by the most accomplished Secretary of the Treasury this or any other country has furnished, yet, upon an occasion of such gravity, the House, composed of a large number of the distinguished men who had made the American Revolution a success, and who had based a Constitution upon its principles, rejected the proposition after a brief debate, and that nearly or quite unanimously.

It may not be improper for me to reproduce briefly the history of this proceeding. On the 9th day of January, 1790,

"A letter from Alexander Hamilton, the Secretary of the Treasury, was read, informing the House that agreeably to their resolution of the 21st of September, he had prepared a plan for the support of the public credit, and that he was ready to report the same to this House when they should be pleased to receive it."

It was then proposed to assign Thursday, then next, for the purpose, and Mr. Gerry moved to add to the motion that it should be in writing.

Mr. Boudinot, the friend of Mr. Hamilton, hoped the Secretary might be permitted to report in person in order to answer such inquiries as the members might be disposed to make, for it was a justifiable surmise that gentlemen would not be able clearly to comprehend so intricate a subject without oral illustration.

Mr. Ames conceived it to be the duty of the House to obtain the best information on any subject, and was willing to extend every indulgence to the Secretary, but he wished these communications to be in writing; in this shape they would obtain a degree of permanency favorable to the responsibility of the office, while at the same time they would be less liable to be misunderstood.

Mr. Clymer thought such communications ought to be in writing.

Mr. Benson thought we should receive the report in any manner in which it was prepared, but had no doubt this officer, actuated by motives of deference and respect, will conform to any rule the House may think proper to enjoin.

Mr. Gerry, enumerating the various topics likely to be discussed, said:

"Can the human mind retain with any degree of decision [precision] objects so extensive and multifarious upon a mere oral communication? This consideration alone ought to be sufficient to induce gentlemen to agree to his proposition of making the report in writing."

The resolution for receiving the report in writing was carried in the affirmative, and, so far as appears, without a division.

Many valuable suggestions made by Hamilton were adopted, and his organization of the Treasury Department, a monument to his forecast and wisdom, remains with nearly all its original features hardly touched by modern innovations. But at the session already alluded to he made a report as to the Post Office Department, with a bill in conformity to it, and when the Clerk proceeded to read it a member objected to its being read on the ground of the impropriety of executive officers being permitted to bring bills before the House, and this objection was sustained. This exhibits the early and inherent jealousy of the House of executive influence in the most earnest manner. The action was instant and decisive. No such officer would now be permitted to bring any bill directly before the House, but it could not have been intended to forbid the draft of a bill from being sent to committees for their assistance in framing proper legislation, for that would be a little too nice. If a Secretary may unfold and urge a measure of legislation in his official reports, it is difficult to see why he may not submit the mere forms to a standing committee, (to be modified, adopted, or rejected,) which will in his judgment best carry out the substance of that legislation which he has already recommended.

Once more this question was incidentally discussed upon a report of a committee of the House upon the defeat of General St. Clair, whom they attempted to shield from blame, while they inculcated more or less the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Treasury. The Secretaries, believing themselves to be greatly wronged, naturally desired to vindicate themselves. On the 13th of November, 1792, a resolution was offered by one of their friends notifying the Secretaries that the subject would be taken up on a day named to inquire into the causes of the failure, "to the end that they may attend the House and furnish such information as may be conclusive to the due investigation of the matter stated in said report."

Even this was refused by the House, which first voted to strike out all the latter part of the resolution, and then rejected it as thus amended.

But the earnest discussion which occurred is important, as it records the opinion of Madison upon the main question now before us, and this will be as authoritative as the opinions of any modern statesman, or even as that of learned scholiasts. In the Annals of Congress for 1792, page 680, it is reported as follows:

"MR. MADISON objected to the motion on constitutional grounds, and as being contrary to the practice of the House. He had not, he said, thoroughly revolved the matter in his own mind, and therefore was not prepared to state fully the effects which would result from the adoption of the resolution; but he would hazard thus much, that it would form an innovation in the mode of conducting the business of this House, and introduce a precedent which would lead to perplexing and embarrassing consequences; as it involved a conclusion, in respect to the principles of the Government, which at an earlier day would have been revolved from. He was decidedly in favor of written information."

I ask gentlemen to mark the emphasis of his conclusion. "It involved" said he, "a conclusion, in respect to the principles of the Government, which at an earlier day," only five years after the date of the Constitution, "would have been revolved from. He was decidedly in favor of written information."

The two cases cited are believed to be the only ones where Congress has acted on the question of giving the Cabinet any share of the privileges of members of the House. For more than seventy years there has been no attempt to bring about any change of this character. The House has neither sought to nominate or control the Cabinet of the President, nor has it exhibited any disposition to diminish its own importance by sharing its privileges with the President's nominees and be by them controlled. No ambitious minister has suggested the idea, and where Hamilton twice knocked at the door and was twice refused no others need apply.

Some commentators upon the Constitution have so high regard for the opinion of Hamilton that they even love his faults and stand always with their armor riveted on ready to do battle in behalf of even his most doubtful opinions. But because he desired a little more power when he was Secretary of the Treasury, and perhaps deservedly wielded a greater influence than any other man at the seat of Government, it will not be pretended that an opinion born at such a time is entitled to more weight than that of the framers of the Constitution, including Madison, its acknowledged father; nor will it be pretended that it should have the effect of changing the settled and uniform practice of the House.

It is true that some examples can be cited in the earlier days of the first term of Washington when he went to the Senate in person to make oral communications and was accompanied by his Secretaries, or one of them went in lieu of the President. This practice commends itself when we understand that he and they went on executive business solely, and it is wholly irrelevant to cite such examples as precedents for the scheme now presented. The advice and consent of the Senate under the Constitution must be obtained for appointments to office and for the ratification of treaties. The Senate is an executive body, as well as a legislative, and in its capacity as such Washington, with rare modesty not only sought its consent, (all that is ever now done,) but in person often sought its advice in advance of his own action. Generally, whenever he desired immediate action, he went in person to the Senate, and when otherwise, he made his communications in writing. If he took his Secretary of War or Secretary of State with him, it was, let it be remembered, beyond being most respectful and useful, long prior to the introduction of private secretaries. The Senate had been expected by many to be a permanent body, ready at all times to give its advice. Having almost lost its advisory character, it has industriously increased its importance as a debating and legislative branch of the Government. I know of no examples where the President or the head of any executive Department ever participated in person in the proceedings of the House or in the Senate except upon purely executive business, but when it was partially attempted it was opposed, by such men as Madison, on constitutional grounds, and defeated.

Our fathers looked with jealousy upon the interference of executive officers with the legislative deliberations of Congress in either House. Their presence here, merely as visitors, pending any measure in which they or their Departments are concerned, even in more recent days, as far as my observation reaches, has always been looked upon with so much healthy aversion that it has more often injured than aided the progress of the measure.

The Executive Mansion, and other executive buildings, as is well known, were placed at one end of the city, while the Capitol was placed at the other, avowedly to avoid executive influence and to escape any encroachment upon legislative deliberations. Under the Manual it would be a breach of our privileges to state the views of the Executive upon any pending measure, save where it has been officially and openly communicated in writing; and now it is proposed to reverse all this, and have all the members of the Cabinet here all the time, if they choose, and semi-weekly, at any rate, to whisper in our ears some indication of the will of the Executive. We are to have this influence forever on the alert, not through one, but seven of the representatives of the Executive in this House—influential by position, character, patronage, and power—and these possibly hereafter to be increased, according to British precedent, so as to include the under or Assistant Secretaries! It should be remembered that British ministers hold their places in the House of Commons by virtue of an election, and not by appointment. They must have a constituency, and be elected to the House of Commons, and that after their acceptance of office, or they cannot occupy their seats. So jealous are they, even there, that members who receive appointments thereby vacate their seats, and must allow their constituents to pass upon the question whether they are willing the member should take an appointment from the Crown and still be their representative. But here the bald proposition is made to give certain official gentlemen seats in this House with no constituency whatever! A despotism or an absolute monarchy might look upon it with favor; but can a republic? As a measure involving grave principles—the preservation of the fundamental privileges and independence of a republican Legislature—I am persuaded we ought to give it no countenance or support.

It may be said that the object is to ask questions for the purpose of obtaining information without the formal mode now pursued of seeking it by a resolution of inquiry, and that it would release many clerks now kept, at large expense, and employed to answer these calls. But these ideas, if entertained, are without any foundation. That the information could not be obtained with any more facility is clear. No Secretary can give verbatim from memory the contents of documents on file in his Department, or of accounts and tabular statements in figures. The scheme would not facilitate the business of the House, or relieve any Department from its present labors.

If we required the attendance, or admitted the presence, for instance, of the Secretary of the Treasury, he could not be expected to discharge the daily routine of his office, and we should have reason to copy British precedents still further by having an additional Secretary of the Treasury. There could be no diminution of clerks, for an equal force would be requisite to supply the facts and figures in detail for the use of the talking Secretary as are now needed to furnish the present officer before he can communicate to Congress answers to resolutions.

The more heads or chiefs that may be created for any service the more numerous will be the subordinates. Civilians, as well as military men, magnify their offices and feel honored by the extent of their commands. It can hardly be doubted that, instead of lessening the number of employes, it would increase them. As a matter of economy, then, the scheme should be rejected.

It may be suggested that by the change proposed we should have an open, face to face, communication with the heads of the Executive Departments, instead of a clandestine, secret, and suspicious one. I must deny the covert allegation. By the Constitution it is provided the President, not the Cabinet, "shall from time to time give to Congress information of the state of the Union, and recommend to their consideration such measures as he shall judge necessary and expedient," and this he does through the Secretaries annually, and oftener, when necessary, through their reports made to him and communicated by him to us. The Secretary of the Treasury reports to us because of law to that effect and because we hold the purse-strings of the nation. The option in the law allowed us to require it to be done in person, but this the House has never required and never permitted. All these reports are at once printed and promulgated to us and to the world. They are open to our scrutiny and the criticism of ages. The President speaks by his own authorized Secretaries. The responsibility cannot be shirked. The new scheme, however, would tend in the direction of making these officers responsible to the House, and to that extent relieving the President. If the Secretaries were of great force of character they would make the House bend to their will. If they were weak they would become the tools of a faction, or of some artful demagogue. But the idea that any less of secret and suspicious influence would be exerted when ampler opportunities of constant intercourse should be offered, hardly requires serious refutation.

Mr. Speaker, I have thus presented some of the objections to the admission of the President's Cabinet to seats in this House and to me they appear insuperable. However lamely presented, I feel confident the House is in no great danger of reaching a wrong conclusion, as all parties have an equal interest in the maintenance of its character and privileges. It will retain with most respectful attachment its ancient usages and bar out all attempts to undermine its constitutional independence. It will not seek obedience where it has no power to enforce its commands. It will never consent to dim either in form or substance the luster of its republicanism; and, conscious of having been created and elected to represent the people only, separated by fundamental law as well as by all our most revered traditions from executive alloy, it will not debase its original standard, no matter whether the solicitation comes from within or without.

Mr. COX obtained the floor, but yielded to

Mr. BLAINE, who said: I desire to ask the gentleman from Vermont a question, which I did not like to address to him during the progress of his speech, for I always dislike to interrupt a gentleman in the course of his remarks. I understood him to maintain, as one essential part of his objection to this measure, that we had no power whatever to enforce the attendance of members of the Cabinet upon the sittings of the House, and that the power of expulsion does not extend to those officers; and that if it did exist against the heads of Departments it would have no further effect than a paper pronouncement. Now, I would like to ask the gentleman from Vermont whether the power of impeachment would not extend to them?

Mr. MORRILL. Undoubtedly, if they were guilty of any misdemeanor.

Mr. BLAINE. In case of an absolute and contemptuous disobedience of law, how would it be?

Mr. MORRILL. If this House or any officer of the Government imposes an unconstitutional obligation or order on any person or officer, he would not be bound to obey it.

Mr. BLAINE. But the law, if passed by a concurrence of the House and Senate, and the approval of the President, would be obligatory upon the members of the Cabinet. Now, does the gentleman from Vermont assume the ground that a member of the Cabinet might refuse to obey the law until a judicial test was had as to its constitutionality?

Mr. MORRILL. I take the ground that neither this House, nor Congress itself, has power, by the Constitution, to compel the attendance of members of the Cabinet on this floor.

Mr. BLAINE. That is begging the question entirely.

Mr. MORRILL. And I submit that there is no power under the rules of this House, as now adopted, by which we could compel the attendance here of those parties.

Mr. BLAINE. I undertake to say that if this measure should receive the vote of the Senate and House of Representatives, and the approval of the Executive, it would be a law, and that, until authoritatively decided, would be binding; the members of the Cabinet would be bound by it as much as you or I, or any other citizen, would be bound by any other law upon the statute-book.

Mr. MORRILL. I do not think the question which the gentleman from Maine proposes has very much relevancy to the matter. So far as I can learn what his views are, I agree with him that the Supreme Court of the United States is the ultimate expounder of all our laws. I think it rests with the gentleman from Maine and those who advocate his side of the question to show that there is any authority in the Constitution to pass such a law; and if he cannot show that, I think he had much better vote against this measure than to undertake to show here how an unconstitutional law can be enforced.

Mr. BLAINE. I did not rise to discuss the general merits of the question at this time; but I understood the gentleman to make the specific point that if Congress passed this measure, the members of the Cabinet could snap their fingers in the face of this House, and there is no power here to vindicate the authority of Congress.

Mr. MORRILL. I still maintain that there is no power in the Constitution, and no law which now exists, by which you could compel them to be present; and that if you pass this law the Executive may execute it or not, of course at their own peril.

Mr. THAYER. I would ask the gentleman from Maine how the constitutionality of the law is to be tried if it is violated?

Mr. BLAINE. And I would ask if the constitutional test could not be applied to this law as it is to any other law? We have documents brought in here upon almost every question to prove that a pending measure is unconstitutional, and it is proved over and over again, and yet in defiance of that we go forward and pass the measure into a law, and until it is passed upon by a judicial tribunal it is binding; and the argument of the gentleman from Vermont is that this is an exception to all law.

Mr. THAYER. I do not think the gentleman understood the force of my interrogatory. I understood the gentleman to reply to the suggestion of the gentleman from Vermont in regard to the obedience which is to be given by the members of the Cabinet to an unconstitutional law, if this law is passed, by saying that they would be bound to obey it until it was pronounced unconstitutional. I ask the gentleman from Maine how the opportunity to pronounce it unconstitutional is to arise, unless the Cabinet ministers should refuse to obey the law.

Mr. BLAINE. I turn the question upon the gentleman himself; suppose they refuse to obey, how are you going to make a case on either side?

Mr. THAYER. If the power of impeachment existed, I suppose you would proceed under that; and in the course of the proceeding the question would arise and be decided.

Mr. BLAINE. Do I understand the gentleman to maintain that the power of impeachment does not exist?

Mr. THAYER. I do not say it does not.

Mr. BLAINE. I say it does. The Constitution says:

"The President, Vice President, and all civil officers of the United States, shall be removed from office on impeachment for, and conviction of, treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors."

Now, if an absolute and contemptuous disregard and defiance of law does not constitute a misdemeanor, what does?

Mr. THAYER. That depends entirely upon the constitutionality of the law.

Mr. BLAINE. Precisely.

Mr. THAYER. That is the very question in controversy.

Mr. BLAINE. Now, let us see whether this process of impeachment extends to these Cabinet officers. The Constitution says all "civil officers" may be impeached, and members of the Cabinet are distinctly recognized as "civil officers" in another provision of the Constitution. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] wants to know whether I consider the Secretary of War a "civil officer." [Laughter.] I do not consider that a very civil question. [Laughter.]

Mr. WILSON. I would ask the gentleman from Maine how the question is to be settled by the judicial department of the Government.

Mr. BLAINE. It is to be determined by the power of impeachment. The Constitution provides that civil officers of the Government may be impeached, and each head of an Executive Department of the Government is subject to impeachment.

Mr. WILSON. I understand that; but how in relation to the constitutionality or unconstitutionality of the law? Suppose the head of a Department should decline to appear in this House, and proceedings intended to result in an impeachment of him should take place, how would the constitutionality or unconstitutionality of this act of Congress be determined?

Mr. BLAINE. I will answer that question by putting another.

Mr. WILSON. Oh, no; answer my question.

Mr. BLAINE. Suppose you impeach any other civil officer anywhere for disobedience of law, how will you determine the constitutionality of the law that is disobeyed?

Mr. WILSON. Well, take any other civil officer. I come back to the same question.

Mr. BLAINE. I put the same question to the gentleman.

Mr. WILSON. Answer my question.

Mr. BLAINE. It would be done in this case through the same medium, the same instrumentality that is applicable to any other civil officer.

Mr. WILSON. What is that?

Mr. BLAINE. I would be very glad to hear it from the chairman of the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. WILSON. If the gentleman will pardon me, did I not understand him to say that this question must be decided by the courts of the country?

Mr. BLAINE. By no means. I maintain that a member of the Cabinet who is made amenable to a law has no more right to decide that that law is not constitutional than you or I have.

Mr. WILSON. Then I make this suggestion: suppose a Cabinet minister under the provisions of this law should withhold his attendance here, and proceedings should then be commenced looking to impeachment, and that he should insist that the law is unconstitutional; what tribunal is to determine that question?

Mr. BLAINE. I ask the gentleman the same question. I say that the process of impeachment is as applicable to Cabinet ministers as to all other officers. The House presents the articles of impeachment, and the Senate tries them. That is the whole of it.

I only rose to reply to that single remark of the gentleman from Vermont, and I will say in closing, as I said at the commencement, that the power to enforce this law when once enacted is just as ample as the power to enforce any other law.

Mr. COX resumed the floor.

Mr. GRINNELL. Will the gentleman give way for a motion to adjourn?

Mr. COX. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. GRINNELL. Inasmuch as the Cabinet are not expected here this evening, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and thereupon (at four minutes to four o'clock, p. m.) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, January 26, 1865.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Dr. BOWMAN.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter of the Secretary of the Interior transmitting a copy of the supplemental report of the chief engineer of the Washington aqueduct, showing the condition of the work and the present state of the appropriations authorized and provided for by the act of July 4, 1864; which was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

He also laid before the Senate a report of the Secretary of War in answer to a resolution of the Senate of the 17th instant calling for muster rolls of such of the regiments as have been raised in the State of Maryland in the present war which were composed in whole or in part of those who were at the time of their enlistment or draft slaves; which was ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a report of the Secretary of War communicating, in answer to a resolution of the Senate of the 25th instant, information in relation to the appointment of a commission in each of the slave States represented in Congress "charged to award to each loyal person to whom a colored volunteer may owe service a just compensation;" which was ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a report of the Secretary of War communicating, in answer to the resolution of the Senate of the 22d of December, 1864, a report of the Adjutant General in relation to volunteers called out in the State of Delaware for thirty and for one hundred days; which was ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

CREDENTIALS PRESENTED.

Mr. RIDDLE presented the credentials of Hon. WILLARD SAULSBURY, chosen by the Legislature of the State of Delaware a Senator from that State for the term of six years, commencing March 4, 1865; which were read, and ordered to be filed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed without amendment the bill (S. No. 384) to amend an act entitled "An act to amend and extend the charter of the Franklin Insurance Company," approved the 2d of March 1838; and also that the House had passed a joint resolution (H. R. No. 142) tendering the thanks of Congress to Major General Philip H. Sheridan and the officers and men under his command; and a bill (H. R. No. 705) for the relief of collectors and surveyors of the customs in certain cases; in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. SPRAGUE presented resolutions of the Legislature of the State of Rhode Island in favor of the passage of the joint resolution submitting to the Legislatures of the several States an amendment to the Constitution of the United States abolishing slavery; which were ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

Mr. GRIMES presented a petition of chaplains in the Navy of the United States, praying that the law regulating their pay may be so amended as to give them the pay of the line officers with whom they rank; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. CLARK presented a memorial of Sweeney, Rittenhouse, Fant & Co., praying that their claim reported upon adversely by the Court of Claims January 23, 1862, may be referred back to that court for a rehearing; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. WILSON presented the petition of Josiah Copeland, praying an extension of his patent for an improvement in boot crimps; which was referred to the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office.

He also presented the petition of Josiah M. Read, praying for an extension of the patent for an improvement in boot crimps to Josiah Copeland; which was referred to the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office.

He also presented the petition of boot manufacturers and crimpers of Boston, praying for an extension to Josiah Copeland of the patent known as Read's improvement in boot crimps, patented January 20, 1844; which was referred to the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office.

Mr. MORGAN presented the petition of citizens of Orange county, New York, praying for the passage of a law authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to issue duplicates of United States bonds, certificates, and scrip which have been or may hereafter be lost or destroyed; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented the memorial of William H. Webb, shipbuilder of New York, contractor with the Navy Department of the United States under date of July 3, 1862, for the construction and equipment of the iron-clad screw ram called the Dunderberg, praying for an additional allowance on his contract; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. HARRIS presented the petition of Jane W. Nethaway praying for an allowance of back pay and bounty due her husband, and the passage of an act allowing her a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. FARWELL. I present resolutions of the Legislature of Maine in favor of the abrogation of the reciprocity treaty with the British provinces. As that subject has been disposed of by the necessary legislation, I move that the resolutions lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. TEN EYCK. I present the memorial of owners and masters of vessels owned in whole or in part by residents of the counties of Hudson and Bergen, in the State of New Jersey, praying that the act of Congress of February 21, 1863, by which those counties of New Jersey were made a part of the collection district of the port of New York, may be so amended that the assistant collector shall have charge of loading and unloading vessels to and from foreign ports and the warehousing of merchandise, and that he be also empowered to enroll and license vessels in the coasting trade owned in whole or in part in those counties, and to do such other acts and things as will promote the interests of New Jersey and of the United States. I present also a similar memorial from the city of Hoboken. I move that these memorials be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. MORRILL asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 411) to amend an act entitled "An act to incorporate the Metropolitan Railroad Company in the District of Columbia;" which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

Mr. CHANDLER, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the petition of light-house keepers in Narragansett bay, praying for an increase of salary, reported adversely thereon, the committee deeming it inexpedient at this time to increase official salaries.

Mr. COLLAMER. The Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, to whom was referred a bill (S. No. 392) supplementary to an act approved July 14, 1862, entitled "An act to establish certain post roads," have directed me to report it back with amendments. The amendments are merely verbal, and need not be printed.

Mr. POWELL. I move to take up the bill just reported by the Senator from Vermont. It is a matter of very deep interest to the community generally to have the railway completed to which the bill refers.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Kentucky asks the unanimous consent of the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the bill just reported by the Senator from Vermont. Is there any objection?

Mr. COWAN. I object. I want to read the bill first, and see what it is.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection being made, the bill must go over under the rules.

BENJAMIN VREELAND.

Mr. ANTHONY. I am instructed by the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the petition of Benjamin Vreeland, praying to be allowed the difference of compensation between the pay of an assistant surgeon and that of passed assistant surgeon from the date when he was entitled to his examination by law to the date of his passing his examination, to report a bill for his relief. It is a very small matter, and I ask for the present consideration of the bill.

By unanimous consent, the bill (S. No. 412) for the relief of Benjamin Vreeland, surgeon in the Navy of the United States, was read twice and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides for the payment of $449 07, being the difference between the compensation of an assistant surgeon and a passed assistant surgeon from May 9, 1855, to March 30, 1857.

Mr. HALE. Is there a report in that case?

Mr. MORRILL. I believe the bill touches the general question of increasing salaries, against which the Senate has expressed itself so strongly.

Mr. ANTHONY. No, sir. I will explain the case. There is no written report. Assistant Surgeon Vreeland was ordered to sea about the time when he was entitled to an examination for promotion. At the time when all the other assistant surgeons of the same date were examined, he was at sea and could not be examined. As soon as he returned he was examined, and the board of examiners testified that he would have passed the examination at the time when he was entitled by law to receive it, but being absent at sea he could not appear before the board. This bill is to allow him the pay for the advanced grade between the time when he ought to have been examined and the time when he was examined. It is in strict accordance with precedent. As these cases have arisen occasionally, a general law has been passed covering them, but the law was not retroactive and did not reach his case.

Mr. MORRILL. It is a gratuity.

Mr. HALE. I do not know anything about the law referred to by the Senator from Rhode Island, but I know that I have had such cases as this and the Senate has refused to pay them. The case of young Dr. Suddards, of Philadelphia, I recollect, precisely similar to this, and the Senate refused to make the allowance. I wish that the bill may lie over until to-morrow, so that I may look into that law.

Mr. ANTHONY. I have no objection to that. I am sure that if the Senator examines the case he will find that the bill is according to precedent, and that there is a general law now covering such cases.

The bill was postponed until to-morrow.

COMMITTEE ON BANKS.

Mr. GRIMES submitted the following resolution; which lies over under the rule:

Resolved, That there be added to the standing committees of the Senate a Committee on Banks and Banking Institutions, to consist of seven members.

WAYS AND MEANS.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am directed by the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 677) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide ways and means for the support of the Government, and for other purposes," approved June 30, 1864, to report it back without amendment, and I ask for its present consideration.

By unanimous consent, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides that in lieu of any bonds authorized to be issued by the first section of the act of June 30, 1864, that may remain unsold at the date of this act, the Secretary of the Treasury may issue, under the authority of that act, Treasury notes of the description and character authorized by its second section; but the whole amount of bonds authorized by it and Treasury notes issued and to be issued in lieu thereof is not to exceed the sum of $400,000,000; and such Treasury notes may be disposed of for lawful money, or for any other Treasury notes or certificates of indebtedness or certificates of deposit issued under any previous act of Congress; and such notes are to be exempt from taxation by or under State or municipal authority. The second section of the bill provides that any bonds known as five-twenties, issued under the act of February 25, 1862, remaining unsold to an amount not exceeding $4,000,000 may be disposed of by the Secretary of the Treasury in the United States, or, if he shall find it expedient, in Europe, at any time, on such terms as he may deem most advisable. There is a proviso that this bill is not to be so construed as to give any authority for the issue of any legal-tender notes, in any form, beyond the balance unissued of the amount authorized by the second section of the act of June 30, 1864.

Mr. SHERMAN. It is proper, as this is a bill of general importance, that I should state the purpose of it. By the act of the last session, approved June 30, 1864, the Secretary of the Treasury was authorized to borrow $400,000,000 on the credit of bonds to be issued by the United States on the terms prescribed by the first section of that act, and he was authorized by the second section to issue, in lieu of $200,000,000 of the bonds authorized by that first section, Treasury notes to an amount not exceeding $200,000,000. Under this law, perhaps about seventy million dollars have been issued under the first section and about one hundred and twenty-five million dollars under the second section. The Secretary of the Treasury desires to avoid the issuing of bonds under the first section, to avoid the payment of interest in gold. He does not desire to increase that class of securities at present unless he is compelled to do so. The only effect of the first section of this bill is to authorize the issue of the same amount under the second section of that law, instead of under the first section.

The second section of the bill relates to $4,000,000 of the five-twenty loan which was hypothesized for certain purposes in London, and is now there. It authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to sell those bonds already issued in the market, rather than to issue new bonds, or to export gold to redeem them.

I believe this is the only explanation of the bill that is necessary. It is only a change of the form of security, and does not increase the amount now authorized by law.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MILITARY ACADEMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move that all prior orders be postponed, with a view to take up the Military Academy bill. I will state that I should like very much to pass to-day the Military Academy bill, and also the Post Office appropriation bill, which have been lying on our table for three or four days.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 621) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the year ending the 30th of June, 1866.

The Committee on Finance reported the bill with two amendments. The first amendment was to strike out lines thirty-nine and forty of the first section of the bill, in the following words:

For store-rooms for artillery and small-arms, $25,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the committee was to strike out the second section of the bill, in the following words:

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That section four of chapter forty-five of the public acts of the first session of the Thirty-Eighth Congress, relating to cadets "found deficient," is hereby repealed.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in and ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time. It was read the third time, and passed.

POST OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the Post Office appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 659) making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department during the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1866.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bill and joint resolution from the House of Representatives were severally read twice by their titles, and referred as indicated below:

A bill (H. R. No. 705) for the relief of collectors and surveyors of the customs in certain cases—to the Committee on Finance.

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 142) tendering the thanks of Congress to Major General Philip H. Sheridan and the officers and men under his command—to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

BILLS RECOMMENDED.

On motion of Mr. MORRILL, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 376) to amend an act entitled "An act to amend an act to incorporate the inhabitants of the city of Washington, passed May 15, 1820," approved May 5, 1864.

Mr. MORRILL. I move that it be recommended to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The motion was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. ANTHONY, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 387) for the relief of Solomon Parsons, which had been reported adversely by the Committee on Claims.

Mr. ANTHONY. I move that the bill be recommended to the Committee on Claims.

The motion was agreed to.

HENRY A. BRIGHAM.

Mr. HARRIS. A bill for the relief of Henry A. Brigham was passed by the Senate about a week ago after a very exhaustive discussion. Subsequently a motion was made by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. DAVIS] to reconsider the bill. It was sent back from the House of Representatives for that purpose; and if the Senator from Kentucky has no objection, I should like to call that up now.

Mr. DAVIS assented.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from New York moves to postpone all prior orders for the purpose of proceeding to the consideration of the subject indicated in his motion.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the motion of Mr. DAVIS to reconsider the vote by which the bill (S. No. 212) for the relief of Henry A. Brigham was passed.

Mr. DAVIS. I will merely state the ground upon which I made the motion for a reconsideration of the passage of the bill. I feel no particular interest in it. There was in the testimony in the case the evidence of a bank officer. That evidence proved the fact that while the dispute about the counting of the money was progressing, a third person came in and examined the package from which the money was lost; but it did not state whether this examination by the stranger, the third person, was before the money had been counted by the paymaster, or afterward. The testimony of the bank officer was indefinite on that point. I desired that the testimony should be retaken, and that that officer should make a definite statement on that point. If the examination by the stranger was before the deficit was ascertained and announced by the paymaster, I would not vote for the passage of the bill to give the paymaster relief, because I think that would be such an act of carelessness on his part, in admitting the money to be counted by a stranger and a third person, as to preclude him from asking any relief from the Congress of the United States. On the contrary, if that examination by the stranger took place after the deficit had been discovered and announced by the paymaster, I would vote most readily for the passage of the bill.

I feel entirely indifferent what disposition the Senate make of the motion to reconsider. That is all I have to say about it.

Mr. CLARK. I do not know that I understand distinctly to what examination the Senator from Kentucky refers.

Mr. DAVIS. The written evidence of the bank officer in the case.

Mr. CLARK. I understand that there was the written evidence of the bank officer; but did I understand the Senator to refer to the examination of the money by a stranger?

Mr. DAVIS. Yes, sir. That bank officer remarks in the course of his testimony that he saw the money that was then paid by the bank officer to the paymaster being examined by a stranger.

Mr. CLARK. The Senator misunderstood the testimony entirely, I think.

Mr. DAVIS. I think not. At any rate, he said that a stranger had his hand on it.

Mr. CLARK. That was while the officer of the Department was counting it out.

Mr. DAVIS. My recollection of the evidence is this: that the evidence of the bank officer, in regard to the money being handled by the stranger, is not clear upon the point whether it was before or after the deficit was ascertained and announced.

Mr. CLARK. It was before.

Mr. DAVIS. Before?

Mr. CLARK. I think so.

Mr. DAVIS. If the proof is that it was before, I think it is just such a case in which the paymaster ought not to have relief at all.

Mr. CLARK. After that, the paymaster took it and counted it himself, to ascertain if it was correct, and then they discovered the loss of the money.

Mr. DAVIS. The evidence itself is better to establish its contents than any understanding or debate between the honorable Senator from New Hampshire and myself in relation to what that evidence is.

Mr. CLARK. The evidence has gone to the House of Representatives. There is no evidence here. I tried to find it.

Mr. GRIMES. It is printed in the Globe.

Mr. DAVIS. I do not care what disposition is made of the motion.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on reconsidering the vote by which the bill was passed.

The motion was not agreed to.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bill and joint resolution; and they thereupon received the signature of the Vice President:

A bill (H. R. No. 677) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide ways and means for the support of the Government, and for other purposes," approved June 30, 1864; and

A bill (S. No. 384) to amend an act entitled "An act to amend and extend the charter of the Franklin Insurance Company," approved the 2d of March, 1838.

RETALIATION ON REBEL PRISONERS.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It being near the expiration of the morning hour, and there being no other matter before the body, the Chair will call up the unfinished business of yesterday, the joint resolution (S. R. No. 97) advising retaliation for the cruel treatment of prisoners by the insurgents, the pending question being on the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio; [Mr. WADE,] and upon that question the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. DAVIS] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. DAVIS. I shall not occupy much of the time of the Senate in continuation of the remarks I was making yesterday. I had stated the proposition that the law of retaliation existed as an undoubted principle of international law, and that the law of retaliation had its limits was just as certain and as indisputable as the existence of the principle of that law itself. I read from two American authorities in limitation of the law of retaliation, and both of those authorities established this general principle, that retaliation by death in any form could only be visited upon those who were personally guilty of the offense against national law for which retaliation was resorted to. I do not contend myself for the latter or the qualified principle of retaliation to the extent that Chancellor Kent and Professor Woolsey do. I admit that there may be cases in which retaliation by death in some form may be visited upon persons who are not individually and personally guilty of the offense for which retaliation is resorted to as a preventive.

By way of example, there is bushwhacking now all over the States that border upon the confederacy. I concede that the bushwhackers may be shot down, and that they ought to be shot down without being captured; that prisoners should not be taken from bushwhackers at all, because they are a lawless set of robbers, assassins, and murderers who ought to be hunted down in that summary form. I concede, further, that if a man is a bushwhacker and our authorities desire to make an example by way of retaliation, a bushwhacker may be taken as the subject of that retaliation. But I would qualify that concession in this wise: I would not allow any commanding general by his own order to determine who was and who was not a bushwhacker, and order that man against whom there was an imputation of being a bushwhacker thus to be summarily executed. I would require the bushwhacker to be tried by a military court, and give him an opportunity of disproving the charge if he could do it, in order to exempt himself from that summary mode of execution. My friend from Maine [Mr. FARWELL] suggests that the Government ought to be required to prove the fact that he was a bushwhacker against him. I concede the justice of that position; but that is not the principle upon which the law of retaliation is practiced in relation to bushwhackers. The military commandant of the particular section of the country—at least it is so in Kentucky—decides for himself and by himself who is and who is not a bushwhacker; and any man that he determines to be a bushwhacker he orders to summary execution by being shot.

My own opinion, Mr. President, is that such mode of punishment might frequently result in the murder of an innocent man. It denies to a man the right of trial. It withholds from him the invaluable privilege of proving himself innocent of the charge that is made against him, and without any examination, mutual or ex parte, of the facts of the case, it dooms him to a sudden and to a horrible death. In that form I would not, if I could control the matter, permit any man to be punished. I would not consent that any man should be deprived of his life upon the imputation of crime without knowing what the charge against him was, and without having a fair and a full opportunity of bringing evidence of his exculpation from that crime. Retaliation exists only for one purpose and upon one reason, and that reason is not vengeance, not justice, but simply by the force of the example of retaliation to arouse another belligerent, who is in the inhuman violation of the laws of war, to a proper observance of those laws of war in waging hostilities; and that is the only legitimate consideration, in my judgment, upon which the principle can be executed. It is the reason upon which it is founded in the laws of nations.

Mr. President, this law of retaliation is not our law. It is not the law of the Congress of the United States. It is not the law of the President of the United States. It is the law of nations, that is established by their consent, their practice, and their usage. We have to receive the law as the nations of the earth have made it; we cannot modify it; we cannot add to it; we cannot restrict or repeal any of its principles or provisions; it exists as a code independent of all local legislation by any Government upon earth; it exists as the common, general law of the civilized world, that has received the sanction of the nations of the civilized world.

This law may be taken up by the President of the United States without any additional legislation upon the part of Congress just as it exists, and it may be executed by him; and as some of the members of the Senate have maintained, and I assent to the position, there is no reason whatever for the interposition of Congress in this matter at this time. So far as the law of retaliation exists, so far as it may be legitimately executed, it is to be decided by the law of nations, and the President of the United States, without any ancillary legislation on the part of Congress, may execute that law just as he could and to the same extent and rigor with which he might execute it backed by any legislation which Congress would adopt.

I had furthermore said that the fate and the question of our prisoners depended somewhat upon two powers. The first is the rebel government and authorities that hold them in captivity. The second power is that of our own Government, and especially our military authorities, who have the function to exchange for them, and to relieve them from that captivity by the ordinary mode to which the civilized earth has resorted and resorts for the deliverance of prisoners, and that is, by exchange. I stated that I had asked the attention of the Senate to the latter point more than twelve months ago, and I had failed to attract any decided attention to the subject on the part of the Senate.

How did this difficulty in relation to the exchange of prisoners arise? I concede that there have been the most revolting and inexcusable cruelties practiced on the part of the rebel authorities toward our prisoners. The picture read by the honorable Senator from Michigan [Mr. HOWARD] in a report of a committee that examined the subject a few days since, was one of the most revolting that has ever been presented to my mind. I have no doubt that thousands and tens of thousands of our prisoners have perished in captivity substantially in the mode set forth in the vivid picture that is presented in that report. Who doomed those unfortunate and brave men to such a fate? It was the rebel authorities; but if there was a power, and that power was in their own Government, to redeem and to deliver these unfortunate men from that dreadful fate, and our Government and our authorities refused to make the deliverance, I ask if the condemnation against our own Government ought not to be as severe as that against the rebel government for bringing them into such a condition?

The honorable Senator from Maryland [Mr. JOHNSON] adverted to this subject about the time that I brought it before the Senate. A cartel for the exchange of prisoners was established between the two Governments at an early day. That cartel was read yesterday by the honorable Senator from Missouri, [Mr. HENDERSON.] It established the general principle that prisoners should be exchanged by the belligerent parties according to the terms recognized and practiced by the present civilized world. It furthermore stipulated that if either party had an excess of prisoners over the other, that excess of prisoners should be liberated upon their parole. The rebel authorities have contended all the time with distinct emphasis, that the cartel in relation to the release of prisoners upon parole was violated by the American authorities. If it was violated by the American authorities I suppose they had some very good reason for it. But be that as it may, the difficulty which arrested the exchange of white prisoners was that the rebel authorities refused to give negro prisoners in exchange for white prisoners. The Senator from Maryland adverted to the number of negro prisoners that were then in rebel prisons.

Mr. HOWE. If my friend will allow me, I should like to know what is the authority for the statement he has just made, that the difficulty in the way of exchanging white prisoners was because the rebel authorities refused to exchange colored troops.

Mr. DAVIS. I will read to the honorable Senator in a few minutes some authority on that subject. In the mean time I state that position, and I will sustain it by proof in a few minutes.

I understood, furthermore, that the rebel authorities were willing to exchange negro prisoners who had been freed before they entered the United States Army; they were willing to exchange negro prisoners whose ownership could not be ascertained; they only refused to exchange negro prisoners to the extent that those prisoners belonged to their own people; and they insisted and practiced upon the principle of returning those negroes to their owners in the confederate States, and therefore refused to exchange them as prisoners of war.

I recollect that the honorable Senator from Maryland stated near a year ago, when the subject was up before the Senate, in debate, that there were only between one and two hundred negro prisoners then held in captivity by the rebel military authorities, and that all the obstacle to the exchange and to the deliverance from horrible captivity of ten, twenty, or thirty thousand white Union prisoners, was that there were between one and two hundred negro prisoners held by the rebel authorities which they refused to give in exchange.

Now, sir, I will read an extract from a letter of General Butler, dated in August last, to the rebel commissioner for prisoners, Mr. Ould:

"I unite with you most cordially, sir, in desiring a speedy settlement of all these questions, in view of the great sufferings endured by our prisoners in the hands of your authorities, of which you so feelingly speak. Let me ask, in view of that suffering, why you have delayed eight months to answer a proposition which by now accepting you admit to be right, just, and humane, allowing that suffering to continue so long? One cannot help thinking, even at the risk of being deemed uncharitable, that the benevolent sympathies of the confederate authorities have been lately stirred by the depleted condition of their armies, and a desire to get into the field, to offset the present campaign, the hale, hearty, and well-fed prisoners held by the United States in exchange for the half-starved, sick, emaciated, and unserviceable soldiers of the United States now languishing in your prisons. The events of this war, if we did not know it before, have taught us that it is not the northern portion of the American people alone who know how to drive sharp bargains.

"The wrongs, indignities, and privations suffered by our soldiers would move me to consent to anything to procure their exchange, except to barter away the honor and faith of the Government of the United States, which has been so solemnly pledged to the colored soldiers in its ranks.

"Consistently with national faith and justice we cannot relinquish this position. With our authorities it is a question of property merely. It seems to address itself to you in this form. Will you suffer your soldier, captured in fighting your battles, to be in confinement for months rather than release him by giving for him that which you call a piece of property, and which we are willing to accept as a man?

"You certainly appear to place less value upon your soldier than you do upon your negro. I assure you, much as we of the North are accused of loving property, our citizens would have no difficulty in yielding up any piece of property they have in exchange for one of their brothers or sons languishing in your prisons. Certainly there could be no doubt that they would do so were that piece of property less in value than $5,000 in confederate money, which is believed to be the price of an able-bodied negro in the insurrectionary States.

"Trusting that I may receive such a reply to the questions propounded in this note as will lead to a speedy resumption of the negotiations for a full exchange of all prisoners, and a delivery of them to their respected authorities, I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
BENJAMIN F. BUTLER,

"Major General and Commissioner of Exchange."

The correspondence between the two commissioners of exchange was reported upon the call of the Senate; and, if I recollect that correspondence, it states distinctly that the difficulty, and the only difficulty, in the way of the exchange of white prisoners was, that the rebel authorities refused to exchange for negro prisoners. In the remarks that I made to the Senate on that subject at the time, I assumed the position that the Government and the military authorities of the United States ought to exchange for our white prisoners, even if the rebel authorities refused to make a solitary exchange for a negro prisoner. I assumed then that the holding of white Union prisoners in rebel prisons to languish, to be tortured by starvation, and to die, did not in any degree alleviate or make more comfortable the condition of negro prisoners. I assumed, furthermore, that if the rebel authorities were willing to exchange for any class of Union soldiers in captivity, white or black, that exchange ought to be made to the extent that was practicable, in order to deliver those who might be delivered from the horrors of such a captivity. I remarked then, as I now remark, that if from any whim, or principle, or policy, the rebel authorities refused to exchange white prisoners and were willing to exchange negro prisoners, the fact of their refusal to exchange white prisoners ought not to have been an obstacle with our military authorities even to exchanging negro prisoners; and with much more force and distinctness would I contend for the converse of that proposition. If the rebel authorities were willing to exchange for the ten, twenty, or thirty thousand white prisoners, who were in that loathsome captivity, and refused to exchange for negro prisoners, it was the dictate of humanity, of justice, of magnanimity, and of gratitude upon the part of our own Government to our own brave white men who were thus perishing in such loathsome prisons—it was the duty of our Government to those brave men, who were thus suffering martyrdom by all the horrors of starvation, to deliver them at once from such a wretched fate.

But what says General Butler? "The faith of our Government is pledged to the negro soldiers." I understand that faith to have been, "We will not enter into exchange with the rebel authorities for white prisoners, unless they will agree at the same time to exchange for negro prisoners." That was the reason, and the solitary reason, if I understand the difficulty, why the exchanges for white prisoners did not proceed. Why, sir, suppose the rebel authorities had been willing to exchange for all white prisoners, except those from Tennessee, or any other State, would their objection and refusal to exchange for that class of prisoners be any excuse, much less any justification, to our military authorities not to exchange for the white prisoners that they were willing to make a free exchange for? I contend that this business of exchange was not a matter that interested mainly the rebel government; it was a matter that interested principally American Union prisoners who were perishing in prison.

Mr. HOWE. Will the honorable Senator allow me to interrupt him for a moment?

Mr. DAVIS. Yes, sir, with pleasure.

Mr. HOWE. The honorable Senator has just read from a letter of General Butler's, written in August last. I should like to know if it was not preceded by a letter from Commissioner Ould, of the rebel government.

Mr. DAVIS. Yes, sir; but I have not got that letter here.

Mr. HOWE. I should like to ask the Senator, further, if it is not within his recollection that the letter of General Butler, from which he has just read, was in reply to a letter from Commissioner Ould, in which Commissioner Ould said that our Government had, months preceding that date, offered, and repeatedly offered, to make the exchanges, man for man and rank for rank, which offer had been steadily refused by the rebel authorities, for two reasons, one of which was that they would not consent to treat colored soldiers in the American uniform as prisoners of war, and we must relinquish that pretense as the condition to exchange, and the other was that before they would exchange at all we must agree to parole the excess of prisoners in our hands.

Mr. DAVIS. I do not understand the facts as the honorable Senator from Wisconsin has stated them. I understand the position of the rebel government to have been this: that their authorities were willing to enter into an exchange of prisoners on the terms of the cartel agreed upon between the two Governments, that the rebel authorities were willing to execute the agreement in the cartel for the exchange of prisoners between the two Governments.

Mr. HOWE. Yes; and the Government of the United States refused to carry out that cartel, for the reason that the rebels had violated in numberless instances the paroles given by their prisoners, and therefore we refused to take paroles any longer.

Mr. DAVIS. But I understand the position of our authorities—and it is stated substantially by General Butler in the correspondence to which I have referred—to be that they had pledged their faith and honor to the colored soldiers that no exchange of prisoners should take place with the rebel authorities unless the exchange included negro prisoners as well as white prisoners. I may be misinformed; I may have read the papers inaccurately; and if so, I should like to be corrected; but I understand our Government to have assumed and steadily and inflexibly to have maintained the position that it would enter into no exchange of prisoners unless the rebel authorities would agree to treat negro soldiers just as white prisoners, and enter into their indiscriminate exchange. I understand General Butler to have stated this pledge to Commissioner Ould as one reason at any rate why the exchange for white prisoners had not proceeded.

I stated at that day and at an earlier day that this would be one of the ills and evils resulting from the enlistment of negro soldiers into our armies; that there would be disputes and questions about the exchange of negro soldiers which could not be satisfactorily adjusted with the rebel authorities, and that those difficulties would prevent, hinder, or defeat the exchange of white prisoners, and would condemn our white citizens to remain in these prisons where they were gradually starving to death. In my judgment our Government had no right to assume any such position, and especially it had no right to maintain that position so persistently, so obstinately, and so inflexibly as to suffer twelve or eighteen months to expire without a general exchange of white prisoners between the two authorities, and in that way to have permitted thousands and tens of thousands of the best and bravest men of our land to perish by starvation.

A friend of mine came from Libby prison two or three months before the close of the last session of Congress, and he informed me that he had been in that prison thirteen months, that in that time there had been upward of eighteen thousand Union prisoners brought to Libby and to Belle Isle, and that more than six thousand of them had perished by exposure, want, and starvation, and the diseases resulting from insufficiency of food and from exposure. We have all seen the report of the mortality in the prisons of Andersonville in the southern confederacy during the summer. All the papers stated that at one time there were about thirty thousand Union prisoners confined in the prisons at Andersonville, and that in two months, either June and July or July and August, upward of eight thousand of our prisoners perished in that single place.

I have no doubt that at least thirty thousand Union soldiers have died from starvation and disease resulting from insufficient food and from exposure, from a want of shelter and other protection that a sick soldier ought to have, by being held in these rebel prisons. What a horrid fate! The vivid picture read by the honorable Senator from Michigan, the other day, from the report of a committee of the Sanitary Commission, I suppose did not portray it in colors too strong. The human heart and imagination recoil from torture. The rack and all the cruel modes of punishing and torturing criminals in the dark ages shock the sense of the present age of Christian civilization; but all of them were not more revolting, were not more horrid, and indeed not so much so, as the punishment of a prisoner by starving him to death. In my judgment, the most horrible death that my reason or my imagination could contemplate would be to be shut up in a dungeon and there starved to death. The men who can doom prisoners to such a fate are monsters, and any punishment of the guilty who do this deed that would promise to reform or restrict or curtail in any degree the horrid sufferings of our brave and unfortunate soldiers who are prisoners in the enemy's hands, I would be willing to resort to.

But, Mr. President, what liberality, what magnanimity, even what justice toward our poor unfortunate prisoners, had our Government a right to expect at the hands of these rebels, these criminals? None. They are engaged in a conflict of war, deadly, savage, desolating, almost without an example in modern times. But here is our own Government, which is charged with the fate of our brave but unfortunate captives in rebel prisons. These men, the soldiers of our Republic, had volunteered to bear aloft the flag of our country and to sustain the Union and the authority of the United States within all the borders of the United States. When those men were so unfortunate as to be captured, and especially when the direful misfortune of being lodged in such prisons as Libby, Belle Isle, Andersonville, and others equally horrible, was brought upon them, I ask if every principle of humanity and justice and policy did not require that their own Government should exhaust every means to deliver them from their dreadful condition.

I ask you, sir, and I ask the Senate, if the refusal of the rebel authorities to exchange for a few hundred negroes was any justification, any excuse, any palliation even, for our military authorities in not exhausting every means of exchange or parole and any other mode whatever by which these brave and perishing men might be delivered from their horrible captivity and its inevitable death. Isay to-day that if the subject of exchanges had been taken up honestly, earnestly, and in good faith by our Government and our military authorities eighteen months ago, more than twenty thousand gallant and true men who have died in these dreary prisons would have been restored to their country, their friends, their families; and with all the comforts of home and all the attentions of mother, wife, and daughter which they would have received, they might ere this have been restored to health, so that now, instead of filling an unknown grave in a distant land, they would be cheering and sustaining and blessing their own homesteads and their own families.

Sir, I view with horror the conduct of the rebel authorities to these prisoners, and second, even if second to that, I view with repugnance, condemnation, and execration, the heartless, cruel, and unjust indifference of our own authorities toward the fate of these perishing brave men.

I never heard it controverted before this occasion that the great difficulty in the way of exchanging white prisoners with the rebel authorities was their refusal to exchange for negro prisoners. On this point I will read again a single clause from General Butler's letter:

"The wrongs, indignities, and privations suffered by our soldiers would move me to consent to anything to procure their exchange, except to barter away the honor and faith of the Government of the United States which has been so solemnly pledged to the colored soldiers in its ranks."

What was that faith? What was that pledge? What was it but simply this, that exchanges would not be entered upon by our Government unless they were treated as prisoners of war with our white soldiers, and unless the exchanges should extend to and include negro soldiers as well as white men? I dissent entirely from the position that the refusal of the rebel authorities to exchange a few thousand, yea all the negroes in America if they had been in captivity, should make one moment's delay or obstacle in the exchange of our white prisoners. The refusal to exchange negro prisoners did not mitigate the sufferings of those negroes. It made their condition no better. It gave them no additional comforts. It offered them no speedier or earlier deliverance from captivity. Then, when it produced no good fruits to the negro, and resulted in the wasting, torturing, starving to death of our white citizens in captivity, why should the latter dread consequence be looked upon calmly, with cold indifference and apathy, in its terrible consummation, by our military authorities and they not waive the condition of negro prisoners being also exchanged?

No, Mr. President, I would say and I do say that all the negroes in America should never have been one iota in the way of or an obstacle to the free and prompt deliverance of our unfortunate white soldiers from captivity. It is for that reason that, although I denounce and censure and abhor the cruelties of the rebel authorities that doomed our brave men to such a dreadful fate, I condemn with equal decision and with equal indignation that heartless policy of our military authorities which permitted those brave men there to remain and thus to perish. I like to hear the thunders of the denunciation of my eloquent and able friend from Michigan in condemnation of the cruelties of the rebel authorities; but here is a double cruelty; here is a cruelty, an apathy, a heartlessness, a devotion to an abstraction and a mischievous error on the part of our own authorities, that has resulted in the great destruction of the health, of the happiness, of the hopes, and even of life to all those prisoners of ours that have died in rebel prisons. I insist, then, that condemnation ought to extend to our own authorities also.

Sir, we have even heard the proposition advanced that exchanges ought now to cease because our prisoners are in an emaciated and unhealthy condition, while the rebels are in a healthy and hale condition, and will if exchanged go into their armies, and fighting behind fortifications one man of them will be equal to four of ours. For that reason we have been told that exchanges should not take place any more during this war; and nobody is able to determine or to predict when the war will close! Sir, I utterly repudiate that position. I do not care what advantage in a military point of view the exchange of our prisoners would give to the rebel armies or to the rebel power. The simple, single inquiry is, what does the obligation under which our Government lies toward our brave soldiers (who are in captivity in loathsome dungeons where they are starving to death and enduring such horrid tortures) require from our Government toward those men? Not that exchanges shall cease, not that exchanges shall be further postponed until the negro is exchanged, but to go forward to-day, to-morrow, whenever you can, with any class of our white soldiers, any number of them, without regard to negro soldiers, without regard even to the States whence they come, if the rebels were to attempt to make that distinction, but so far as you can, if you can secure the exchange of one or one thousand, or of all, to proceed promptly to exchange our white soldiers, and in the name of humanity and justice restore them to their homes, to their country, although their terms of service may be about to expire and they will no longer enter into your armies. This is due to the relationship between such soldiers and their country. It is due to their patriotism. It is due to the manner in which they have braved death in the field and a more horrible death from disease in the camp and the prison. It is due to them, from all these considerations, that this justice should be done to them.

Mr. President, I favor the proposition to send a commissioner to the rebel authorities on the subject involved in this resolution. I am for trying everything short of retaliation which reasonably promises relief, before we resort to that dread remedy. I am for proposing to the rebel authorities a reasonable and just exchange of prisoners. To any and every extent that they are willing to enter upon that exchange, I would accept it. Because they would not exchange negro prisoners I would make it no difficulty in the way of exchanging white prisoners. Because they would not exchange white prisoners of a certain class, I would make it no difficulty to the exchange of white prisoners of every other class. I would snatch every white soldier, every American patriot, whose courage and love of country and of his Government prompted him to go to the battlefield and peril all in defense of the rights of his country, from prison, and especially from such a prison as these men are now in.

Mr. HOWE. Will my friend tolerate me in one more question?

Mr. DAVIS. Certainly.

Mr. HOWE. If the rebels were to say to-day that they would exchange our black soldiers and would not exchange our white soldiers, would the Senator be willing to effect exchanges so far?

Mr. DAVIS. I said half an hour ago that I would.

Mr. HOWE. I am very glad to hear it.

Mr. DAVIS. I said half an hour ago, I said twelve months ago, that I would. I say that it is the right of every man, white or black, who volunteers as a soldier in the United States Army, and who is received by our authorities as a soldier, who is so unfortunate as to be taken a captive, and whose captivity is of the revolting character of that of which we have heard—it is the right of that prisoner, whoever he may be and whatever may be his color, to be delivered from such a captivity at the earliest possible moment in which he can be delivered, and the Government ought to make use of every reasonable exertion in its power to deliver all of them, one of them, or any number of them.

Mr. President, as I said yesterday, I will never give my sanction to starving any man for any offense, upon any imputed crime, to subvert any purpose, the most holy that can be conceived of by the purest of living men. It is utterly abhorrent to my nature. I am no Christian; I wish to God that I was; but I have been educated in a Christian country, and I hope I have imbibed some of the pure and benevolent teachings of Christianity. Whether or not, it is so abhorrent to my whole nature and soul to starve a man to death that I never would give it any sanction, and wherever I could intervene by feeding a starved criminal, or imputed criminal, at any cost, I would thus minister to him, whether he was black or white, whoever he was, provided he was a man in the shape of a human being.

But, sir, when a proper effort is made by our President alone, or by our President encouraged by Congress, to have proper exchanges made, in whole or in part, or to any extent, and that effort fails, I shall be willing to take steps for retaliation; not retaliation by torture, not retaliation by starving to death any man, officer or private, not retaliation upon the private soldiers, who are mere machines with no volition, who have no mental and ought to have no moral responsibility in the matter, and whose sole and stern and unfortunate duty it is to obey orders. I never will consent that a man thus circumstanced, thus acting by a power and a force over which he can exercise no control, shall be made responsible by the loss of his life in any form for the wickedness and crimes of others. But I might be willing to doom to death the officers of the confederacy, the men of influence and power who may be reasonably supposed to exercise some control, some restraining power, over the policy and measures of the confederation—not death by starvation, but the military death of being shot by a file of soldiers. I would, however, await for the case to arise, and I would adjudge of it in all of its circumstances. I would not retaliate even upon the officer unless there was a reasonable prospect of its resulting in some essential good to our own unfortunate prisoners. If Congress chooses to initiate a proceeding of that character, or if the President does it of his own accord, as I conceive he has the amplest power to do, I will sustain Congress or the President in it with the little feeble support morally or in any other form that I can give to such a humane measure; and when that measure has been reasonably tried, and has been found to fail, then I will judge how far retaliation, even upon officers, is, in my judgment, politic and humane. But that retaliation which violates the moral sentiment of the world and the Christianity of the age, which shocks mankind, and which fills the universal human heart with awe and revulsion, I will never consent to. It would be a greater crime and wickedness than that of the rebels themselves.

I will make a single remark more, and then take my seat. We waged the war of the Revolution, we waged the war of 1812, and there is not a solitary instance of retaliation throughout the whole course of those wars beyond confinement in close prison.

Mr. HOWARD. That is a mistake.

Mr. DAVIS. Such is my recollection.

Mr. SUMNER. That is the statement of Chancellor Kent.

Mr. HOWARD. He is incorrect in that as in some other things.

Mr. DAVIS. I know there were some English prisoners in the war of 1812 brought to Kentucky and confined in the penitentiary, and that was all the punishment imposed upon them. I know that some of our sailors were taken from off our decks and confined by the British, and in retaliation we imprisoned at Worcester, in the State of Massachusetts, some British sailors whom we had captured and intended to hold as hostages. The Legislature of Massachusetts had previously passed a law allowing the United States the use of its penitentiaries and jails for the imprisonment of prisoners. But although those English prisoners were held as hostages for the safety of our own citizens who had been dragged from under our flag and from our own decks, and whom the English authorities were threatening to execute as traitors, although those prisoners were held for that purpose, commending itself to the heart and reason and patriotism of every man, the Legislature of Massachusetts at once passed a law directing the prison-keeper to discharge those prisoners, and they were discharged and went into the British provinces. And that Legislature, furthermore, passed a law prohibiting the use of the prisons of Massachusetts to the General Government for any such purpose, and directed peremptorily, and if I recollect aright, under a penalty, that whenever any such prisoners, taken captive from the English, should be confined by our authorities, civil or military, in Massachusetts prisons, they should be discharged by the prison-keepers. Now, as to the question of fact, I will read from Chancellor Kent:

"Vattel speaks of retaliation as a sad extremity, and it is frequently threatened without being put in execution, and probably without the intention to do it, and in hopes that fear will operate to restrain the enemy. Instances of resolutions to retaliate on innocent prisoners of war occurred in this country during the revolutionary war as well as during the war of 1812, but there was no instance in which retaliation, beyond the measure of severe confinement, took place in respect to prisoners of war."

To sustain this he refers to the Journals of Congress and various other authorities. The same author says also in regard to war:

"There is a marked difference in the right of war carried on by land and at sea. The object of a maritime war is the destruction of the enemy's commerce and navigation, in order to weaken and destroy the foundations of his naval power. The capture or destruction of private property is essential to that end, and it is allowed in maritime wars by the law and practice of nations. But there are great limitations imposed upon the operations of war by land, though depredations upon private property and despoiling and plundering the enemy's territory are still too prevalent, especially when the war is assisted by irregulars. Such conduct has been condemned in all ages by the wise and virtuous, and it is usually severely punished by those commanders of disciplined troops who have studied war as a science and are animated by a sense of duty or the love of fame. We may infer the opinion of Xenophon on this subject (and he was a warrior as well as a philosopher) when he states in the Cyropædia that Cyrus of Persia gave orders to his army when marching upon the enemy's borders not to disturb the cultivators of the soil; and there have been such ordinances in modern times for the protection of innocent and pacific pursuits. Vattel condemns very strongly the spoliation of a country without palpable necessity; and he speaks with a just indignation of the burning of the Palatinate by Turenne, under the cruel instructions of Louvois, the war minister of Louis XIV. The general usage now is not to touch private property upon land without making compensation, unless in special cases dictated by the necessary operations of war, or when captured in places carried by storm, and which repelled all the overtures for a capitulation. Contributions are sometimes levied upon a conquered country in lieu of confiscation of property, and as some indemnity for the expenses of maintaining order and affording protection. If the conqueror goes beyond these limits wantonly, or when it is not clearly indispensable to the just purposes of war, and seizes private property of pacific persons for the sake of gain, and destroys private dwellings or public edifices devoted to civil purposes only, or makes war upon monuments of art and models of taste, he violates the modern usages of war, and is sure to meet with indignant resentment, and to be held up to the general scorn and detestation of the world."

The laws of war have been gradually growing more humane for centuries, and they are more humane in the present age, in principle and according to the general practice of nations, than they have ever been before. The laws of war, and especially the law of retaliation, as I said yesterday, are ameliorated by the sentiment of this Christian and enlightened age, and it is a noble monument of the advancing enlightened philanthropy and Christianity of this day of the world that the horrors, even of the laws of war, are thus being mitigated. Instead of our Congress repudiating the maxims and the practices of the century, and going back to the bloody code, the barbarous and inhuman practices of more than a century ago, even in this great civil war, it better becomes us to advance further and further in this noble progress that mankind has been making.

Mr. HOWARD: Mr. President, it seems to have been the effort of the Opposition, in the comments which they have made upon the resolution now before the Senate, to make the Administration odious for not having perfected and carried out a system of exchange of prisoners with the rebels, and in that manner to have liberated our countrymen in their hands as prisoners of war. Instead of meeting the question fairly, upon its own merits, and upon the facts clearly in proof in the case, it seems to me they rather attempt to use the occasion as one for the promotion of party purposes, and for the purpose of assailing the Administration.

I do not wish, upon such an occasion as this, to imitate their example. I shall take it for granted that the Administration have done all in their power, all that could be required of them by the laws of war and by their duty to their country, to establish and carry out a system of exchange for the purpose of such liberation. I will not stand here to accuse them of the atrocious crime (for it would be a crime if they had committed it, or if it had been committed,) of permitting our soldiers to remain in the cruel custody of the rebels for some purpose other than the public good, for some purpose not authorized by their duty to their country. I shall presume in this discussion that the executive branch of the Government have at least tried faithfully to do their duty to the country, and that if they have failed in bringing about this exchange and the liberation of our prisoners in rebel hands, they have innocently failed, and failed upon such principles as justify their conduct before their country and before the world.

But, sir, I rose more particularly to pay a moment's attention to some observations made by the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. Hendricks,] the other day, upon this subject. The Senator from Indiana, entertaining, as he told us, a very strong doubt as to the weight of the testimony which I took the trouble to lay before the Senate, and denying that the present occasion is one for the exercise of retaliatory measures against the rebels, tells the Senate that the only authority from the books which he has read "condemns what the Senator from Michigan proposes;" that is, what is proposed in the present resolution. He continues:

"He has not given us a citation of a single authority of force and respectability in this body justifying the high measure which he proposes. I expected to hear it. He is the champion of the measure; he reports it to the body; but instead of referring to accredited authority upon the subject, he gratified the Senate by reading from a pamphlet containing a report of a committee," &c.

The passage alluded to by the Senator from Indiana was from General Halleck, in which, although the general admits the propriety of the principle of retaliation, he declares that where one belligerent resorts to inhuman and barbarous practices in the treatment of prisoners, or in any other mode of carrying on the war, it is not permissible to a civilized nation to imitate his example by way of retaliation; and General Halleck, in support, as it would seem, of this declaration of his, refers to various writers upon the laws of war and the laws of nations. Since the passage has been called to my attention, I have examined the authorities referred to by the general in his text, and I do not find that he is supported by a single one of the distinguished writers to whom he refers and whom he cites in support of his proposition; and I say here in the Senate, with confidence, that there cannot be found in any of the writers commonly accredited as teachers upon the laws of war and the laws of nations any statement or declaration that corroborates and supports that of General Halleck in this regard. Vattel says—and this was the passage referred to by the Senator from Indiana—

"Retaliation, unjust between private persons, would be a much more unjust practice between nations, because here the punishment would fall with more difficulty upon those who have done the wrong."

This is the passage from Vattel upon which is predicated, I may say with propriety, I think, the whole of the argument against the measure of retaliation which is now proposed. It is asserted that Vattel condemns such retaliatory measures during war, and this passage which I have cited is used in support of that proposition. This passage has been erroneously applied to an existing war, whereas the author is speaking only of retaliation as a means of compelling a nation to do justice before making war upon her. He is speaking of this retaliatory law as one which may or may not be put in practice before the offended nation sees fit to take the remedy into its hands and enters upon a direct prosecution to right her wrongs. As such preliminary means the author condemns the use of it, but he nowhere censures, but everywhere recognizes, the principle of retaliation. This is obvious enough from the rest of the paragraph which the Senator from Indiana would have done well to read before attempting to cast his censures upon me. The same author uses the following language upon the subject of retaliation in the same paragraph:

"What right have you to cut off the nose or the ears of the ambassador of a barbarian who has treated your ambassador in like manner? As to those reprisals which in time of war partake of retaliation, they are justified by other principles, and we will speak of them in their place."

They are justified by other principles, by the principle, of course, of necessity, of a just self-defense and a just protection of one's own rights; and whatever may be that necessity, the honorable Senator will find that by the books it is bounded only by the principle of self-preservation, the preservation and defense of the nation and of its interests; and there is no other rule by which this necessity can be bounded or measured. He proceeds:

"All that is true in this idea of the talio is, that, all things being equal, the punishment ought to hold some proportion to the wrong which is to be punished."

This is Vattel's language—

"the end and foundation of punishment requiring it to be thus."—Vattel, lib. 2, chap. 18, sec. 339.

Mr. Wheaton, treating of the rights of war between enemies, says:

"The law of nature has not precisely determined how far an individual is allowed to make use of force either to defend himself against an attempted injury, or to obtain reparation when refused by the aggressor, or to bring an offender to punishment. We can only collect from this law the general rule that such use of force as is necessary for obtaining these ends is not forbidden." The same principle applies to the "conduct of sovereign States existing in a state of natural independence with respect to each other. No use of force is lawful except so far as it is necessary."

Necessity is then the standard by which the force is to be measured and determined. If you are dealing with an enemy who is not restrained by the ordinary punishments inflicted by civilized nations engaged in war with one another, if you are engaged with a barbarous enemy who does not hesitate to put innocent prisoners to death without necessity and in his own wrong, if you find it absolutely necessary to resort to severer and still severer measures of retaliation, in order to compel your adversary to observe justice, then, sir, upon every principle of common sense and of common law, you are authorized to use that amount of severity which will insure the end at which you aim, which will compel him to abandon his evil courses, and to observe the laws of christianized, civilized war. It is a complete begging of the question to say that you may not by way of retaliation starve a prisoner to death. If your enemy persists in starving your prisoners in his hands to death, after you have notified him, after you have remonstrated with him against it, and it is perfectly apparent that a similar treatment of his own prisoners is the only means by which you can restrain him, I ask you, sir, whether it comports with humanity, with your duty to protect your own soldiers, to omit the employment of such means as will obviously restrain your enemy, and compel him to treat in the ordinary way of civilized warfare the prisoners in his hands?

Mr. McDOUGALL. Will the Senator from Michigan allow me to make an inquiry of him for information?

Mr. HOWARD. Yes, sir.

Mr. McDOUGALL. We have all read the rules that Vattel and other commentators on the laws of war have laid down on this subject; but I will inquire of the Senator, has it occurred in the history of civilized States to legislate a lex talionis?

Mr. HOWARD. Yes, sir.

Mr. McDOUGALL. When and where?

Mr. HOWARD. I will answer my honorable friend from California on that subject so perfectly that I think he will not be inclined to repeat the question before I get through.

Now, sir, upon the general subject of retaliation in the prosecution of a war—

Mr. McDOUGALL. If the Senator will allow me, I will state my position more exactly so that he will understand precisely how to answer my question. I understand that the lex talionis is a business of time, carried out by military commanders in the field pending war, not a matter of legislation. I do not remember in all history of anything of legislation on that subject.

Mr. HOWARD. I think I shall show the honorable Senator from California that in that respect he is mistaken also.

Mr. McDOUGALL. I may be.

Mr. HOWARD. I have another authority upon the general law of retaliation, the weight of which I think will hardly be denied or disputed. It is a no less authority than Napoleon himself, who probably was as good and as profound a judge of the rules of war between civilized nations as has ever lived, a man who for twenty-five years was almost in the daily exercise of those rights and usages, one to whom they were as familiar, doubtless, as any other branch of his great profession. History tells us that the Bourbon princes conspired together in London and in other places to assassinate Napoleon while he was First Consul; and so far did the conspirators go with their projects against his individual life as chief of the State, that they employed the "infernal machine," so called, for the purpose of destroying his life while he was passing through the streets of Paris. The historical incident is familiar to us all. By way of retaliation for such repeated attempts upon his life made by persons who were in the employ of his enemies, and who were, of course, to all intents and purposes, his public enemies, he seized one of their number, the Prince d'Enghien, on neutral territory, brought him by force to Paris, subjected him to trial by a military commission, by which he was sentenced to be shot, and the dreadful sentence was carried into execution even without the knowledge of the emperor. For this act of retaliation the emperor has, I believe, been generally condemned by English writers and English historians; but I refer to the incident, not for the purpose of showing that what he did was in itself just and right, but for the purpose of showing what were his views upon this great subject of retaliation. "Who," he exclaims in his conversations with Las Casas—

"Who can blame me for having acted thus? What! blows threatening my existence are aimed at me day after day, from a distance of one hundred and fifty leagues; no power on earth, no tribunal, can afford me redress; and shall I not be allowed to use the right of nature and return war for war? What man unbiased by party feeling, possessing the smallest share of judgment and justice, can take upon himself to condemn me?"

"They [the Bourbon princes] could not reasonably pretend to be above the law to destroy others, and claim the benefit of it for their own preservation; the chances must be equal."

So exclaims the emperor, and so I say, "the chances must be equal." The rebels have no right in justice, or upon any principle, to claim for themselves immunity for atrocities committed against us. The emperor proceeds:

"My great maxim has always been that in war, as well as in politics, every evil action, even if legal, can only be excused in case of absolute necessity; whatever goes beyond that is criminal."—Las Casas, Jour., vol. 4, p. 260, London edition of 1823.

He put the question of retaliation upon the ground of necessity for the purpose of protecting himself, as chief of the State, from the attempts at assassination made against him by his enemies.

Mr. McDOUGALL. I understand the Senator to quote from a rule laid down by an emperor, at that time First Consul, who had acquired power in France.

Mr. HOWARD. I believe he possessed some power at the time he retaliated.

Mr. McDOUGALL. I do not understand that to be a piece of legislation, but the affirmation of a doctrine or a policy of war. Am I right in that? Was not that a policy of war laid down when adversaries were contending with each other? Was it legislation? Was it ever done in council hall by the men who undertake to make laws?

Mr. HOWARD. I am coming to that question directly. If the Senator will exercise his patience a little, I will come to that point in the course of my remarks. I really hope he will endeavor to control his impatience for a moment. I certainly will do as I promised. He need have no anxiety on that subject whatever.

Mr. McDOUGALL. The promise of the Senator is a very good one. I have great respect for him.

Mr. HOWARD. Now, sir, the honorable Senator from California, with that confidence in his own excellent understanding and well-informed mind which pertains to him, seems to throw a defiance to me to produce any act of legislation by which the principle of retaliation in war has received the sanction of any civilized Government; and I now address myself to that particular question. If the honorable Senator will turn to page 743 of the first volume of the Statutes at Large of the United States, published by Little & Brown, he will find an act, approved March 3, 1799, while the Congress of the United States were in existence, entitled "An act vesting the power of retaliation, in certain cases, in the President of the United States." That act declares:

"That on information being given to the President of the United States proving satisfactorily to him that any citizen of the United States who shall have been or may be found on board any vessel of war of either of the Powers at war with the French republic, and who shall have been impressed or forced by violence or threats to enter on board such vessel, hath suffered death, or hath received other corporal punishment, or shall be imprisoned with unusual severity by order of the executive Directory of the French republic, or of any officer or agent acting under their authority in pursuance of any decree of the said Directory or law of the French republic, it shall be lawful for the President of the United States, and he is hereby empowered and required, to cause the most rigorous retaliation to be executed on any such citizens of the French republic as have been, or hereafter may be, captured in pursuance of any of the laws of the United States."

There, sir, is the exercise of the talio by an act of Congress pure and simple, reflecting retaliation, not upon the guilty party who has committed the atrocity or the barbarity, not upon the officer or the soldier who has committed the crime upon American citizens, but upon any citizen or subject of the French republic who shall be captured by the authority of the United States. It will be recollected that at that time the United States were in a quasi state of war with the French republic. That is my first precedent; but I do not stop there.

As recently as 1813 the Congress of the United States passed a similar act, applicable exclusively to acts of the British military authorities during the war of 1812. I think the immediate occasion of the passage of this act was this: at the surrender of General Scott in Canada there were some two dozen British subjects of Irish descent made prisoners by the British army. Scott and his fellow prisoners were put into a prison-ship for the purpose of being transported to Boston and there to be exchanged as prisoners of war; but the British military authorities discovered that among these prisoners were several Irishmen, who were detected to be such from their peculiar accent, their brogue, and the captors, or the guard on board the ship, were carefully selecting out every one of these Irish prisoners, who were told that they were not to be exchanged as prisoners of war under the cartel existing between the two Governments, but that they were to be transported across the Atlantic to England, and there to be tried, convicted, and hanged as traitors against the Government of the country in which they were born. That was the threat at least, that they were to be hanged as British subjects found in arms against their country, under a very ancient principle of the laws of England, that a British subject cannot expatriate himself in such a manner as to throw off his allegiance; he cannot quit his own country and become the subject or citizen of another country to such an extent as to be incapable of committing treason against Great Britain. There was no other remedy left in the hands of our Government except retaliation, and immediately upon General, then Colonel, Scott making his report of these facts to the Secretary of War, the Congress of the United States, then in session, passed the following act:

"An act vesting in the President of the United States the power of retaliation.

"Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That in all and every case wherein, during the present war between the United States of America and the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, any violations of the laws and usages of war among civilized nations shall be or have been done and perpetrated by those acting under authority of the British Government, on any of the citizens of the United States, or persons in the land or naval service of the United States, the President of the United States is hereby authorized to cause full and ample retaliation to be made, according to the laws and usages of war among civilized nations, for all and every such violation as aforesaid."

There is no notice required to be given to the British authorities of the purpose of Congress to carry out this principle of retaliation. They had not reached that sublimated wisdom which seems to have some influence in this Chamber, and by which, it would seem, we are required upon principles of honor and justice to notify these rebels that we intend to retaliate for violations of the laws and usages of civilized war. Our friends on the other side would have us believe that the innocent, verdant individuals who are at the head of this rebellion know nothing about the laws of war, that they are innocently ignorant of them all, and therefore it is becoming us, as a great and magnanimous people, to condescend to give them notice that we propose to enforce the principles of that code. I take it for granted that they understand the laws of civilized war as well as we do, and that therefore there is no necessity whatever for our giving them notice that we intend to enforce the principles of the code.

Section two of the same act declares, further:

"That in all cases where any outrage or act of cruelty or barbarity shall be or has been practiced by any Indian or Indians in alliance with the British Government, or in connection with those acting under the authority of the said Government, on citizens of the United States or those under its protection, the President of the United States is hereby authorized to cause full and ample retaliation to be done and executed on such British subjects, soldiers, seamen, or marines, or Indians in alliance or connection with Great Britain, being prisoners of war, as if the same outrage or act of cruelty or barbarity had been done under the authority of the British Government."

Sir, our predecessors in this body did not believe, it would seem from their legislation, that we are bound to give notice of our intention to carry out retaliatory measures, but they believed it was sufficient to enact, by an act of Congress, that it was a duty which was then incumbent upon the Executive as the Commander-in-Chief of the Army as it is now. They did not hesitate to apply the principle of retaliation and the retaliatory penalty to persons who were as innocent of the charge committed against us as the angels in heaven. It was then and is now the only mode which is left us to bring home to the hearts and heads of our adversaries a restraining influence which shall induce them to treat our soldiers and prisoners in their hands with more mercy, with more kindness, and with more indulgence. In short, sir, you must, in such a case as this, punish the innocent for the guilty. It is not new in the history of human frailty, it is not new in the history of nations, or in the social history of mankind, for the innocent to be punished for the guilty. I agree that it is abhorrent to our feelings of humanity; but we must remember, at the same time, that we are not at liberty to suffer our prisoners who are in the hands of the enemy to lie there and perish by slow starvation when we have it in our power, by simply subjecting their own countrymen in our hands to the same punishment, to remedy the evil. I say it is the only remedy we have. It is a hard necessity, to be sure. To me it is one of the greatest absurdities to say that the exercise of this retaliatory right brings us upon the same level with the rebels themselves. I was amazed, and am still amazed I must confess, at the language of Professor Lieber, rather ostentatiously quoted by the Senator from Massachusetts in this debate. He says:

"I am decidedly against the retaliation resolutions concerning prisoners of war. The provision that the Southerners in our hands shall be watched over by national soldiers who have been in southern pens is unworthy of any great people or high-minded statesmen."

Certainly the professor could not have written with any feeling of disrespect toward the members of this body who have had the benefit of his letter at the hands of the Senator from Massachusetts; and certainly the Senator from Massachusetts could not have intended anything offensive by introducing a letter in discussion which contains this language. I take no offense at it. I can only say that the language of this learned professor indicates, to my mind, that he is rather a pedant in national law than a practical statesman, or even a practical scholar. But he proceeds:

"I am not opposed to retaliation."

Ah! what is retaliation? What is the talis spoken of in all the books upon national law? Is it not returning like for like so far as practicable? Certainly it is. It means that, and means nothing short of that. He adds:

"I am not opposed to retaliation because it strikes those who are not or may not be guilty of the outrage we wish to put an end to. That is the terrible character of almost all retaliation in war. I abhor this revenge on prisoners of war because we would sink thereby to the level of the enemy's shame and dishonor."

In the estimation of this writer, it seems, that by inflicting retaliatory punishment upon the rebels who have thus tormented our poor boys to death in southern prisons, we sink to the same level of shame and dishonor with them. Mr. President, are we guilty of the shame and dishonor of starving to death innocent and brave men? Are we guilty of crime when we resort to the only means that God and nature have left us of rescuing our countrymen from the hands of these barbarians? Are we chargeable with crime and infamy and dishonor when we say to the rebel authorities, "We will return to you like treatment for like treatment that you may authorize against our prisoners," and when we do this as the only means left us of protecting our prisoners in their hands? I cannot accept of any such doctrine. I cannot believe that the Congress of the United States, in the passage of the resolution now before us, will incur infamy, or dishonor, as imputed to them by Professor Lieber, while I see standing upon the statute-books of the United States an act passed by our predecessors here which is capable, if carried out faithfully, of producing precisely the same results which are specified and individualized only in the resolution now before us.

Sir, who voted for that act of retaliation of 1813? Among the names who voted for it, I find Calhoun, Cheves, Desha, Dismore, Grundy, Shaw of Massachusetts, Talafero of Virginia, and many others who have left a name and fame behind them worthy of our envy. I find that in the House of Representatives there were fifty-six voting in the affirmative, upon the final passage of that bill, and only seventeen against it. Those seventeen were Bigelow, Bingham, Champion, Chittenden, Emmet, Fitch, Grosvenor, Law, Lewis, Mosely, Potter, Quincy, Reed, Rodman, Sheffy, Stanford, and White. The political character of those who voted in the negative is sufficiently indicated by their names. If there are those who desire to imitate them I certainly can have no objection to their following their own preferences.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, I rise for the purpose of moving that this resolution and all the amendments that have been proposed to it be re-committed to the Committee on Military Affairs. I think that the committee, in the light of this debate, can frame a resolution that we can pass with the general assent of the Senate. This debate has given us an opportunity of understanding the views and wishes of the members of the body. We have the original report. We have the amendment proposed by my colleague. We have the amendment that I have moved to his amendment. We have a proposition made by the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. HENDERSON,] another by the Senator from New Hampshire, [Mr. CLARK,] and another from the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. WADE,] and there may be others.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. If the Senator from Massachusetts will allow me to interrupt him, as he was not in his seat when the honorable Senator from Michigan read the two acts, one of 1799 and the other of 1813, I should like to have those acts go to the committee, for I am rather of opinion from hearing them read that they are better than any of the propositions that have been offered.

Mr. WILSON. If my motion is sustained by the Senate, the committee will certainly have what has been read by the Senator from Michigan before them. They will have all the laws of the country, and all the facts that we can gather from any quarter. I think that if we recommit this proposition, and the amendments to it, the committee can put the resolution in shape, and therefore I make the motion.

Mr. WADE obtained the floor.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I ask the Senator from Ohio to allow me one moment for an explanation.

Mr. WADE. Certainly.

Mr. HENDRICKS. The Senator from Michigan, in the course of his remarks, stated that I should have read further from General Halleck, and not stopped to censure him. I desire simply to say that in no remark that I submitted to the Senate did I intend any censure upon the Senator from Michigan, and I am not aware that I used any language that admits of that construction. I made such criticism as I thought I was allowed to make upon his argument, and in such language as I thought was courteous; but if I was misled in the haste of debate to use any language which can be regarded as a censure upon the Senator I certainly did not so intend, and would desire to withdraw it. I did not agree with the Senator, and attempted to show the reason why I did not, but intended to express myself with entire respect to that distinguished member of this body.

Mr. HALE. I send to the Chair the 5th rule of the Senate, which I wish might be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. POMEROY in the chair.) The reading of the 5th rule is called for, and it will be read.

The Secretary read, as follows:

"5. When two members rise at the same time, the President shall name the person to speak; but in all cases the member who shall first rise and address the Chair shall speak first."

Mr. HALE. I merely call the attention of the Senate to the rule because I think the provision of it was grossly violated in my case. I had intended to address the Senate upon this subject briefly, but as my right to the floor is not recognized by the person occupying the chair, I choose to postpone it until somebody does occupy it who will respect it.

Mr. WADE. Mr. President, I am opposed to this recommitment, because I am fully persuaded that if this resolution be recommitted, that will be the last of it. I do not know that we can carry it through here; but I know that, in the light of all the authorities that have been read, the resolution as proposed to be amended by myself stands precisely upon those authorities. It does not differ from those in the books. The Senator from Wisconsin desires the books to go before the committee to enable them to draw a resolution which he thinks will conform better to the idea of the Senate than the one now before the Senate; but I assure him that if he will read the resolution in the light of the amendment that is now before the Senate he will find it is precisely in accordance with the authorities that have been read. There is nothing new about it.

I have been astonished since this measure has been introduced to find that among the statesmen and jurists composing the Senate there is such a diversity of opinion on the subject of retaliation. Why, sir, it is among the first things that any statesman reads in any of the books composed by the publicists. It is as common as any other. It is laid down in every book upon international law. There is no respectable author in modern times who has denied the right of retaliation, or who has doubted its importance. There is no respectable nation but has resorted to it in proper cases; and there never was a nation placed under circumstances where this remedy was so loudly and emphatically called for as the United States on the present occasion, because you cannot find any barbarities equal to those that are inflicted upon our poor soldiers in the hands of the enemy.

I do not exactly agree in all that my friend from Michigan has said. He thinks that the Executive Government and Congress have done all upon this subject they ought to have done. I do not believe it. I feel as it were guilty myself that I have delayed so long to bring such a measure before Congress. We have been told on this floor by a gentleman who is not very anxious for the passage of this resolution, that he has had his eye upon this subject until he has no doubt that more than thirty thousand men have been sacrificed by these barbarities of the enemy. Has there been any movement on our part to do away with them? Was there ever a Government that so entirely abandoned its brave men in the hands of a barbarous foe without remonstrance, without a voice raised in their defense?

I know there are gentlemen here who tell us that they have never heard that there was anything wrong in the treatment of our prisoners. I think the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HENDRICKS] told us that he was surprised we should make this accusation, that he had never heard anything about it; and yet, sir, it is more than two years ago since this body sent forth a committee to investigate the barbarities committed by the rebels at Bull Run.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Mr. President, I am surprised that the Senator from Ohio should make such a statement, as I have said the very opposite twice in the Senate. I have said that I believed there were cruelties inflicted upon our prisoners not justified by the usages of war and shocking in themselves, but I expressed the opinion that they had not gone to the extent that has been stated.

Mr. WADE. The extent to which they have gone is as palpably and as directly proven as that they were committed at all. For more than a year you have had before you a report of a committee of your body who traveled nearly one thousand miles and took nearly one hundred depositions to show the extent of the barbarities that have been committed upon your soldiers. They have told you how after a whole garrison had surrendered they were murdered in cold blood. They have told you how those in hospitals were taken out and murdered. Yea, they have told you more than that. They have told you how men were taken and crucified in the tents in which they lived and those tents set on fire and the men allowed to perish in that way; and yet you have not heard of it and do not believe the extent of the barbarities! The preamble of this resolution does not enter at all upon the extreme barbarities that are revealed in that testimony.

I understood the President to say at Baltimore, the very day that committee started on its mission of investigation, that if these barbarities, as alleged, should be proved, he would adopt the most stringent measures of retaliation. It was printed in the papers that he said so. When the report of that committee came out, when twenty thousand copies of it were called for by the Senate, and when it was spread broadcast over the land, I believed that the President would take some steps, at least, to protest against these horrors. I do not know but that he has done so; but if he has I have not heard a word of it. Certainly I do not charge this more upon the President than upon ourselves. We have all exercised a forbearance here that is most culpable in my judgment. I take it to be one of the first duties of any nation that compels a soldier into the field to fight a barbarous foe to see that he is protected according to the principles of civilized warfare in modern days. When a barbarous enemy transcends the ordinary principles of war it is the first duty of a nation to see that their soldiers are protected against these barbarities. Am I wrong, sir? Is it a novel principle? Did you never hear of it before? Am I the barbarian that seeks retaliation here for the first time? I have been pointed at here by gentlemen, and reflected upon as though I stood here the advocate of unheard-of barbarity! I am naturally as averse to what may be called cruelty upon any mortal man as anybody else, I reckon; but when we are driven to this painful necessity, I say to you, disagreeable as the duty is, we have no right to shuffle it off.

The Senator from Connecticut, [Mr. FOSTER,] yesterday turned round to me and inquired, "Would the gentleman starve a prisoner to death?" Sir, if it becomes my duty to do that, or any other disagreeable duty in the performance of a still higher duty that I owe to the brave defenders of my country, my nerves I think can stand it. His nerves do not seem to be at all shaken over the proved and demonstrated fact that our poor soldiers are subjected to this treatment. That does not seem to disturb him. He knows it is so; he is not willing that it should be continued; he does not want this cruelty inflicted upon our soldiers; but he thinks it would be horrible for us to enter upon a like system for the purpose of rescuing both from the perpetration of such acts. I am amazed that men can look with perfect coolness upon the sufferings of our brave men in the hands of this barbarous foe, and without raising a hand in their defense, and yet shrink with horror from the idea that the miserable traitor who happens to be in our hands shall be reduced to a like condition, when the only object is to rescue both from the necessity.

Sir, do you not know that cruelties are inflicted to-day, not upon one, but upon thousands of our men who are dying by inches in southern prisons? Your own kin, your own friends, your own defenders, are there. Is it any worse if you see in your own hospitals the enemy subjected to the same treatment? It would hardly bring any more misery upon mankind than the other, especially as it is done with the express object of compelling the barbarous foe to reform his course. No nation has found any other remedy. God knows, if any Senator on this floor can devise any other means whereby our soldiers can be rescued from this condition, I shall be the first to go with him. There is no pretense that there is any other. The wisdom of man has never devised any other. The books on international law show you that, as yet, the wisdom of man has found no remedy for grievances like these except in the principle of retaliation.

Sir, how much better are we than our forefathers? They felt none of this mawkish sentimentality that compelled them silently to see their friends tortured to death without an attempt to rescue them. I have no doubt they were as humane as we are. But when the necessity of State was upon them, when their duty as men and members of this legislative body was upon them, when they reflected upon it and saw that there was no other remedy except retaliation, their nerves were sufficient for the purpose. Have the Senate become old women, that we cannot rescue our friends from this condition by the remedy that all civilized nations in war use in such cases? Are the gentlemen from Massachusetts more humane than the Father of his Country was? Do they claim a higher standing in morals or anything else than the good and glorious Washington did? Did he hesitate a moment to apply this principle? Early in the revolutionary war, the very moment he saw that our soldiers and officers were maltreated in the prisons of the enemy, he at once resorted to this remedy in accordance with public law. He did not stand hesitating over it as we do, but he at once said to General Gage, "I understand that our officers and soldiers in your prisons are huddled together; that they are treated with inhumanity and barbarity in a great variety of ways" that he mentions. "Now, sir, the measure you mete out to our men shall be promptly dealt out to yours." It was no less a man than General Washington that said that. Humane as he was, revolting to him as was this remedy, he would not shrink from his duty because it required a little nerve to face it. While I know that I am treading in the footsteps of that great man, that I am only urging upon the American Senate an example that he so promptly set not only once but repeatedly, I feel that I am not to be pointed at here and called a barbarian because I propose the same remedy that the Father of his Country proposed in like cases.

Sir, were our ancestors barbarians? You have heard from the Senator from Michigan, who has thrown a light on this subject that cannot be shut out, what they have done on this subject. Gentlemen may vote against this resolution, they may vote against this principle, but the fact will nevertheless stare you in the face forever that your forefathers resorted to this remedy in a case not a hundredth part as urgent as the present.

But it is said it is dishonorable to do it, it is shameful to do it. Sir, I would rather stand upon the pages of history as the man who stood forth to vindicate our own glorious soldiery in a way that the public law points out than to stand there as the man who shrank from his duty because it was a disagreeable one. I tell you, sir, the honor of this nation is only to be vindicated by protecting the rights of your soldiery in the hands of the enemy. If you think you are going to treasure up honor to this nation by showing yourself too cowardly, too sublimated, to resort to the only remedy that is practical and pointed out by nations, you greatly mistake that meed of honor that nations give to each other for action. Nay, sir, we shall be pointed at as inhuman, as sneaking out of a duty incumbent upon us, that we did not vindicate the honor and dignity of the nation by protecting the poor men whom we had it in our power to protect. The honor of the nation, our honor as men, consists in the performance of this rugged and disagreeable but necessary duty.

I hope, sir, that this resolution will not pass from the consideration of the Senate. I will ask, just at this stage, that it may be read as I propose to amend it, and I ask Senators to listen to it to see if there is anything in it that requires that it should go again before the committee that they may get some further light on the subject.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The reading of the resolution as proposed to be amended by the Senator from Ohio is called for, and it will be read if there be no objection.

Mr. WADE. I will thank Senators to listen to it, because it is the best argument that can be made against many of theirs.

The Secretary read the amendment, which was to strike out all after the word "retaliation" in the seventh line, in the following words:

That in our opinion such retaliation ought to be inflicted upon the insurgent officers now in our hands, or hereafter to fall into our hands as prisoners; that such officers ought to be subjected to like treatment practiced toward our officers or soldiers in the hands of the insurgents, in respect to quantity and quality of food, clothing, fuel, medicine, medical attendance, personal exposure, or other mode of dealing with them; that with a view to the same ends, the insurgent prisoners in our hands ought to be placed under the control and in the keeping of officers and men who have themselves been prisoners in the hands of the insurgents, and have thus acquired a knowledge of their mode of treating Union prisoners; that explicit instructions ought to be given to the forces having the charge of such insurgent prisoners, requiring them to carry out strictly and promptly the principles of this resolution in every case, until the President, having received satisfactory information of the abandonment by the insurgents of such barbarous practices, shall revoke or modify said instructions. Congress do not, however, intend by this resolution to limit or restrict the power of the President to the modes or principles of retaliation herein mentioned, but only to advise a resort to them as demanded by the occasion.

And to insert in lieu thereof:

That the executive and military authorities of the United States are hereby directed to retaliate upon the prisoners of the enemy in such manner and kind as shall be effective in deterring him from the perpetration in future of cruel and barbarous treatment of our soldiers.

So that the joint resolution will read:

Whereas it has come to the knowledge of Congress that great numbers of our soldiers who have fallen as prisoners of war into the hands of the insurgents have been subjected to treatment unexampled for cruelty in the history of civilized war, and finding its parallels only in the conduct of savage tribes; a treatment resulting in the death of multitudes by the slow but designed process of starvation, and by mortal diseases occasioned by insufficient and unhealthy food, by wanton exposure of their persons to the inclemency of the weather, and by deliberate assassination of innocent and unoffending men, and the murder in cold blood

THIRTY-EIGHTH CONGRESS, 2D SESSION.

FRIDAY, JANUARY 27, 1865.

NEW SERIES.....No. 28.

of prisoners after surrender; and whereas a continuance of these barbarities, in contempt of the laws of war and in disregard of the remonstrances of the national authorities, has presented to us the alternative of allowing our brave soldiers thus to be destroyed or to apply the principle of retaliation for their protection: Therefore,

Resolved, &c., That in the judgment of Congress it has become justifiable and necessary that the President should, in order to prevent the continuance and recurrence of such barbarities, and to insure the observance by the insurgents of the laws of civilized war, resort at once to measures of retaliation; that the executive and military authorities of the United States are hereby directed to retaliate upon the prisoners of the enemy in such manner and kind as shall be effective in deterring him from the perpetration in future of cruel and barbarous treatment of our soldiers.

Mr. WADE. Now, Mr. President, if a Senator is for retaliation, if he is for the principle of it, he cannot have it in a milder form than it is there. It does not prescribe exactly what the retaliation shall consist in. The President is only directed to make it effectual by such means as to him shall appear proper to be used. I would have it much stronger than that. I would pay them in kind. I have no such scruples as induce gentlemen to shrink from retaliation in kind—an eye for an eye, and a tooth for a tooth, in time of war. That is my doctrine. That was the doctrine of General Washington. That was the doctrine of our predecessors in this body in all our previous wars.

Shall we treat rebels who really have forfeited their lives by their treachery more leniently than our forefathers treated our enemies of other nations in wars which were international wars? Is there anything that pleads in behalf of these rebels that does not apply to independent nations at war? By the admitted law of all mankind, a soldier fighting in a just war does not forfeit his life by being taken prisoner; he must be used according to the custom of civilized nations, which is, not to harm a hair of his head after he has surrendered. That is the principle as applied to independent nations. Do these rebels commend themselves to a milder treatment because they are rebels? When a man has perjured his soul before God, and committed treason against his country, is that a reason why special limitations should be made in his behalf? I trust not. The same principles apply here that apply in all wars, no more, no less. If we were to apply the principle in such cases strictly, it would be against these rebels, because they are rebels, and have thereby forfeited their lives.

But I ask no other treatment between us and them than as between independent nation and independent nation. I invoke the great principles of international law in protection of our poor soldiers in the hands of a barbarous enemy, and I ask no more. Will you give it, or will you turn your backs coldly on these poor men and say to them, "Our pity is reserved entirely for the enemy; we have none on our own men, for we cannot bear the idea that an accursed rebel shall receive the same meed of justice?" Is there a Senator here who wishes to go out of this body with this condemnation upon his head, that he would not invoke the well-known international law in behalf of our men suffering, as we are told, these horrible barbarities at the hands of this insolent and accursed foe? Shall we fold our arms and abandon the men whom we have compelled into the field to fight our battles, and to defend us against this accursed enemy, to their fate without an effort to rescue them?

The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. Wilson] offered a remedy here, he offered an amendment to this resolution, which I observed was looked upon with favor by some Senators. It was that two commissioners should be appointed by the President to visit the rebel authorities and there enter into a compact on this subject with some of them; he did not tell us who, in his amendment. If they were to go to the civil authorities there and enter into such a compact, you would thereby acknowledge beyond doubt the independence of the confederate States. Is that what you intend to do? France and England and every Power in Europe would say at once, "You yourselves led the way to the acknowledgment of their independence the moment you sent commissioners there to treat with them." I know the Senator did not intend this; but such is the law of nations and so it will be held by every nation in Europe. In that way our mouths would be stopped when they recognized the southern confederacy, for they would be able to say, "You yourselves did it first by making a compact with their civil and military authorities."

That is one reason why that proposition should not be adopted; but what would be the probable effect of it as a remedy if it were adopted? You send two commissioners down to Mr. Davis, and I suppose they are to hold up before him this "book of martyrs" containing the testimony taken by the committee, and to tell him, "Here, Mr. Davis, in Libby prison, right under your nose, subject to your observation daily, are the skeletons of men whom you have reduced from manhood to ghosts, whose lives have been sacrificed by your cruelty and exposure; now we come here somehow to argue you out of this." Mr. Davis would say before they could get there, "My friends, you cannot come within twenty miles of Richmond with such a statement on your tongues;" but he would tell them, "You come here as slanderers; we deny that we have treated your prisoners wrong and harshly, but if we have it is not in your mouth to allege it, because we say that you treat our prisoners as badly as we treat yours;" and they say it all over the South. That is all you would get by that.

First of all, then, the effect of such a proposition would be to recognize the independence of the rebels, and secondly it would be like sending Mr. Blair down there. [Laughter.] I hope to God that we have all got sick of that. I hope you will send some other commissioner there, if you will have one there; for I understand that he went and doffed his cap to Mr. Davis and said to him, "I have lost no confidence in you!" That is the way we read it. That man with his soul perjured before God and his hand red with the blood of his countrymen, has not acted so as to diminish the confidence in him of this missionary, and that is no reason why he cannot approach him with the same feeling as before! Thank God, that is not the common sentiment of our people. If you send commissioners I do not know but that you will have to send just such men there, and they are to go and kneel down at the feet of Jeff. Davis's throne, and ask him if he will not be kind enough to treat our prisoners better than he has done heretofore!

Sir, if you could get a man ever to go on such a miserable errand, who would be a commissioner to bear these tidings to Jeff. Davis, he would turn right round and say, "You are a slanderer," and he would put him in Libby before he had time hardly to speak, [laughter] and he ought to do so; I would do it if I were he, and you sent anybody to me on such a foolish mission as that. [Laughter.] What! two commissioners to go and ask Jeff. Davis not to be barbarous to our prisoners! Do you not think his heart would fail him before your commissioners? [Laughter.] In all the negotiations for the exchange of prisoners is it a fact—the proposition to which I am now referring presupposes it to be a fact—that not one word has been lisped about these barbarities, and that no attempt has been made to remedy them? It is the inference to be drawn from the proposition, and I fear before God that it is true.

I do not believe you can find in the history of mankind an instance where a great nation having its armies in the field, and having a knowledge for two long years of the inhumanities and barbarities that are grinding them to powder and reducing them to death by inches, has borne such things without any attempt to resent them. Not only were the facts made manifest two years ago, but the prisoners who have been returning continually at intervals ever since bear upon their persons the accursed marks of the martyrdom they have suffered; and those who ought to be the guardians of our brave soldiers, whose first duty is to protect them, have lisped not a word on the subject. I know of nothing that has gone out either from Congress or the Executive to redress this great wrong. As I have said, I feel deeply that I have not brought the subject before Congress heretofore; but I hoped the Executive would do his duty, as I understood that he promised to do; but when we find that he has not done it, we cannot excuse it to ourselves that we have stood silent so long.

Reflect upon it, Senators; suppose those near and dear to you were in these prisons, and you saw that their lives were ebbing away day by day, and you knew that the horrors of their prisons would soon end their miserable existence unless you interposed in their behalf, would you not do it? I do not believe there is a Senator on this floor who has not been appealed to over and over again by wives and by mothers whose husbands and sons were in this jeopardy. How often have we received communications like this: "I have letters from my poor boy, and death is his certain doom unless he can be rescued in a very short time." Whose soul is not harrowed up with the idea that while the country owes its brave sons this protection, he has to reply to that poor mother, "I have no power to do anything in your behalf; the Government has not lifted its voice even to make a protest in your behalf?" And yet gentlemen think that we have done our full duty to these men who are thus dying in our cause! Sir, we have not done it. These barbarities have been proved so that they cannot be denied. Nobody pretends to deny them. You cannot look with composure now upon the daguerreotypes of those men whose skeletons are before you and have been for more than a year; and yet you go coolly away and fold up your arms and do nothing! The dreadful story of suffering is revealed by every prisoner who returns, by every man who escapes from prison. Every one of them knows precisely the inhumanities that are practiced. There is no dodging the fact, gentlemen, by shutting your eyes, and closing your ears. If you are non-resistants, if you have embraced the new doctrines of Christianity now preached here, that the world as a whole never heard of before, we shall know it by the disposition you make of these resolutions.

I want to know if you do not hold that we have a right to make defensive war; if we have no right to protect ourselves against aggression, as was strongly intimated by the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. HENDERSON.] He invokes peculiar doctrines, that, he says, are Christian doctrines, in behalf of this rebellion and as a bar to our doing anything to rescue our brave men. He says you must do good to your enemies; if they smite you on one cheek you must turn the other. This is the way he would rescue our men from these barbarities!

Mr. HENDERSON. I think the Senator from Ohio is doing me a very great injustice. When the question was put by my colleague whether I would not make defensive war, I think I made a positive answer. I have not examined the report this morning of my remarks; I have not seen the report of them; I have not looked over it; but I feel very well satisfied as to the answer that I made. I said that nations as well as individuals, by any code of morals which I had ever seen, had a right of defense; and I further stated that, in my judgment, this was a defensive war upon our part. We certainly did not commence the war; the rebels commenced it. I further said, and the very amendment that I have submitted goes to that extent, that, under certain circumstances, retaliation is right, and ought to be adopted. I neither argued against it nor does my amendment argue against it. I said nothing against it, but I did argue against the retaliation, in kind, proposed by the resolution. That I opposed, upon the ground that I thought it might be interpreted by the nations of the world, and would be interpreted by individuals throughout the country, to be in a spirit of revenge; but I expressly said that I did not charge any vengeance, or desire to visit vengeance, on the part of the committee.

Mr. WADE. Then I will ask the Senator in that connection, why did he quote those passages of Scripture which seemed to deny the right to retaliate?

Mr. HENDERSON. I did quote some from the Sermon on the Mount. I believe there were some gentlemen present on that occasion who expressed very great astonishment at the doctrines then proclaimed; and it seems the Senator from Ohio is equally astonished as was the multitude who gathered round upon that occasion.

Mr. WADE. Then the Senator invoked the Scriptures barely for the purpose of showing his learning in that direction, [laughter,] and not to affect the argument, if I understand him. He holds that we have a right to retaliate, and yet he invokes the Christian doctrine to show that we ought not to retaliate. He evidently does it, then, for our benefit. When we want that benefit we will make a preacher or a chaplain of him. [Laughter.]

Mr. HENDERSON. I desire to ask the Senator if he does not believe that the code of morals as taught, in the Sermon upon the Mount is correct, and that it ought to be followed by mankind?

Mr. WADE. I do, but I think you most egregiously misapply it. I do not think it applies to any such case as this. If the Senator does, what becomes of his argument for retaliation, which he says he holds to?

Mr. HENDERSON. I am very glad indeed that my friend from Ohio is a believer; but he ought to remember that "the devils also believe and tremble." [Laughter.]

Mr. WADE. I do not see any trembling in that quarter, and I am sure there is none in this. [Laughter.] But, Mr. President, putting all that aside, I do not really know what the Senator intended by the long argument he made. I am sincere in saying that I watched his argument, and when he got through I could not tell whether he was for retaliation or against it; because he said he was for retaliation and then he proceeded to quote Scripture—which he said he believed in—to show that it was altogether wrong and ought not to be resorted to. I thought I saw an inconsistency, and I think so now. I see, however, or think I see, that we can propose no sort of retaliation to which he will agree. He says he is opposed to retaliation in kind. There is nothing in any of these resolutions which says it shall be in kind. The resolution reported by the committee was merely advisory, not mandatory; my amendment makes it mandatory but does not prescribe the measure or form of the retaliation to be practiced. I leave that with the President. I say he shall retaliate in such a way as in his judgment will be effectual to accomplish the end we have in view. I go for that. If the rebels cannot be deterred from atrocities by the threat, I am for putting the threat into execution. The Senator from Connecticut need not point to me as a man whose nerves will quail before such a duty. I tell you, sir, I would starve the whole rebellion unless it becomes effectual so that they release our men from this jeopardy. I have no mincing of matters here. I say to you they shall be protected. I do nothing through wantonness. When they release our men from this barbarity, I am willing to say, "Hands off," and to make peace on this subject; but until they do I will make the South a desolation, and every traitor shall lose his life, unless they treat our men with humanity. That is my doctrine.

I know of no limitation to this principle. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SUMNER] said there was a limitation; but I say that if you begin it, there is no limitation until it has the effect to remedy the evil complained of. You may begin moderately, if you please, as my amendment leaves the President a right to do; you may begin mildly; but unless what you do is effectual, I would censure the President if he did not follow it up with sterner and sterner measures until the effect should finally be produced, even if it condemned to death every rebel in the southern States.

There, sir, I stand; for, by the eternal God, our soldiers, defending their country, shall be protected, let it cause what evil it may to the other side. These are my doctrines. These are the doctrines of international law; they do not originate with me. They are doctrines as old as civilization, and interposed against barbarism as an effectual remedy, and as the only remedy that the wisdom of man has yet devised.

Mr. President, I say again that I hope this resolution will not be recommitted, because I believe that every one is satisfied that at present, as I propose to amend it, it is free from all these side-bar arguments that have been made against it. Almost every Senator has announced himself in favor of some kind of retaliation. Some say we shall give notice beforehand that we intend to retaliate in the future, and that we should let bygones be bygones. Others say that if we retaliate in kind, we shall starve their prisoners to death, and that will not do. The resolution, as I propose to amend it, runs clear of all these things. It is that the President shall retaliate for these offenses to the extent that he thinks will be effectual; and he is to make the retaliation effectual, let it cost what it may. I would not enter upon a system of retaliation unless I intended to make it effectual. The Senator from Connecticut greatly misunderstood me when he supposed that I offered the proposition barely in terrorem without intending to carry it out. Sir, I am not a man of shams. I get up no scarecrows here. I tell the rebel authorities, "We will punish your men until you reform." I no more want to see cruelty practiced than do other Senators; but I want to rescue our brave soldiers from the accursed cruelty to which they are subjected. That lies at the bottom of my efforts, and in order to rescue them I am willing to incur any denunciations that Senators or others may attempt to pour out upon my head, if I can in any degree release or relieve our poor soldiers from the accursed barbarism that is practiced upon them. They shall have my support and my aid and my voice. I will go to an extreme in that direction. There is scarcely anything that I would not be willing to do in order to effect this great purpose of protecting those whom it is our bounden duty to protect.

What, sir! stand here voting for conscription bills to compel the young, vigorous men of our country to take their lives in their hands and go forth to defend the nation against these accursed rebels; and then, when they are cruelly tortured to death by our barbarous foe, fold our arms and leave them to their fate! No, sir, no. I never was guilty of an act like that, and I never will be. They shall be rescued if my voice and my vote can effect it. I leave it to others to say that we, having left them in the hands of their enemies without an effort to rescue them for two long years, will not now interfere in their behalf. You may recommit this resolution; you may put it in your pockets if you will; but my voice is for retaliation until we reach a remedy which is the proper and legitimate object of what we aim at.

Mr. FOSTER. If I have understood the honorable Senator from Ohio right, he construed some remarks which I made yesterday as holding him up here as a person more barbarous than any of the rest of us, and as advocating acts of barbarity toward prisoners of war. If I misunderstood him, I wish he would say so.

Mr. WADE. I will say to the Senator that I did not suppose he really intended to say anything wrong; but I think the tenor of his remarks was calculated to show that we were advocating this measure were stirring up a pretty barbarous remedy, and one that we should not be warranted in resorting to, for he turned to me to know if I would stand by and see a man starve to death. My answer is that the death might be out of my sight, and not in it, and if the death is to occur, I would rather it should be the death of a rebel than of a Union soldier.

Mr. FOSTER. So far from imputing to the honorable Senator the barbarity to which he alludes, I very sedulously avoided saying anything of the kind, because I had no such belief or impression on my mind; but now, from the explanation of the Senator, I see that the wrong I did him was in supposing that he would not stand by and starve a man to death. I expressly said yesterday that I did not believe it. It seems that in that I was mistaken, for he now avows that he would. Of course he has a right to make the decision for himself; it is not mine, but his. I must, however, still beg his pardon for believing that I knew his mind in that respect, when it should come to the point, better than he does himself, and that, notwithstanding the impulse under which he speaks, he would not stand by deliberately and hold a prisoner of war in his custody and starve him to death.

Mr. WADE. Not as a remedy for our starving prisoners in their hands?

Mr. FOSTER. Not as a remedy for anything. The Senator would not do it, in my belief. If he insists that he would, and that I am at the same time charging him with barbarity, or holding him up to the Senate as encouraging acts of barbarity, he will see that it is he who does it and not I.

Mr. JOHNSON. I do not rise, Mr. President, for the purpose of making an effort to influence the vote of any member of the Senate either upon the original proposition or upon the suggested amendments, because it is very evident that upon the whole subject the mind of the Senate is already made up. It could not well be otherwise, because the argument on both sides has been in a great measure, if not entirely, exhausted. My principal object is to state, as briefly as I can, the reasons that will influence my own vote; and before I proceed in that purpose I may be permitted to say that neither of the members of the committee by whom the original resolution was reported need have disavowed any inhuman purpose either on the part of the committee or on the part of any individual member of the committee. Those of us who know them, and their constituents who know them, and the country, will hardly for a moment credit even the suspicion that they design by this measure anything inhuman in the ordinary acceptance of the term, or anything else than such as they may deem proper to arrest the inhumanity which has been practiced upon our own soldiers.

I have another remark to make before I proceed further, as preliminary. We are now in the month of January, 1865. The only evidence that I am aware of, that is before the Senate or the country, of these outrages perpetrated upon our prisoners, was made known to the Senate and to the country by the report of a committee of our own made in May last. The honorable Senator from Ohio who shows so much zeal, and has discussed his side of the question with so much ability, was I think a member of the committee before whom the evidence was taken, and of course was a party to the report. That report as I find was submitted to the Senate on the 5th of May, 1864.

Mr. WADE. I will remind the Senator that there was a previous report made on another occasion, which showed these barbarities, long before that.

Mr. JOHNSON. I am aware of that, and that makes the argument stronger, I think, for the purposes for which I propose to use it. There was, then, a report made before 1864 on the same subject, and that report also disclosed to the country and to the Senate the existence of these barbarities. Now, I do not understand that, at least from the 5th of May, 1864, down to the present time, these barbarities have been continued. I have no evidence before me, and I do not believe that the evidence is to be obtained anywhere, that this conduct on the part of the rebels now exists.

Mr. FOSTER. Allow me to assure the honorable Senator that he is entirely mistaken. The last officer who escaped from Richland jail, in Columbia, South Carolina, left there as late as the 24th or 28th of December; he was ten days in getting down the river, and he has arrived here in the North in the month of January, within fifteen days past, and he stated to me, as I told the Senate yesterday, that the ration of the officers then confined, when he left there, on the 24th or 28th of December, (I am not certain which,) was one pint of Indian meal per day and a few pinches of salt, and occasionally a little sorghum; and that was the whole ration for a day.

Mr. JOHNSON. The honorable member misunderstood me.

Mr. SUMNER. If the Senator from Maryland will yield, I will move that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of executive business, which will leave this question in order for to-morrow.

Mr. JOHNSON. I have no objection, provided it is understood that I have the floor to-morrow. ["Certainly."]

Mr. WADE. Before the question is put on the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts, I wish to ask that the amendment I have offered to this resolution be printed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That order will be made.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

On motion of Mr. SUMNER, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business; and after some time spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, January 26, 1865.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. CHANNING. The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

PRE-EMPTION RIGHTS IN COLORADO.

Mr. BENNET, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill in relation to pre-emption rights in Colorado Territory; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

SETTLEMENTS ON THE PUBLIC LANDS.

Mr. BENNET. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Lands be instructed to inquire into the propriety of so changing existing laws as to legalize the settlement by loyal citizens upon any and all the public domain of the United States to which the Indian title has been or may be extinguished, and report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. HOLMAN. I shall not object to the resolution if the words "except mineral lands" be inserted.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Accept that modification.

Mr. BENNET. Oh no, the resolution is intended to cover that.

Mr. HOLMAN. Then I object to it.

GEOLOGICAL SURVEY OF COLORADO.

Mr. BENNET, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Lands be instructed to inquire into the propriety of providing by law for a geological survey of Colorado and other mining Territories of the United States, and report by bill or otherwise.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I desire to move to postpone the consideration of the special order, being the motion submitted by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. PENDLETON,] to reconsider the vote of the House at the last session upon the joint resolution in relation to the admission of heads of Executive Departments on the floor of the House. As the gentleman entitled to the floor [Mr. Cox] is not now present, I move to postpone the special order until after the morning hour. We can get through some important business in that time.

The SPEAKER. The motion to reconsider, the consideration of which was pending at the time the House adjourned on yesterday, is not a special order. But being a motion to reconsider, it is a privileged question.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Then I move to postpone its further consideration until after the morning hour. I want to get at the regular order of business.

Mr. PENDLETON. I hope the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. WASHBURN,] instead of pressing the motion to postpone, will go on with whatever he may have to do until my colleague [Mr. Cox] comes in. The Committee of Ways and Means are striving very hard to get in some of their bills; and if the gentleman will just go on with the ordinary business of the House, that will answer his purpose.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Very well; that is all I want.

No objection was made.

NATIONAL CURRENCY.

Mr. STEVENS, by unanimous consent, reported from the Committee of Ways and Means a bill to amend an act entitled "An act to provide a national currency secured by the pledge of United States bonds, and to provide for the circulation and redemption thereof."

Mr. STEVENS. I ask that the bill be printed, and postponed until a week from next Monday, and made the special order for that day after the morning hour, and from day to day until disposed of.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

INSPECTORS OF CUSTOMS.

Mr. STEVENS also, by unanimous consent, reported from the Committee of Ways and Means a bill to amend an act entitled "An act to increase the compensation of inspectors of customs in certain ports," approved April 29, 1864.

Mr. STEVENS. I think there will be no objection to this bill after hearing it read.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I cannot consent to have the bill taken up and acted upon at this time; I am willing to have it introduced, and postponed.

Mr. STEVENS. Then I move that the bill be postponed till Wednesday next, and made the special order for that day after the morning hour, and from day to day until disposed of.

The motion was agreed to.

COLLECTORS OF CUSTOMS.

Mr. STEVENS, by unanimous consent, reported from the Committee of Ways and Means a bill for the relief of collectors and surveyors of customs in certain cases.

Mr. STEVENS. I do not think that after the reading of this bill any objection will be made to its consideration and passage at this time. I therefore ask unanimous consent to take this bill up and consider it at this time.

The bill was read at length. It provides that in all cases in which any collector or surveyor of customs has paid or accounted for, or is charged with duties accruing under the joint resolution to increase temporarily the duties on imports, approved April 29, 1864, and in which the Secretary of the Treasury shall be satisfied that the collection of said duties was omitted by said collector or surveyor in consequence of not being informed of the passage of said resolution under which said duties have accrued, the Secretary of the Treasury, under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe, shall remit or refund, as the case may require, said duties to such collectors.

No objection was made to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. STEVENS. I will state in a few words the object of this bill. We passed an act, dated the 29th of April, 1864, signed at that time by the President. But it was not promulgated until the 30th of the month. In the mean time it took effect from the day of its being signed. Several collectors in different parts of the country did not hear of the passage of the act for two days after it was signed, and went on in the old way, omitting to collect the new duties imposed by the act. The collector of the customs at Chicago was one; and the collectors in all the western country are in the same condition. This bill is intended to enable the Secretary of the Treasury to release them and not hold them responsible for the non-collection of duties under those circumstances.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. STEVENS moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I desire to make some reports from the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. HOLMAN. Is it the understanding that the motion to reconsider, pending at the time of adjournment yesterday, has been passed over informally?

The SPEAKER. Passed over until the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Cox] who is entitled to the floor upon that question shall come in.

Mr. HOLMAN. I desire to have the privilege of making the ordinary point of order upon the business as reported. If the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURN] asks unanimous consent to report his bills, then of course the question comes up. I call for the regular order of business.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. The regular order of business will suit my case exactly. I move to postpone the regular order until the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Cox] comes in.

Mr. HOLMAN. I withdraw the call for the regular order, at the request of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. PENDLETON.]

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I desire to make regular reports from the Committee on Commerce, which the gentleman can hear from the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The privileged question of the motion to reconsider having been passed over informally, the Illinois ship-canal bill will come up before the regular order of business.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Then I move to postpone the Illinois ship-canal bill until the time fixed for the consideration of the Niagara ship-canal bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The next business in order is the regular call of committees for reports, commencing with the Committee on Commerce.

UNITED STATES MINT AT DALLAS CITY.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I am directed by the Committee on Commerce to report back the bill to relocate the United States branch mint at Dallas city, provided for by the act approved July, 1864, and to ask that they be discharged from the further consideration of that bill, and that it be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

The motion was agreed to.

FOG-BELL ON GOVERNOR'S ISLAND, NEW YORK.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I am directed by the Committee on Commerce to report a bill which is founded on a letter by the Secretary of the Treasury and a report of the Light-House Board, to appropriate $500 for the erection of a fog-bell or a fog-trumpet on Governor's island, in the harbor of New York. There seems to be a necessity for the erection of a fog-bell there. It is recommended by the Secretary of the Treasury, by the collector of the port of New York, and by the Light-House Board. If any gentleman objects, it must go to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. If not, then I would ask to have the bill passed now.

The bill was read at length.

Mr. PIKE. I will not object to the consideration of this bill at this time if the gentleman will accept an amendment I desire to offer.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I have no authority to accept an amendment, for this bill is a report from a committee.

Mr. PIKE. Then I object.

The bill was received and referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

ASSISTANT INSPECTORS OF STEAMBOATS.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I am instructed by the Committee on Commerce to report back a bill (H. R. No. 667) to provide for two assistant inspectors of steamboats in the city of New York, and for two local inspectors at Galena, Illinois, and to ask for its consideration at this time.

The bill was read at length.

Section one provides for the appointment of two assistant inspectors of steamboats in the city of New York, with an annual compensation of $1,200 each; and two local inspectors at Galena, Illinois, with an annual compensation of $800 each; whose duties shall be the same that are prescribed by the steamboat act of August 30, 1862.

Section two provides that in lieu of the fees for inspection now collected, there shall be levied and collected the sum of twenty-five dollars for each vessel of one hundred tons, and five cents for each additional ton.

Section three provides for the repeal of all acts or parts of acts inconsistent with the provisions of this bill.

Mr. SPALDING. I want to move to strike out the two inspectors at Galena, Illinois.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois is entitled to the floor.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I do not yield for that purpose.

Mr. MORRILL. As I am in favor of economy I would like to ask the gentleman from Illinois whether there is any necessity for these inspectors at Galena. I understand that the channel at that point does not afford a current for any steamboat of more than two feet draught.

Mr. STEVENS. I hope the gentleman will allow the bill to be postponed.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I will state to the House the provisions of the bill; and then, if a majority of the House do not wish to pass the bill, they can refuse to do so.

Mr. STEVENS. I understand it has not been printed.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. No, sir; it is not printed.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. Speaker—

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I believe I am entitled to the floor.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois declines to yield, and must be allowed to proceed without interruption.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I send to the Clerk a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, which I ask may be read.

The Clerk read, as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, January 23, 1865.

SIR, I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 11th instant, transmitting a copy of a bill introduced into the House of Representatives, creating two assistant local inspectors of steamboats for the district of New York, and a new local board for the district of Galena, Illinois, with a request that I communicate any suggestions I have to make upon the subject.

You also request a statement of the amount of fees received under the amendment of the steamboat law approved June 8, 1854.

The board of supervising inspectors in their last annual report say two assistant inspectors for the district of New York, and a new local board for the port of Galena, Illinois, will be required, in addition to those already authorized by law. I think their suggestion should be complied with; and I am also of the opinion that the salaries of the assistant inspectors at New York should be larger than are provided for in the bill inclosed by you.

In compliance with the request of the committee appointed by the board of supervising inspectors at their last annual meeting; and in a reply to a communication of the 12th instant from the chairman of the Committee on Commerce of the United States Senate, asking for information relative to the necessity and propriety of Senate bill No. 371, "To regulate the salaries of steamboat inspectors on the Pacific coast of the United States, and for other purposes," becoming a law. I transmitted on the 14th instant to the chairman of that committee a draft of a bill, a copy of which, with the letter accompanying it, is herewith inclosed.

The return of fees received under the "act to create an additional supervising inspector of steamboats," &c., approved June 8, 1854, can only in part be given, as complete returns have not yet been made to this Department.

I will take this occasion to suggest that the sixth section of the act last referred to be amended by the passage of the sections herewith inclosed.

With great respect,

W. P. FESSENDEN,

Secretary of the Treasury.

Hon. E. B. WASHBURN, Chairman of the Committee on Commerce, House of Representatives of the United States.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. The object of this bill is to create two assistant inspectors in the city of New York, and two local inspectors at Galena; and the second section is in relation to the tax upon tonnage. The attention of the Committee on Commerce was called to this subject by the report of the board of supervising inspectors, who have this whole matter in charge. They report to the Secretary of the Treasury, (I will read it for the benefit of my friend from Vermont,) that "two assistant inspectors for the district of New York and a new local board for the port of Galena, Illinois, will be required, in addition to those already authorized by law."

I will state to my friend from Vermont why this additional board is necessary. The district of the supervising inspector for that district extends from the mouth of the Illinois river to the Red river of the north and the northern boundary of the country. The law of last session requires the inspection of all ferry-boats, all tow-boats, and all tug-boats; and it has been found utterly impossible for the supervising inspector of that district to inspect all these classes of boats.

And in regard to the question of economy, let me say to my friend from Vermont that the law of last session provided for a very heavy inspection fee; so that this steamboat law, which formerly cost the Government $80,000 per annum, has, by the legislation initiated by the Committee on Commerce at the last Congress and at the last session of this Congress, been made almost a self-sustaining machine. I addressed a letter to the Secretary of the Treasury asking the amount of fees which had been received under this law. He replies that he cannot tell, because the returns have not been received. But I have a memorial from the inspectors of the city of Buffalo, in which they state that in that port alone the fees which they have returned into the Treasury amount to more than ten thousand dollars.

Mr. MORRILL. I would like to ask the gentleman from Illinois whether the salary at Buffalo is the same as those proposed to be paid at Galena.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. The salary at Buffalo, as now fixed by law, is $1,200 per annum. The memorial asks an increase of this salary to $2,000. That memorial has not yet been acted upon by the committee. In framing this bill, the Committee on Commerce, in consideration of the larger amount and the greater importance of the business at New York, have fixed the salary of the assistant inspectors at New York at $1,200, and the salary of the same officers at Galena at $800.

Mr. PIKE. The tonnage tax spoken of in the bill pertains, I suppose, to steam-vessels altogether.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Yes, sir.

Mr. PIKE. The bill, so far as I observe, does not specify. Would the gentleman object to inserting the word "steam" before the word "vessels?"

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I have no objection to that amendment.

Mr. PIKE. Then I move to amend by inserting the word "steam" before the word "vessels."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SPALDING. I desire to ask whether the committee, in fixing the salary of the assistant inspectors at Galena at $800 have not made it higher than the average pay of steamboat inspectors on the western rivers and lakes.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I think not. I think the salary at St. Louis is $1,500.

Mr. SPALDING. Out where I live, the pay, I know, is five hundred or five hundred and fifty dollars. But I believe there is now before the committee, of which the gentleman is chairman, a petition for an increase of those salaries. If the gentleman proposes to raise all these salaries in proportion to the pay of these officers at Galena, I have no objection.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. If the gentleman thinks that the salary proposed in the bill is too much, I will yield the floor that he may move to amend.

Mr. SPALDING. I move to amend by striking out "eight hundred," and inserting "six hundred."

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I have no objection to that amendment. I yield the floor to have that amendment submitted.

The SPEAKER. The amendment is pending.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I now demand the previous question.

Mr. GANSON. I hope the gentleman will withdraw the demand for the previous question, to allow me to ask him a question.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I withdraw it for that purpose.

Mr. GANSON. I presented a memorial from the local inspectors of Buffalo, and I want to know whether this relates to inspectors of that character.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. It does not.

Mr. SCHENCK. I should like to know what is the reason for providing that these inspectors shall be located at Galena, Illinois. May not there be other points where more vessels arrive and depart than at Galena?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. If my friend from Ohio had been present when I made my statement I think that he would have been satisfied without asking the question. The district extends from the mouth of the Illinois river to St. Paul and above. Galena is about midway between the two boundaries of the district.

Mr. SCHENCK. I ask the gentleman whether the inspector is required to make his headquarters at any particular place, or whether he is merely appointed for the district? Here it is provided that these inspectors shall be located at specified places. I desire to know from the chairman of the Committee on Commerce whether this bill harmonizes with the law in other cases.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. It does. The inspectors are appointed for districts, and they have to be located somewhere.

Mr. SCHENCK. The gentleman does not answer my question. Inspectors are appointed for districts, but the gentleman's bill goes further, and provides that these inspectors shall be located at Galena.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. My friend does not seem to comprehend this matter. By the steamboat law the United States are divided into nine supervising districts; there is a supervising inspector for each district, and in each district there are local inspectors to aid the supervising inspectors. These supervising inspectors have charge of this whole matter, and recommend to Congress, through the Secretary of the Treasury, what is required for the public good. They recommend where boards should be established. This is not merely a matter for position. The bill only carries out the object of the steamboat law.

I will say to the gentleman from Ohio that the duties of the supervising inspector have so increased by bringing in tug-boats, ferry-boats, and tow-boats, that it is impossible for him to perform them without this assistance.

As to the question of the expenditure under the law which we passed at the last session of Congress, I will add that the fees more than pay all the expenses.

Mr. WILSON. As this is not a matter of office, but of convenience for the district, I ask the gentleman whether he is willing to allow me to offer an amendment fixing one of these inspectors at Dubuque, Iowa?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I do not know that there is any local question here. I hope that my friend will not interfere with a matter of this kind.

Mr. SPALDING. I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. BLAIR. I hope that my friend will permit me to move an amendment, to appoint inspectors at Parkersburg and Wheeling, West Virginia.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I will state to my friend from West Virginia precisely the state of this question. There were no less than four boards in that district; at Cincinnati, Wheeling, Louisville, and Pittsburg. The supervising inspectors recommended that the board at Wheeling should be discontinued because there was no necessity for it, and Congress at the last session accordingly repealed that portion of the act. They said that there was no necessity for a board at Wheeling, as there was one at Pittsburg, within one hundred miles, one at Cincinnati, and one at Louisville.

Mr. BLAIR. I ask the gentleman from Illinois whether, if there were none in his State, he would think it right and just. We have none in our State at all, and it is not right that we should be thus deprived of that privilege.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. If any of the gentleman's constituents at Wheeling desire to have their boats inspected they can in twenty-four or in twelve hours get a local inspector from Pittsburg down there.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Iowa. I desire to ask the gentleman from Illinois how many of the steamboats navigating the upper Mississippi pass by Galena.

Mr. MOORHEAD. I wish to state that it is within my personal knowledge that the abolition of the board of inspectors at Wheeling has caused great inconvenience, as the inspectors at Pittsburg have had to leave their business there and go to Wheeling. I hope the board at Wheeling will be restored.

Mr. BROWN, of West Virginia. I hope the gentleman from Illinois will allow an amendment to that effect to be offered. It is right and just that we should have one board of local inspectors in that State. The idea that the people of West Virginia must go to Pittsburg to have their boats inspected is preposterous.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I demand the previous question.

Mr. BROWN, of West Virginia. Then I hope the bill will be voted down.

Mr. GARFIELD. I would inquire of the gentleman where Galena is situated?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I can tell the gentleman; it is in the third congressional district of Illinois; it is the residence of the greatest military hero of the age, General Grant. [Laughter.] I demand the previous question.

Mr. MALLORY. I ask the gentleman to yield to me a moment to offer an amendment.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I cannot.

Mr. MALLORY. I ask that the bill may be read again. I was not in when this matter came up; and the gentleman from Illinois is acting very unkindly.

The bill was again read.

Mr. MALLORY. Now I move that the bill be laid on the table.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Will the gentleman from Kentucky allow me to ask him a question? Does he desire to have the bill postponed for the purpose of having it printed?

Mr. JOHNSON, of Pennsylvania. I object to all discussion.

Mr. MALLORY. I asked the gentleman from Illinois to withdraw the demand for the previous question to enable me to offer an amendment. He declined, and now let the bill meet its fate.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was put; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 69, nays 58, not voting 55; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. William J. Allen, Ancona, Augustus C. Baldwin, John D. Baldwin, Blair, Bliss, Boyd, Broomall, William B. Brown, Clay, Cox, Cravens, Henry Winter Davis, Thomas T. Davis, Dawson, Deming, Denison, Donnelly, Eden, Edgerton, Eldridge, Frank, Ganson, Garfield, Griswold, Hale, Harding, Harrington, Herrick, Hutchins, Philip Johnson, William Johnson, Kalbfleisch, Kernan, King, Knox, Law, Lazear, Long, Mallory, McAllister, McClurg, McDowell, William H. Miller, Moorhead, James R. Morris, Morrison, Nelson, Noble, John O'Neill, Pendleton, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, Robinson, Rogers, James S. Rollins, Schenck, Seofield, Smith, William G. Steele, Stevens, Stiles, Strouse, Tracy, Wadsworth, Wheeler, Chilton A. White, Joseph W. White, and Winfield—69.

NAYS—Messrs. James C. Allen, Alley, Allison, Arnold, Baxter, Deannan, Blow, Boutwell, Brooks, James S. Brown, Chanler, Ambrose W. Clark, Cobb, Cole, Dawes, Dixon, Driggs, Eckley, Eliot, Grinnell, Benjamin G. Harris, Higby, Hooper, Asahel W. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Ingersoll, Orlando Kellogg, Longyear, Marvin, McBride, Melndor, Samuel F. Miller, Daniel Morris, Amos Myers, Norton, Odell, Charles O'Neill, Orth, Patterson, Perham, Pike, Price, William H. Randall, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Edward H. Rollins, Ross, Shannon, Sloan, Smithers, Spalding, Stuart, Thayer, Townsend, Upson, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, and Wilson—58.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Ames, Anderson, Ashley, Bailly, Blaine, Brandegee, Freeman Clarke, Coffroth, Creswell, Dumont, English, Faruworth, Finck, Gooch, Grider, Hall, Charles M. Harris, Holman, Hotchkiss, Hubbard, Jencks, Julian, Kasson, Kelley, Francis W. Kellogg, Knapp, Le Blond, Littlejohn, Loan, Marey, McKinney, Middleton, Morrill, Leonard Myers, Perry, Pomeroy, Pruyn, Scott, Starr, John B. Steele, Sweet, Thomas, Van Valkenburgh, Voorhees, Ward, Webster, Whaley, Williams, Wilder, Windom, Benjamin Wood, Fernando Wood, Woodbridge, Worthington, and Yeaman—55.

So the bill was laid on the table.

Mr. PENDLETON. I now demand the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. The regular order of business is the motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill of the House, No. 214, was recommitted to the select committee. Before that subject is taken up the Speaker asks unanimous consent to present several executive communications.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of State transmitting, in compliance with the act of August 26, 1842, a report of the incidental expenses of the State Department for the year ending June 30, 1864; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Also, a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury transmitting, in accordance with the act of April 2, 1792, an account of the receipts and expenditures of the United States Mint for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1864; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Also, a communication from the War Department in relation to the appointment of commissioners to award compensation to the owners of slaves enlisted as volunteers; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

COMMITTEE ON COMMERCE.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. As the reports made by the Committee on Commerce this morning were by unanimous consent, of course this morning is not considered as one day charged to that committee.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that the committee was called in its regular order, after first postponing the bill in reference to the ship-canal. The committee, however, have had but two fractions of morning hours, yesterday and to-day, and if there is no objection the Chair will consider the committee entitled to another morning hour.

Mr. SCHENCK. Mr. Speaker, I must require that the Committee on Commerce be called in order, and that it shall not be called again until the other committees have had their turn.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. The Committee on Commerce have had but one morning.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks otherwise. The committee was called yesterday and it was called again to-day. Yesterday the committee was regularly called, and it reported one bill. To-day it would have been called by unanimous consent but the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HORMAN] objected. Then the Chair proceeded to call the regular order of business, which was in relation to providing that the heads of executive Departments may occupy seats on the floor of the House of Representatives. Thereupon, upon the motion of the gentleman from Illinois, that was passed by for the present, and the bill in relation to the ship-canal was postponed, and then the Committee on Commerce was called in its regular order. The Chair, therefore, thinks that they have had two morning hours, although very short ones on each day.

Mr. WILSON. I desire to say to my friend from Ohio, that the bills which I propose to introduce are to be referred to committees that will meet to-morrow, and I desire to introduce them for reference merely.

Mr. COX. I have no objection to yield if debate does not arise.

OPINIONS OF ATTORNEY GENERALS.

Mr. WILSON, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to provide for the publication of the opinions of the Attorney Generals of the United States; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

UNION PACIFIC RAILROAD.

Mr. WILSON also, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to aid in the construction of a railroad in the State of Iowa, for the purpose of facilitating the construction of the Union Pacific railroad; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the select committee on the Pacific railroad.

Mr. PENDLETON. I now call for the regular order of business, and object to everything else.

Mr. DRIGGS. I ask the gentleman to allow me to introduce a bill for reference.

Mr. PENDLETON. I would be glad to yield to all these gentlemen, but I am bound to the Committee of Ways and Means not to yield any more.

TRADE WITH THE REBEL STATES.

The SPEAKER. The Committee on Military Affairs was discharged yesterday from the further consideration of the subject of trade between the rebellious and loyal States heretofore referred to them, but that subject was not referred to the Committee on Commerce. If there be no objection, it will be referred to that committee.

No objection was made.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. McBRIDE. Allow me to make an inquiry of the Chair in reference to the order of business. House bill No. 691, to authorize and aid in the construction of a railroad connecting the Pacific railroad in California with the Columbia river, in Oregon, and Puget sound was postponed till this day.

The SPEAKER. It was postponed until Thursday, the 26th of January, and it will come up in regular order.

Mr. McBRIDE. I understand that it was made the special order.

The SPEAKER. It was not made a special order, according to the Calendar.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. FORNEY, its Secretary, informed the House that the Senate had passed bill of the House No. 621, making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the year ending the 30th of June, 1866, with amendments, in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House.

Also, that the Senate had passed without amendment bill of the House No. 659, making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department during the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1866; and bill of the House No. 659, to amend an act entitled "An act to provide ways and means for the support of the Government, and for other purposes," approved the 30th of June, 1864.

* Also, that the Senate had passed a bill (S. No. 212) for the relief of Henry A. Brigham, in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House.

Also, that the Senate had adhered to their fourth amendment to the bill of the House (No. 620) to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1865, disagreed to, and such disagreement adhered to by the House.

CABINET OFFICERS IN CONGRESS.

The House then proceeded to the consideration of the motion to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution of the House (No. 214) to provide that the heads of Executive Departments may occupy seats on the floor of the House of Representatives was recommitted to the select committee upon that subject, and upon which Mr. Cox was entitled to the floor.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, the House is under obligations to the committee for presenting this measure. Great good and no harm will come from a free and full discussion of the distribution of the powers of the Government. In all innovations the burden is upon those who propose them to show their utility. The committee have proposed to change the machinery of our Government in two ways: first, that the heads of Departments shall have at all times the right to occupy seats and participate in debate upon all matters relating to the business of their Departments; secondly, that on two days of the week they shall attend the House and give information on all questions submitted to them.

The details of legislation to carry out these views I shall not consider. If the principle be adopted the measures will soon lose any stringency by amendments, and the coalescence of the executive and legislative will become, as in England, as perfect as the institutions of each country will permit.

I propose to discuss the question in the following order: first, to answer the report; second, to show the dangers of this innovation.

1. To answer the report. Under this head I consider, first, the constitutionality of the measure.

The committee entertain no doubt on this head. There is no provision against it in the Constitution, and it is regarded as a part of that power by which "each House may determine the rules of its proceedings." I will not contest our power to pass the resolution. But the discussion of its merits will show that its passage will be an infraction of the spirit if not of the letter of the Constitution, which provides that "no person holding any office under the United States shall be a member of either House during his continuance in office."

The same reasoning upon which this clause of disqualification is founded should forbid the admission of the Cabinet into Congress, either to debate or answer inquiries. I shall show that there is a stronger reason for the rejection of this measure than for the rejection of the Cabinet as members. That stronger reason is, that in case of membership they are liable to expulsion and censure, responsible to their constituents, who hold over them the rod of public opinion, backed by suffrage; while in the other case they are responsible to no one for their official tenure but the Chief Executive, whose subordinates and servants they are. A hundred censures cannot move them from their places. So long as they suit the President they can condemn the severest criticism and loudest anathemas of Congress.

When this clause of disqualification for membership was adopted it met with no opposition in the convention. So says Judge Story. Heads further:

"It has been deemed by one convention an admirable provision against venality, though not perhaps sufficiently guarded to prevent evasion. And it has been elaborately vindicated by another with uncommon earnestness."—Story, page 310, sec. 440.

And here it may be proper to say that the committee have invoked the wisdom and learning of Judge Story to sustain their views. This is a mistake. The committee have quoted only the arguments presented in favor of that side. He states, with equal point, the arguments upon the other, leaving the decision to the judgment of the student. The committee have not done justice to the question in thus partially presenting the case. I will supply the omission by citing the omitted portions:

"The other part of the clause, which disqualifies persons holding any office under the United States from being members of either House during their continuance in office, has been still more universally applauded; and has been vindicated upon the highest grounds of public policy. It is doubtless founded in a deference to State jealousy and a sincere desire to obviate the fears, real or imaginary, that the General Government would obtain an undue preference over the State governments. It has also the strong recommendation that it prevents any undue influence from office, either upon the party himself or those with whom he is associated in legislative deliberations."

And after the passage quoted by the committee, he proceeds to say:

"Such is the reasoning by which many enlightened statesmen have not only been led to doubt, but even to deny the value of this constitutional disqualification. And even the most strenuous advocates of it are compelled so far to admit its force as to concede that the measures of the executive government, so far as they fall within the immediate department of a particular office, might be more directly and fully explained on the floor of the House. Still, however, the reasoning from the British practice has not been deemed satisfactory by the public; and the guard interposed by the Constitution has been received with general approbation, and has been thought to have worked well during our experience under the national Government. Indeed, the strongly marked parties in the British Parliament, and their consequent dissensions, have been ascribed to the non-existence of any such restraints; and the progress of the influence of the Crown, and the supposed corruptions of legislation, have been by some writers traced back to the same original blemish. Whether these inferences are borne out by historical facts is a matter upon which different judgments may arrive at different conclusions; and a work like the present is not the proper place to discuss them."—Story, pages 313, 314.

So that we may draw from these citations, these reasons against the measure proposed by the committee: first, extreme party dissensions, owing to the presence of the executive agents in the House; second, the progress of the undue influence of the Executive; third, the corruptions of the Legislature; fourth, a well grounded jealousy of Federal predominance over State governments. But to me the principal reason is the undue and corrupting influences of such a connection upon both Cabinet and Congress. If this reasoning be found valid, then the Constitution is violated in its essential spirit by the disturbance of that healthful equilibrium between the legislative and executive which it was designed by the framers of the Constitution to avoid. But of these points I will speak particularly hereafter.

Second, the practice and precedents appealed to by the committee.

The committee appeal to legislation and practice—to the law of 1787—authorizing the head of the Treasury to make report, in person or in writing, to either branch. Because of these precedents they regard the power as unquestioned. The fact that this law and custom, used in 1789 by the Departments of State and of the Treasury, and yet unrepealed, has fallen into desuetude, is rather evidence that not only has the guard of the Constitution been regarded as salutary as against membership, but, by "general approbation," against the entrée of the Cabinet into the debates and deliberation of Congress. At least, as Judge Story says, the reasoning from the British practice has not been deemed satisfactory to the public. In fact, as I shall show, the British experience led to their exclusion here. And yet "the rules," say the committee, "now recommended are almost identical with those of the British House of Commons." The gentleman from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] has most thoroughly answered this portion of the report. If, however, the spirit of the Constitution is not to be regarded, the inexpediency of the measure will be sufficiently apparent.

Third, as to the influence of the Executive upon the Legislature. The committee state that the object of the resolution is to influence legislation by the Executive. They would recognize that influence and give it authority. Assuming that such an influence will, does, and must exist, they propose to make it open, official, and honorable, instead of secret, unrecognized, and liable to abuse. This sort of argument would find its par value in an argument like the following: robbery in the shape of burglary will exist; it is all wrong, but it exists; let us recognize the fact, and by law make it open, honorable, and authoritative, instead of secret, nocturnal, and liable to be abused; let us authorize highway robbery as something bold and romantic. Or, prostitution exists, secret and dangerous; let us license and legalize it, and the practice, so deleterious when secret, will lose its deformity when open. Executive influence upon legislation is wrong, dangerous, and subversive of freedom; it exists, but is now covert and dangerous; let us make it open, bold, and authoritative, and it will be innocuous.

If the means were constitutional and it would dignify and purify the executive influence, I might vote for it. But I cannot see that because you increase the opportunities of executive contact with the legislature you diminish the contagion and the fatal corruption as its consequence. Because you debar the Cabinet member from a vote do you prevent his influence in the House? If you require open debate do you stop secret intrigue? Did not Walpole debate and corrupt the House? Did not the younger Pitt defy Parliament even in debate, and coerce the Commons? The whipper-in on a division, the manager of the House, were not these incident to open and authorized discussion? The Government felt more interest in the result of the vote, because it had been called directly to the bar. It stopped at no means to secure its triumph. The threats of the third George again and again to leave the island and to place those under the royal ban who voted against his measures, was the accompaniment of the fiercest wrangles of Parliament and the most open arraignment of ministers. I admit that if the influence of the Executive is desirable in our legislation, it should be open, declared, and authorized, rather than secret, concealed, and unauthorized. But this resolution facilitates the secrecy and authorizes the influence which we deprecate and should prevent.

Fourth, as to the information to be derived from the admission of the Cabinet, and the cases cited by the committee.

Two objects are sought by this measure, say the committee: first, general debate; second, information from Cabinet officers. Both are included in the second specification. If the object were only information, we have the means provided already. Conferences by committees with the Departments furnish one medium. The citations appended to the report of the committee show that this is almost always a prerequisite to the maturing of measures. In the cases cited on pages 11, 12, 13, et seq. of the report, the complaints were, not that the Departments would not furnish information or recommend measures, but that in those particular instances the information was not definite or the recommendation made in writing. But the debates in those cases showed that such information and recommendation were easily obtained. In the cases of the legal tender and gold bill, the debate brought out the letters of the Secretary of the Treasury. In the case of the loan bill, the instance cited is most unfortunate as an argument for this measure. The appearance of the Secretary and Assistant Secretary of the Treasury upon the floor of the House had the effect of subverting the judgment of the House. The gentleman from Pennsylvania had moved that the interest of the bonds should be paid in currency. It was carried by twenty-one majority. When reported to the House, lo! it was defeated 59 to 81, a change of forty-two on a question as to which the House were informed of the facts, as to which the executive officers only expressed their wish and opinion! What humiliation! No undue arguments were used; no bribe or corruption is charged. Simply their presence on the floor turned the heads of forty-two statesmen! If their casual visit and the expression of a wish without argumentation could work such wonders, what sort of a body would we become with the presence of the Cabinet here twice a week for information and at all times for debate and influence? The other instance cited is senatorial, on the bounty question. The only trouble in that case was that the chairman of the Military Committee had missed seeing the Secretary of War, and failed to possess himself of any authentic letter or recommendation of the Department. No one doubted but he might have received the information. The points were, not that the recommendation was not made, but, as Senator CLARK said, (page 17,) the information had not been asked for, and, as Senator GRIMES said, there had been no action of the Administration on the subject, or at least no unity of action. Afterward, the letter of Mr. Stanton was read, and the difficulty properly obviated.

So far, then, as the Congress require information and advice from the Departments, they can always obtain it, perhaps in over-abundance. If it come not in the graces of oratory it will come in the more pithy, and, in this age, more useful, and, in this House, indispensable, form of writing and printing. If the ordinary reports of the Departments and the answers to resolutions of inquiry are not sufficient, will not these informal interviews of members and committees with the heads of Departments answer every purpose?

If the object of the measure is information, we have the media now. If it be to influence action, that influence must be for good or evil. If for good, always and inevitably, Congress is utterly inconsequential and insignificant—a registering body, a contemptible and expensive nonentity, worse than the fifth wheel to a coach. For what, sir, is the need of Congress, if all the recommendations of the Executive are to be invariably followed? Better dispense with all legislation, or make our system conform to those cited by the committee from Europe and South America, where, except in England, (owing to peculiar circumstances hereafter considered,) the Legislature is the tool of the ministry as the ministry is too often the tool of the monarchy. If the Cabinet influence is generally good and only exceptionally vicious, we have the means already of reaching its valuable suggestions, and I do not propose to enlarge its sphere of evil. But if the influence of the Executive is generally evil, corrupting to both Cabinet and Congress, aggrandizing unduly one department of power to the detriment of another, and consequently to the derangement of our system, and if it is only occasionally good, then we are bound not only to prevent but to guard with extreme jealousy every attempt to encroach with such influence upon the province of the Legislature.

In the remarks which I have submitted, I meet the two propositions of the committee as elaborated by them: first, that Congress should avail itself of the best possible means of information in relation to measures; for do we not have at our command all that we could get by the presence of the Cabinet in the House? Second, as to the character of the influence of the Executive upon the Legislature; for have I not shown that this measure will not prevent it being secret, corruptive, or unauthorized?

Fifthly, a few words as to the argument ab inconvenienti. The committee somewhat anticipate this objection. They say (page 5) that "it has been said that the time of the Secretaries would be so engrossed that they could not attend to the discharge of their other duties. If this shall prove true, they must have more assistance." It is answer enough to appeal to members as to the condition of their own business now before the Departments. They are nearly all behind. We must have the ear of the heads of Departments; and if they are compelled to attend here, and take part in debates, what time will they have, even with the aid of the assistants we have already given, to attend to Department business? But I leave to others the elaboration of this argument. I say nothing now about their appearance and speaking here delaying our own labor. That would appropriately come under the argumentum ad misericordiam, [laughter,] for it would be intolerably irksome to have their explanations and speeches here on all questions raised.

II. I might rest the argument here. But I believe this measure is fraught with great danger. It is a step toward the absorption of the power of Congress by the Executive, and therefore a step not to be countenanced either at this time or at any other time.

On this head I consider its effect, first, on State rights. If, as I assume, this measure increases the executive influence and absorbs the legislative, it tends to aggrandize and consolidate power in the Federal Executive, and makes the array against the States much more formidable, and subtracts from them their proper influence in the economy of our Government. Some of the committee are looked upon as strong defenders of the reserved rights of the States. They look with apprehension on the encroachments of the Federal Government upon the ungranted domain of the States. It is for such that Judge Story's argument is emphatic, when he says that "the restrictions upon executive connection with the Legislature were founded in deference to State jealousy, and a sincere desire to obviate the fears, real or imaginary, that the General Government would obtain an undue preference over the State governments." The gentleman from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] has shown the views taken by the earlier statesmen, coinciding with this view of Judge Story. I need not recite them. The committee in their report seem not to have anticipated this argument; it is left for the disciples of Hamilton, like the gentleman from Vermont, to defend State rights. Surely, if you magnify and energeize the Federal Executive by an unfair aggregation of powers in that office at the expense of the Congress, you begin the work of consolidation. You give to power new material, until upon the ruins of our old system of a just distribution of power, we erect a throne of paramount power whose sovereign occupant in his supremacy would rob the States of their rights to aggrandize his own splendor. This plan, therefore, tends to create the same laws, the same kind of dependence, consequently the same notions and the same interests, throughout all the country with its diverse interests; for the power it would strengthen is the Executive, which is not like the Senate or the Congress, representative of States and localities, but in a sense more nearly representative of the people of the United States.

Second, the time is unfortunate for such a radical change as that proposed. Herein lies one of its dangers. It is a time of war. The Executive in such a time tends to enlarge its powers. This is not altogether avoidable. It then calls to its aid all the sophistry of necessity. It is the old satanic plea. With an Army of nearly a million, and a patronage of $3,000,000 per diem, and with a corps of ambitious men—placemen and contractors—hanging about the chambers of power, desirous to placate the supreme will and to enjoy its favors, it is not surprising that in time of war the dispensing power should grow colossal, overshadowing all other departments and absorbing all other sovereignties. Yet it is at such a time that the committee proposes a measure which tends to increase the Executive. I know that the committee think that its effect will be otherwise, and give as a reason that power exercised openly in Congress will find its antagonism and barrier in honest deference to public opinion, and be restrained in its own disposition to increase. But is that the effect of the exercise of power by this Executive? In the face of a most earnest protest from every press and public man who had not slavishly bowed to its behests simply because it was power; in spite of a protest of nearly two million people, the power of the President expands boldly, openly, and flagrantly. Patronage is more powerful than logic. Necessity crushes the free press and arrests free speech. Would the habeas corpus be abolished, and all the restraints of personal freedom be annulled, and our prisons groan with victims, except in time of war? The power which, in time of peace, was a toy for a lady's hand, like the tent of the faïence, enlarges in time of war so that great armies repose beneath its folds. When did the executive power in England most overshadow and defy public opinion? The Crown augmented when Pitt defied the people and their Parliament; then king and minister became absolute. The wise commentator, Thomas Erskine May, (Constitutional History, volume one, page 82,) in drawing his picture of this era of English history, draws also a conclusion similar to the one which I now declare, when he says:

"A war is generally favorable to authority by bringing together the people and the Government in a common cause and combined exertions. The French war, notwithstanding its heavy burdens and numerous failures, was popular on account of the principles it was supposed to represent; and the vast expenditure, if it distressed the people, multiplied the patronage of the Crown, afforded a rich harvest for contractors, and made the fortunes of farmers and manufacturers by raising the price of every description of produce. The 'moneyed class' rallied round the war minister. Bought seats in Parliament with their sudden gains, ranged themselves in a strong phalanx behind their leader, cheered his speeches, and voted for him on every division. Their zeal was rewarded with peerages, baronetcies, patronage, and all the good things which an inordinate expenditure enabled him to dispense. For years opposition in Parliament to a minister thus supported was an idle form; and if beyond its walls the voice of complaint was raised, the arm of the law was strong and swift to silence it. To oppose the minister had become high treason to the State."

To oppose the minister in open Parliament, in free debate, in time of war, when power found its antagonists and barriers, as it to-day finds them here, was accounted high treason! Yet, say the committee, the rules now recommended—now, in time of most gigantic war—are almost identical with those of the British House of Commons! Identical, sir, with a system which not only made war almost perpetual by filling the Legislature with placemen, pensioners, claquers, and contractors, rewarding them with peerages, baronetcies, patronage, and all the good things which come from an inordinate expenditure, but which made the Opposition a mere form in the Legislature, and stifled it with oppression when raised outside of the Legislature! Is it to this system that the committee would assimilate our own Congress? God forbid!

Third, I now consider the dangers of the intimacy between the Executive and the Legislature. If even the rights of the States were safe, and even if this were a time of peace, still I would, as a Democrat, as a Republican, never allow the Executive to approach any nearer the Legislature than is entirely consistent with the movement of each in their own well-defined circuit. As with nature, so with institutions. Of two plants in the vicinity of each other, the fruit of one will lose its peculiar flavor and be assimilated to the taste of the other, if that other have the stronger fiber, the richer nutriment, and happens to be near by. So in the stellar world the lesser luminary will, unless restrained, fly toward the greater, to be by it absorbed.

The committee truly say that the framers of the Constitution did not intend to establish an absolute separation of the legislative and executive departments. This is true. The separation is not absolute; if it were, they could not subsist in the same system; but I affirm that they endeavored by every guard to allow just as little connection between the parts as would enable the Government in its entirety to perform its functions.

The committee instance the veto power, to show that there is a connection between the law-making and law-executing departments. The argument proves too much. The veto of the President is the limit of the presidential interference, and its exercise is allowed only after the law is passed; and even then, after the Executive has exhausted his reasons for the veto, he may be overruled by a vote of two thirds. If the Executive, by his agents of the Cabinet, exert his influence in the making of laws, where is the necessity for the veto? His veto is then an absurdity. So Judge Story regards it. The veto is the Executive arm for the defense of its own powers. The Legislature is presumed to have no desire to favor them. When laws are passed by a Legislature misled by a love of power, a spirit of faction, a political impulse, or a persuasive influence, local or sectional, which may not reach the Executive, he being the representative of the whole nation in the aggregate, then the veto has its use. Says Story, page 32:

"He will have an opportunity soberly to examine the acts and resolutions passed by the Legislature, not having partaken of the feelings or combinations which have procured their passage, and thus to correct what will sometimes be wrong, from interference as well as design."

His responsibility is independent of Congress. To join his duties with law making is to destroy his responsibility and derange the proper distribution of powers. Go one step further. Suppose a law of great value passed, then vetoed; nevertheless two thirds of Congress favor it; but in come the Cabinet, and by threat, bribery, promises of patronage and gifts of honor, the legislative will is subordinated: are not the people robbed of their fair right in the Legislature? Voting is not the only way of making laws. Voting presupposes influences. Voting is but the sign of what has been done. If these influences are reached by Cabinet cajolery or honeyed blandishments from the masters of patronage and fountains of honor, the influence is not less, but rather greater, than if the Cabinet had the right to vote. Indeed, some Governments which allow the ministry to have the entrée to the Legislature expressly and strangely forbid their presence when the vote comes off. This is the case in Brazil, Costa Rica, Portugal, and Spain. But what guard is there in such cases—for the influence is exerted generally before and not at the vote? Still, even these guards show the jealousy of the Legislature against the dominating influences of the Executive even in such monarchical countries.

What, then, are the relations which the three departments of our Government sustain to each other? How are they intended to act in harmony? Mr. Madison has considered this matter in Nos. 47 and 48 of the Federalist. The distinctness and separation of the three departments is by him, as it was by Montesquieu, regarded as an essential precaution in favor of liberty. He was careful to show that the several departments of power were so distributed and blended in our system as at once to preserve symmetry and beauty of form, and to prevent any part of it from being exposed to the danger of being crushed by the disproportionate weight of other parts. He regarded the accumulation of powers, legislative, executive, and judicial, in the same hands, as the very essence of tyranny. Hence, if there is any approach toward such accumulation, my argument is that there is an approach toward tyranny. If there can be no liberty where the Legislature and Executive are one, is not liberty endangered when you absorb an essential function or feature of one by the other. Says Montesquieu:

"There can be no liberty when the legislative and executive powers are united in the same body or person, because apprehensions may arise lest the same monarch or senate may enact tyrannical laws to execute them in a tyrannical manner; or were the power of judging joined with the legislative, the life and liberty of the subjects would be exposed to arbitrary control, for the judge would then be legislator. Were it joined to the executive, the judge might have all the violence of the oppressor."

Mr. Madison draws from the several constitutions of the States as then existing, New Hampshire, Massachusetts, New York, Pennsylvania, Delaware, Maryland, Virginia, and others, to show that the several departments are inhibited from exercising the powers of either of the other departments. The language of these early constitutions yet remain in our present constitutions. Not a single State of this large Confederacy has ever in its constitution so departed from the model of the Federal Legislature as to allow the membership of the Executive, (Cushing, page 610,) or of his aids in administration, or even their presence for debate or influence. Massachusetts early declared this fundamental article of liberty:

"That the legislative department shall never exercise the executive or judicial powers, or either of them; the executive shall never exercise the legislative and judicial powers, or either of them; the judicial shall never exercise the legislative and executive powers, or either of them."

The jealousy of uniting one department with another has been carried so far that the departments have been only so far connected and blended as to give to each a constitutional control over the other. This is the degree of separation essential to a free Government. Allow this and you will have no despotic Congress with its many heads; no Congress dependent on one head; you will have no irresponsible judiciary; and no arbitrary Executive. If the Executive can use his appliances at will upon a legislature, either by intrigue or debate, then the Legislature becomes the executive tool; and although its own powers may expand yet if used by the Executive the growth of legislative privilege is the increase of the executive prerogative.

If it be proper to call the Cabinet to the lower House why should not some portion of it be called to the Senate? Is it because the model of the British constitution has carried away the committee?

If it be proper to call the Cabinet to the House, why not call in the President? We have no ministry as in England. The President is responsible, and he only. The Cabinet are but the ministers of his will. He can dismiss them at pleasure. They have no policy.

If it be proper to call the Cabinet, why not the Commander-in-Chief? Why not summon General Grant to sit here, and to answer the inquiries of civilians in search of military news and strategy? Why not? For the reason that all military officers are kept without the Senate-house. Because they are the hands of the Executive, and liberty permits no brute force to overawe or dictate. If the Commander of the Army is the mailed hand of the Executive, is not the Secretary of State also his hand gloved in silk? And is there more danger from the iron hand than the silken glove?

But if it be proper to call in the Cabinet, why not call in the Supreme Court, or its chief? Do the committee wish to copy the British precedent, where the law lords can advise, though they do not vote with the legislator? Why not then admit the Chief Justice? Ask him of the legality of confiscation, legal tender, belligerency, and the new questions which this civil war is causing? The committee refer us, with a smile, no doubt, from its complaisant chairman, to Hayti for our guidance. [Laughter] That precedent was intended, for the other side of the House. I accept it in all earnestness. In Hayti the secretary of state and the grand judge are by the constitution the orators charged with representing the executive by oral communication to both houses. Why not send for Mr. Chase, along with Mr. Seward, and here let them struggle for the next Presidency before the people's Representatives?

The committee inform us that if the rules be defective, or limit too narrowly the right of a debate, changes can hereafter be made. They take the British House of Commons for their model, and they assert that the "rules now recommended are almost identical." If that be the case, the changes should involve an entirely new system of accountability among the departments of our Government. Indeed, our form of government will need a radical change. Judge Story says (Commentaries, page 329) that "The whole structure of our Government is so entirely different, and the elements of which it is composed are so dissimilar from that of England, that no argument can be drawn from the practice of the latter to assist us in a just arrangement of the executive authority."

In England one branch of Parliament, the Commons, is ostensibly supreme. If not corrupted or made dependent on the Crown by intimidation, it is the ruling power of the realm. Though the Crown may appoint the ministry, it is the Parliament which dothrones them by a vote "of want of confidence." There is no responsibility for any act of administration upon the Crown. The sanctity of the Crown forbids it to be wrong. Ministers are toppled over, but the throne remains; hence the real power, if not corrupted, over the executive is in the Commons. The ministry is the fountain of honor and patronage in fact, though the Crown may be in name; hence the putrescent corruptions which have made the history of English legislation so infamous. Not so in this country. We have no ministry here, no premier. The Cabinet have power and do advise the President, but he, and not Congress, can alone displace them. Hence in our system the President has the power of the Crown and the ministry both, and is above the reach of the Commons or the Congress.

In England the queen only has the power to name the ministry; the Parliament has the power to direct its policy and compel its resignation; yet this measure would enhance the power of the President, making him not only king and ministry, but potential in the Legislature. Add to this his power to appoint judges, and the tendency is to unite all functions in one, which, as I have said, is the definition of tyranny. If the committee would then assimilate our practice to English rules, let them alter the Constitution, and require the Cabinet to be responsible to Congress, and the President and his Cabinet to abdicate when his policy is condemned. When you do this you change the very essence of our Government.

The President represents the aggregate people; Congress represents States in the Senate and the people of the States in the House. He is elected for four years. We take him for better or for worse. We may have a Congress in opposition to his policy for four years; and nothing we can do will prevent it, unless we by usurpation and by a corrupt judiciary trench on his powers, or he, by intrigue and usurpation and obsequious judges, is enabled to rob Congress of its powers. He may appoint judges, veto laws; that is the limit of his control over the Legislature and the judiciary. If his agents approach the fountain, and there at its source endeavor to influence the making of law, he becomes an intermeddler. Whether he does this by his military force or his cunning management, it amounts to the same thing. Wisely, therefore, our fathers, looking on English history at a time when a corrupt and imbecile ministry were illustrating how easy it was for a stubborn king to rule a subservient Parliament by the presence of a great minister or a strong will, forbade the membership of the Administration in the House, and for a stronger reason should have forbidden their presence there. They saw, as an old writer says, "the king and his council (Craftsman, No. 440) by means of liveries and retainers, bring the whole kingdom to be of his livery;" or, as Lord Bolingbroke said to Walpole, they made the Parliament like slaves in a galley, united by their chains and tugging the oar together at the sound of the ministerial whistle. Seeing this in England, as the very cause of their own troubles with the parent country, they were jealous of such influences here. They may not have distrusted the first Presidents; but they would not allow an opportunity for the invasion of their own privileges or the public liberties. It was not the attack they feared from the first Executives which led them to keep the administration aloof from the Legislature, but they would not allow the breach, however small, in the rampart, through which an attack at some time might be made.

This principle, together with the English practice, leads me, Mr. Speaker, to be jealous of our privileges and powers. Indeed, sir, I am not particularly enamored of anything English now. I do not like English delight over our troubles; English cannon when found in Fort Fisher; English ships-of-war destroying our commerce under a hostile flag; English recognition of belligerency. All that is admirable in the English manners, literature, and laws I love and cherish, but this system of the committee is neither admirable or desirable.

If there is one feature in English history more marked than another, it is the constant conflict for centuries between the kingly prerogative and the parliamentary privilege. In the earlier times of the Plantagenets the motto obtained, that to be royal is to be loyal; the will of the king to be the will of the law: "Que veut le roy, ce veut la loy." And although under the earlier kings, especially those most destitute of principle, the liberty of the people in the Parliament received its most efficacious support; although Magna Charta came in John's rule, and Habeas Corpus in the time of the second Charles, yet the royal prerogatives were broken by their inordinate strain by such monarchs, and liberty gained. It was enough for the king to be the fountain of honor and patronage, of pardon and power, generalissimo of the army, and source of all foreign embassies and treaty. The Commons, therefore, in early times, united with the people and nobility against the power of the Crown; and from having been called from boroughs and towns originally to provide only for the wants of the king, (De Lolme, volume second, page 511,) they became so powerful that ministers fell before their votes and voice. Upon their fiat hung the lives even of the ministers. The king himself was supposed by a fiction always to be present, really or by representatives; and even he was made liable, on a memorable occasion, to the power of the Commons by impeachment and death. But at last the popular element by the Revolution of 1688 became paramount. At least then began the struggle, which, after great convulsions, fixed the Crown, through the ministers as the instruments of the Parliament, and amenable to them. But this cannot be so in this Government, for the simple reason that the Congress has no control over the Cabinet. The extent and duration of the Executive, as to time and power, is clearly defined in a written constitution. Therefore no analogy can be drawn from English precedents, except those which show how power tends to increase in the Executive or ministry whenever it has the opportunity to use its appliances, or which show that the temptation to corruption is apt to be embraced when the object is near and the lure enticing. In illustrating this part of my argument, my only embarrassment is in the opulence of the illustrations from English history.

I do not select a few cases because they are so glaring. Nor do I value in an argument a few exceptional cases; non ego paucis offendar maculis. From the very beginning of the English Government until now, laws were passed to regulate elections and prevent the kingly influence upon the Commons. In the time of the Lancaster kings such statutes are common. "What else," asks Bolingbroke, (Craftsman, No. 440) "do all these resolutions, declarations, and acts mean from the time of Richard II to these days, against the influence of the Crown on the elections or on the members of Parliament?" He answers it by saying that a prince may govern according to his arbitrary will, or that of his more arbitrary minister, as absolutely and much more securely with than without the concurrence of a Parliament. He can do this in two ways: first, by the strain of his prerogative, or by the corruption of the Commons; and the instrument for both means, as shown by English history, has been an obsequious, audacious, or corrupt ministry sitting in Parliament. In the earlier eras of English Parliaments the stretch of the prerogative was the means used to overawe Parliaments. Not alone by the threat upon members, but by acts of imprisonment and decapitation; not alone by the threat but by the act of dishonor and sequestration, were the annals of Parliament sullied. In later times, after the Revolution of 1688, the civil list had increased, and with it the means of corruption; and not alone by indirect bribes in stocks, lotteries, pensions, places, and honors, but by a wanton lavishness of douceurs, directly given to members, the German princes on the English throne, and their ministers, controlled the Commons. This corruption extended then, as it does now, from the House to the hustings, from the Parliament to the people, until the English Parliament reeked, and in spite of all reform bills and bribery acts yet reeks, with the astounding rottenness of its representatives and electors. The only reason why in earlier times, as in the sixteenth century this same corruption did not exist is given by Hallam, (volume three, page 43,) that there did not then exist the means of that splendid corruption which has emulated the Crassi and Luculli of Rome. Whereas in 1571, a member bought his seat for Westbury for £4, an election in York in the eighteenth century cost £150,000! The elections were controlled by the officers of the Government. It became necessary, to save the constitution, to reform these abuses, and the English statute-book groans with laws against placemen sitting in Parliament, against revenue officers having the right of suffrage, the disfranchisement of boroughs, and penalty on members for bribery.

The Revolution of 1688 prevented the destruction of the English system by the use of the prerogative. It declared against making kings independent of Parliaments by prerogative, but it substituted therefor a system which made Parliaments dependent on kings by corruption. Which was the easiest mode to destroy, it is not for us to ask at a time when the executive influence not only has been exceeding its constitutional limit in this country, but when the means of corruption are as a thousand to one in this country compared with England. Indeed, in the time of Walpole it was contended that the Parliament should corruptly depend on the Crown as the expedient to supply the want of power denied to the Crown by the Revolution. Even so good a moralist as Paley justified the use of patronage to influence Parliament.

In glancing at this history I will arrange a few salient illustrations under these heads: first, the attempts by executive intimidation and power to overawe the Commons; second, by corruption of the people and of the Commons to create a dependency on their part upon the Crown. First, most of the valuable privileges enjoyed by the House of Commons is due, not to the presence of the ministry, nor to the monarchical part of the constitution, but to the vigilant perseverance of tribunes of the people in spite of all the threats and penalties of the Crown. As early as Edward III it was customary to imprison members for freedom of speech; but this, like other grievances, was redressed in time, not because the ministry were present to aid, but because the Commons protested, and accompanied their protests with intimations that if their protests were not heeded, supplies to the king would be wanting.

The first English council was the Witenagemote. It lost its place in the Government by the ambition of the monarch, who designed to make all his vassals, and none his equals, in the powers of the State. After the king began to need military service and taxation he called his Parliament, but used and disused them at pleasure. They were slavishly submissive. When the Tudors ascended to the throne the contest began which has ended, in this reign of Queen Victoria, in the subordination of nearly all executive power to the ministry, or the Parliament, which can upturn the ministry. Henry VIII occasionally used his Parliaments, but used them through the personal interference of Cardinal Wolsey in the House of Commons. (Smythe, vol. 1, p. 345.) His son, Edward VI, by the influence of a bad minister seeking control of Parliament, issued a proclamation to influence members of Parliament; a precedent followed afterward by Mary and by James I, and which in this country, if the Executive were more nearly connected with Congress, would follow every two years, and certainly every four years, especially in time of civil war.

Then followed Elizabeth's reign. Great men adorned her court; but around her crouched a submissive Parliament. They were her knights, and not her statesmen. She had her ministry subservient to her female caprices; and they "touched" her Parliament, and it bowed as to an oriental princess. It is a relief to find, what we so rarely find in our own times among the Puritans here, that old Puritan parliamentarian, Peter Wentworth, standing out of this gloom by his conspicuous intrepidity—the forerunner of the Hampdens and Pym of a later day. When Elizabeth strove to stop legislation by the queen's pleasure, on religious matters, he spoke as follows:

"We are assembled to make, or abrogate, such laws as may be the chiefest surety, safe-keeping, and enrichment of this noble realm of England. I do think it expedient to open the commodities (advantages) that grow to the prince and the whole State by free speech used in this place."

This he proceeded to do on seven different grounds; and he concluded:

"That in this House, which is termed a place of free speech, there is nothing so necessary for the preservation of the prince and State as free speech; and without this, it is a scorn and mockery to call it a Parliament-house, for in truth it is none, but a very school of flattery and dissimulation, and so a fit place to serve the devil and his angels in, and not to glorify God and to benefit the Commonwealth."

The House, it seems, out of a reverent regard to her Majesty's honor, stopped him before he had fully finished; and "he was sequestered the House for the said speech." Finally he was sent to prison; but we read of him, years afterward, questioning with rare courage the dispensing power which lost James II his crown, and should have lost Mr. Lincoln his election. It was true of this and subsequent reigns, as Dr. Burnet recorded, that he that will go about to debate her Majesty's prerogative, had "need walk warily."

The reign of the Stuarts is an era of conflicts, signalized by the State craft of the kings, and the protests of the Commons. The first Stuart, James I, had invaded even the presence of the House, sent its members to the Tower, and contemplated the beheading of others. He had even torn their proceedings from the journals. Prerogative went so far that in the time of the first Charles no Parliament met for twelve years. Irregular levies of money and men, and the severities of the Star Chamber and High Commission, drove the people to exile in America, and to despair of their liberties. These institutions were the subservient Parliaments of the time—all their members being the tools of tyranny. At last a minister proposed the ship-money tax. Hampden opposed; then came the reaction and the revolution. The Parliament conquered; only to be in turn driven from their places by the Protector, because their debates were disagreeable. When the Restoration came, the "healing Parliament" met; and the king was their suitor, but not long a suitor. His ministers were in Parliament. The republican element was weeded out. It would have been worse, but that the profusion of Charles II in his pleasures was so great that "no minister could find sums sufficient to buy a Parliament." He stood, therefore, on his prerogative, strained as far as he durst, and made all the use of it he could." (Craftsman, No. 442.) He even depended on foreign gold to bribe his Parliament and pamper his mistresses. The House continued eighteen years, a large number of members practiced on, and a large number notoriously bribed. When a new Parliament was called their disposition was so sordid, and the flatteries around the throne so detestable that the English historian blushes as he records their slavish submission. Russell and Sydney shine out of this time only by the halo around their martyr-brows. When Charles died his brother, James II, added to this corruption another strain of the prerogative, and a degree of bigotry which was wholly his own. The Parliament of his time had been managed, both at their election and when they met; and so successfully managed, that when James looked over the list of returns he declared there were not more than forty names which he could have wished not there. It sat a year. A few brave words from Coke of Derby, and he was sent to the Tower for undutiful reflection on the king. Then came another reaction. It was sudden, and the Revolution of 1688 was accomplished.

From that time the influence of the Crown upon the Parliament has been most apparent and deleterious by their corrupt dependency on each other. One of the first grievances to be remedied by the new dynasty was the purification of the Commons. A place bill was brought in. By it all members of the House of Commons were incapacitated from holding places of trust and profit. This was the model of our constitutional clause. It was passed in England finally, but rejected by the king's veto. Mr. Hallam (volume three, page 187) says:

"The baneful system of rendering the Parliament subservient to the administration, either by offices and pensions held at pleasure, or by more clandestine corruption, had not ceased with the house of Stuart. William, not long after his accession, fell into the worst part of this management, which it was difficult to prevent, and, according to the practice of Charles's reign, induced by secret bribes the leaders of parliamentary opposition to betray their cause on particular questions."

Secret-service money was proved to have been used among members. Hallam enumerates the facts, and from them it will appear why, even after the place bill failed, a check was still put upon the number and quality of placemen in the lower House. The proper remedy then was the banishment, as our American ancestors provided, of all the servants of the Executive from the legislative councils of the nation. One thing, however, they did establish. In 1694 the board of revenue were incapacitated from sitting in the House. In 1699 the law was extended. In 1700, by the act of settlement, all officers were excluded. In 1706 the law was repealed, and but for this repeal England to-day would exclude the cabinet altogether; but she preserved the principle and limited its extension.

One provision she did establish, which to-day operates against an overwhelming influence of the ministry. (Hallam, volume three, page 191.) Every member accepting an office must vacate and a new election must be had. She excluded pensioners. These provisions, says De Lolme, (volume one, page 476, &c.,) originated from the continued corruption of Parliament. An "act of security" limiting the number of persons in office eligible to Parliament was enacted. I refer to these precautions in favor of liberty now as the argument against the present measure. What was reasonable then is, so long as human nature remains the same, reasonable now. As De Lolme writes:

"It is impossible to question the policy of these enactments, for, as Algernon Sydney observes, 'Men are naturally prone to corruption; and if he whose will and interest it is to corrupt them be furnished with the means, he will never fail to do it. Power, honors, riches, and the pleasures that attend them, are the baits by which men are drawn to prefer a personal interest before the public good; and the number of those who covet them is so great that he who abounds in them will be able to gain so many to his service as shall be sufficient to subdue the rest. It is hard to find a tyranny in the world that has not been introduced in this way.' In truth, he who has tasted the sweets of dishonest and clandestine lucre would, in the words of the poet, be no more capable afterward of abstaining from it than a dog from his greasy offal."

Notwithstanding all these precautions, so long as the ministry remained in the Commons, Parliament was paramount. In the time of Anne, in 1712, bills were again brought in still further limiting the number of officers of Government who could sit in Parliament. Fifty was proposed. Even that number failed in the House of Lords. The principle of preserving the influence of the Crown unhappily prevailed. The same arguments now used for this bill were used then. The same indifference to personal probity and political integrity are observable. Well might Queen Anne, therefore, dissolve one of her Parliaments, declaring it was her pleasure to admit of no debate. Out of this right arose the golden dawn of Walpole! The forecast of the wise statesmen of England had been exerted in vain. In vain had place bills been again tried; in vain were elections contested for bribery; in vain were motions to retrench pensions. George II denounced all such bills as "villainous;" and his ministry did not scruple to send Tories to the Tower for contumacious debate. A bishop declared that an independent House of Commons was as inconsistent as an independent king. Truly was it exemplified. For the two powers became dependent on each other, made so by the golden mean of the minister who so long held his tainted sway. Doubtless Walpole had his amiable qualities. Some one says he would have been held worthy of his high station had he never possessed it. The lines applied to him are well known:

"Seen him I have, but in his happier hour
Of social converse, ill exchanged for power;
Seen him, uncumbered by the venal tribe,
Smile without art, and win without a bribe."

Doubtless he used the arts of persuasion. His continuance in power is attributable not a little to this resource, but mostly to his mercenary management. He arose from personal merit. He managed the king as well as the Commons. Places, pensions, bribes, were profusely strewn along the aisles of St. Stephen's; and though partially hidden from the eyes of contemporaries by the burning of the papers of the minister, yet as Smollett reveals, (volume two, page 311,) the guilty minister quarreling with a confederate, Mr. Stanhope, revealed their practice of selling places and reversions. A member standing up said, "Since they had by mischance discovered their nakedness, the other members ought, according to the custom of the East, to turn their backs upon them." In his History, Mr. May (page 300) says that the majority of the House of Commons was long retained in subjection to the minister by an organized system of corruption.

This system was continued until the reign of George II; and Lord Bute secured the aid of Walpole's agent to keep up the management of the Commons during the early part of the reign of George III. The war with America never would have been undertaken or upheld but for the purchase of Parliament by Lord North. Shops were opened for members. Some years £41,000 of the secret service were used to purchase votes. Stock-jobbing and lotteries were substituted for direct bribes. Not until Mr. Pitt came into office was there a stop put on these infamies, and then only for a time. Contractors, nabobs, gold—these are the words upon which the changes were rung by Burke and others pleading for reform in the English Parliament. But Parliament strove in vain; the age was corrupted by war and avarice; it was a time

"When infamous Venality, grown bold, Wrote on its bosom, To be let or sold."

It was from this source that good men predicted the ruin of English liberty. Montesquieu said, "Il périra lorsque la puissance législative sera plus corrompue que l'exécutive." But for the restraints of the press gradually freeing itself from the toils of the time, and the public opinion which was enfranchised by the French Revolution, the admission of the public to the Commons, and the publicity of the debates, the English constitution would either have been destroyed or revolution would have changed its features into something like our own. Of all the instruments of despotism a paid Parliament is the worst, just as the corruption of the best things are the worst. "Tyranny," said Sydney Smith, speaking of this time, "is worst where a majority of a popular assembly are hired, and a few bold and able men by their brave speeches make the people believe they are free." The secret influence of the Crown was at work through the influence of the younger Pittall through the French wars, and was sapping by its corruption the foundation of English liberty. From that time till the last reform bill of 1860 efforts have been made to lessen the corruption and bribery of the English elections and Parliaments, but in vain. So long as men are moved by their interests, so long will places, honors, emoluments, contracts, and power feed the servile horde of mercenaries who will buy out of the labor of the oppressed and tax-ridden people the very offices of legislation to prostitute them to power.

I do not detain the House with the specific modes by which the Crown or the ministry have ruled England through a subordinated Parliament. Sometimes they made the Speaker; sometimes shut the Opposition members in the Tower; sometimes the king himself, as George III at Portsmouth, interfered to secure the election of his friends; sometimes the list of court favorites was foisted in upon boroughs against the will of the people, as in Wilkes's case; sometimes, as in the case of Colonels Barré and A'Court, officers were deprived of their commands for their votes in Parliament against taxing America. Lord Shelburne was dismissed from his office as aid-de-camp to his Majesty, Mr. Fitzherbert from the Board of Trade, and General Conway from his office of Groom of the Bedchamber, for the same reason. James I had committed Sir Edwin Sandys as Charles I had committed Selden and others to prison, and the Georges had punished all prominent opponents so far as they could for their conduct in Parliament. Everywhere in English politics do we find not only open but secret interior cabinet influences at work to assail the Parliament and assist the monarch. Even Lord Chatham bowed so low to the king that he lost the dignity of his character in his obeisance, while he shed tears at the kindness of the king in making him the lord which killed his influence. In the time of George III the king staked his personal credit upon the success of his measures, and regarded opposition to his ministers as an act of disloyalty, and their defeat as an affront to himself. (May, 49.) During this reign, when England lost so much, Lord North supported the king against the aristocracy, the Parliament against the people; and the nation against the colonies. It was this influence which Mr. Burke called "the perennial spring of all prodigality and of all disorder; which loads us with millions of debt; which takes vigor from our arms, wisdom from our councils, and every shadow of authority and credit from the most venerable parts of our constitution." Complaints of this influence did not stop with the death or insanity of George III. England learned nothing. In the subsequent reign of George IV Mr. Brougham denounced the same influences of the Crown. To it may justly be attributed the long discussions year after year as to reforms and Catholic emancipation, which in our system would never have been patiently listened to for a day. Upon the accession of Victoria the same jealousy was apparent. Sir Robert Peel would not take office or form a ministry until the ladies of the queen's bedchamber were dismissed!

But why enumerate these disgraceful conflicts, happily unknown to our system? We have as yet no corrupt civil lists, no patronage to influence our Congresses directly, no inordinate expenditure to satisfy the greed of placemen; no placemen in Congress who, having bought their places, are ready to sell their votes; no letters of Washington, Adams, or Jackson are exhumed like that of the English king, who wrote, "If the Duke requires some gold pills for the election, it would be wrong not to satisfy him;" no disgraceful traffic in boroughs; no "nabobs, commissaries, or West Indians" here to buy places with their shoddy wealth, and sell their votes for rank.

But these may come. In these times, when wealth springs so suddenly from a hundred sources; when contractors, lobbies, speculators, stock-jobbers, and millionaires are making the abyss so wide between the rich and poor; when even the old lean earth has become as round as an alderman, and as oozy of oil, [laughter.] may we not expect a mercenary Legislature who will follow the executive drum when it beats to quarters, even in this Hall?

But is it answered that Congress, like Parliament, holds the power of impeachment and the purse strings? England, too, boasted of this for her Commons; but impeachment has been rare in England—only two cases since the Revolution, and these not of ministers, though the corruption has been notorious. The ministers protected themselves against corruption by their presence and their patronage. In America we have had little corruption of our Cabinet, because there has been no contact of or responsibility to Congress, and no occasion for its exercise of impeachment.

But am I told that the Commons have a veto on the Crown by the vote on supplies? There is not a case since the Revolution, or at least but one or two, where the Commons have failed to grant just what ministers asked. (May, page 441.) They have acquiesced in all demands. Since they have controlled the finances the expenditure has increased fifty fold, and a stupendous national debt. The people have ground to complain of their stewardship, but the Crown and its ministers have not.

It will be so here invariably when the heads of Departments are invited to our Halls. The subversy will be greater, inasmuch as our expenditure is so unexampled, and the civil war has so aroused party feelings. When that time comes, we should so amend this measure, as it was suggested by Bolingbroke in the time of Walpole, that all members, whose relatives had been preferred, or who had sold their votes, should be distinguished by some outward token, that the galleries might note them, as you may know a horse to be sold by a colored ribbon on his bridle.

The committee would assimilate our system with that of England. Let them not be backward, but go to the full length of the precedent. An attempt was made to copy the English custom and to remove our desks some few years ago. It was tried, and failed, because the body could not make themselves used to the change. Why not, at the same time, have our Speaker dressed after the fashion of the English Speaker, in a silken gown and a horse-hair wig? I would be willing to give my mileage in the next Congress [laughter] if you, Mr. Speaker, would be willing to be thus tricked out. [Laughter.] Why not also have our Sergeant-at-Arms, Doorkeepers, and assistants dressed in black tights and knee-buckles sworded and belted with authority? Why not have the members sit with heads covered, except when rising to debate? (Barclay's Digest, page 78.) Why not introduce the peculiar exercises by which jubilant or impatient members are wont in the English Parliament to greet the speakers whom they like or dislike? Our rules, as collated by Mr. Barclay, or rather in the Manual of Jefferson, (Barclay, page 75,) seem to point to some such diversions which the committee have overlooked:

"Nevertheless, if a member finds that it is not the inclination of the House to hear him, and that, by conversation, or any other noise, [laughter,] they endeavor to drown his voice, it is the most prudent way to submit to the pleasure of the House and sit down; for it scarcely ever happens that they are guilty of this place of ill manners [laughter] without sufficient reason."

The utility of such performances would be apparent as a relief from the tedium of a Cabinet disquisition or a lecture from the throne through the Secretary of State. It is recorded in Cobbett's Parliamentary History, in Elizabeth's time, when an arrogant ministry demanded subsidies of the Commons, that "an obsequious sergeant Hyle, said, 'I marvel much that the House will stand upon granting a subsidy, when all we have is her Majesty's,' at which the House hemmed, laughed, and talked." So that there was in England a remedy against ministerial arrogance in the boisterous clamor of the Commons. This system was brought to the highest refinement in these later days when I have seen in Parliament scenes of indecorum that would utterly startle any one but a Disraeli or a Peel from their propriety. Dr. Warren, in that authentic record of Titmouse's exertions when elected to Parliament, has happily illustrated the English system. That person so long kept down by modesty, the twin sister of merit, brought into requisition some of his early accomplishments, and attained a sudden distinction. He had been accustomed, when a haberdasher's clerk, to imitate the cries of cats, the squeaking of pigs, the braying of donkeys, and the yelping of curs, and the crowing of cocks. [Laughter.] The biographer, in referring to these elements of his genius, says:

"He could imitate a blue-bottle fly buzzing about the window, and, lighting upon it, abruptly cease its little noise, and anon flying off again, as suddenly resume it; a chicken, peering and picking its way cautiously among the growing cabbages; a cat, at midnight on the moonlit tiles, pouring forth the sorrows of her heart on account of the absence of her inconstant mate; a cock, suddenly waking out of some horrid dream, (it might be the nightmare,) and, in the ecstasy of its fright, crowing as though it would split at once its throat and heart, alarming all mankind; a little cur, yelping with mingled fear and rage, at the same time, as it were, advancing backward, in view of a fendish tom-cat with high-curved back, flaming eyes, and spitting fury."

It was upon a certain night when the ministry had a pitched battle with the Opposition that the opportunity came for the display of these qualities. The debate waxed hot and personal. The leader of the Opposition was replying to a minister. It was as if my friend before me was excoriating the War minister for his arbitrary arrests. [Laughter.] Vehement and tumultuous cheers burst forth in answer to his eloquent denunciations. The ministry sat pale and anxious. Closing his recapitulation of points with frantic energy, he exclaimed:

"And now, sir, does the noble lord opposite talk of impeachment? I ask him in the face of this House, and of the whole country, whose eyes are fixed upon it with anxiety and agitation, will he presume to repeat his threat, or will any one on his behalf? Sir, I pause for a reply."

And he did pause, several seconds elapsing in dead silence, when presently a most astounding and unprecedented sound of "cock-a-doodle-do-o-o" [great laughter] issued, with inimitable fidelity of tone and manner, from immediately behind Lord Bulfinch, who sprang from his seat as if he had been shot. Every one started.

Thus a ministry was saved. [Laughter.] Political importance, never vouchsafed to eloquence, followed this timely expression. The member became famous; English parliamentary history received an example which our committee would do well to consider in the future perfection of this English system reported by them!

During the debate of yesterday, Mr. Speaker, I cannot but think, after the splendid speech of my friend from New York, [Mr. Brooks,] in defense of his privilege, he had the right to crow his "cock-a-doodle-do-o." [Laughter.] Or perhaps the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. INGERSOLL,] after his splendid defense of General Grant, [laughter,] was entitled to practice the same art of statesmanship. [Laughter.] I might have called on the venerable member from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS,] after his good-natured reply [laughter] to my friend from New York, [Mr. Brooks,] to give us an exulting crow over his success!

Were I possessed of such an accomplishment, sir, I would use it to usher in, with the notes of chanticleer, a better dawn for our country!

But, sir, these are arguments rather ad absurdum. Still, if we are to begin on the English model, where are we to stop?

Let the committee, therefore, assimilate our system altogether to that of England. See how it will work practically without a change of the Constitution; without the Cabinet responsible to Congress; without their being either elected when appointed, or resigning to be reelected when they take office. Place them here in our midst. Make a ministerial bench across the way. Remove, as was done a few years ago, these desks. Allow the members to be seated as in St. Stephen's or in the new Houses on the Thames. Let me make the picture—a Cabinet picture for the committee. Of course the heads of committees should sit by the side of the heads of Departments. My colleague [Mr. H. W. DAVIS] on the Foreign Affairs would occupy a seat by the side of Mr. Seward. The one represents Maximilian, the other Juarez, but no matter. Lovingly they sit. The chairman moves to impugn the statesmanship of the Foreign Secretary. The Houses sustain the committee. Mr. Seward complacently smiles at the brutum fulmen, and sends his minister to Mexico to recognize the empire! The Secretary of the Treasury is seated between the gentleman from Pennsylvania and the gentleman from Vermont. In comes the venerable Secretary of the Navy. Neptune with his grave beard and trident is not more solemn, rising from his saline couch. [Laughter.] The Secretary of the Interior! Around him gather the Indian, Land, and District Committees. The Attorney and Postmaster General, both new as to the House, urbane and tremulous, yet confident that no mistakes of theirs can be reached by congressional action. The House is opened—then is solemnized by prayer to the Inscrutable Essence whom it is our privilege to worship under the poetic piety of an accomplished Chaplain. [Laughter.] The Journal is read! The Speaker raises his gavel, when a rumble, like the Temblor which precedes the earthquake in volcanic regions, sounds through the corridors! All eyes are fixed upon the door! Voilà! the thundering Secretary of War appears! [Great laughter.] Upon his brow the very feature of Mars, to threaten and command! Room for the War minister! His flowing beard and spectacled face, so familiar to our eyes

"Assume the god, affect the nod,
And seem to shake the spheres!"

[Laughter.]

What to him are the princes of Begum, referred to yesterday in debate! What the princes of Lahore, with their Koh-i-noors? A whole casket lies in his glance; for is he not the dispenser of $500,000,000 a year? [Laughter.] What to him the civil list of George III, which the Speaker Norton told the king was great beyond example? Millions hang upon his smile, where only thousands hung upon the smiles of the proud monarchs of England! What to him are the satrapies of the Indies? Whole hecatombs of greenbacks daily are sacrificed by his order! In plain attire, but potent mood, he comes! Far off his coming shines; in form and seeming buta man, but in imagination like the angel of the pit, floating many a rood on the burning marl of war! About him herd thousands of slaughtered beef. [Laughter.] Around him throng millions of tons of forage; guns and wagons, horses and mules—an innumerable host, too great for the contracted mind of man; and from his brow hang bounties for millions, and honors for all! Before him fall, as before an oriental throne, the prostrate House. In vain the Speaker calls to order! In vain the Sergeant-at-Arms brandishes the mace! Our symbol falls before the golden wand of this magician of war! At length he, too, deigns to sit. He is flanked by my military colleagues, [Messrs. SCHENCK and GARFIELD,] and the House is ready with their questions! Rare diversion here, Mr. Speaker. The record provided by the Clerk is produced. My colleague, [Mr. SCHENCK,] or rather my colleague, [Mr. GARFIELD,] with that sense of military skill and courage for which he is so distinguished, is the first to rise to inquire of the War minister, and not without embarrassment. The House is breathless as he asks—what? Whether the blowing out of the bulkhead of the Dutch Gap canal by Butler has seriously affected the backbone of the rebellion? [Laughter.] If ay, how many veterans are demolished; and after conference with the Naval Committee, whether the canal, in case of a tempestuous sea, is navigable for double-enders; and whether they cannot go either way therein without turning round? [Laughter.]

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURN] would call up the head of the Treasury and ask whether it would be best to tax the whisky drank in the last century, with a view to assist Legislatures of States to a patriotic choice of Senators, [laughter,] and if so, what amount should be levied on the spirits of '76? [Laughter.] The chairman of the Ways and Means—ever ready to defend his positions—would inquire, with the gravity of Pluto's iron countenance, whether it would not be wise to enact a law punishing with death all who might sell peanuts and putty on any other than a gold basis. [Laughter.] A chorus of voices would inquire whether the Treasury could not so interpret the five per cent. income tax as to relieve members recently defeated from all tax upon their mileage in the next Congress. [Laughter.]

Then the venerable Secretary of the Navy would be put to his catechism. A member from Massachusetts would inquire what effect the payment of codfish bounties, as a nursery for our seamen, would have upon the navigation of the iron-clads. [Laughter.] I might be tempted myself to ask of the same venerable master of the trident whether the Abyssinian was used by Cleopatra in her naval service; if so, were they at the battle of the Nile; and "were they there all the while." [Laughter.] If so, what Pompey thought of it. [Laughter.]

But the gentleman from Vermont, ever alive to the interests of New England, [Mr. MORRILL,] would inquire triumphantly of Mr. Fessenden whether the tariff should not be so amended as to increase the duty on dyestuffs and paper, so that, on a future issue of $17,000,000,000 of greenbacks, the tariff will be prohibitory, the prices raised, and a satisfactory deficiency be produced in our revenues. [Laughter.] Or whether, by raising the price of dyestuffs and paper, the value of greenbacks in the market might not be made equal to the cost of their manufacture? [Laughter.] But what a stunning blow would be given by a Democratic member, who, rising solemnly, should inquire of the War Department what protection, in case of foreign war, is afforded by the manning of Forts Warren and La Fayette by their present loyal force; if so, how many are there at this time; how long have they been there, and with what prospect of relief. [Laughter.] I think my friend from Maryland [Mr. HARRIS] would ask that question. [Laughter.]

Nor should the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN,] the most useful member of this House, ever faithful to the soldier, be omitted from the programme. What, with crushing results, could he inquire of Mr. Stanton, what effect our Democratic efforts here to increase the pay of the soldiers has had on the recent elections. And if not, why not? [Laughter.] Perhaps this, too, interests my colleague in front, [Mr. PENDLETON,] who took some interest in soldier's pay and the last election. [Laughter.] Or, rising to the innocent sublime, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GRINNELL] should ask the Navy Department—

Mr. EDGERTON. What gentleman from Iowa does the gentleman mean?

Mr. COX. My pastoral friend. [Great laughter.]

Mr. GRINNELL. I simply wish to ask the gentleman from Ohio whether he proposes to revive the church-partnership movement in the State of Ohio.

Mr. COX. I have no doubt the question put by the gentleman from Iowa is very appropriate, and that it should have been addressed to one of the Cabinet ministers; but I did not hear it. [Laughter.]

Mr. GRINNELL. I am opposed to the admission of Cabinet ministers.

Mr. COX. I know you are opposed to it; but if they should come in you would probably like to ask a question about the sheep business. You would naturally, perhaps, ask the question of the Secretary of the Navy, Mr. Welles, whether or not the Argonautic expedition of Admiral Jason would have had any effect, in case the Golden Fleece had been captured in Australia, either on the gold market or the price of wool. [Laughter.]

I present these fanciful questions as an argumentum ad absurdum. If such questions were put by the veterans of the House, what might we not expect from the awkward squad? [Laughter.] One thing only they are designed to show: that, ridiculous as they seem, they are not more ridiculous than the questions of the English parliamentarians, which are invariably laughed at or avoided. These illustrations of the abuse of the legislative by the executive power are drawn from a country where the Government is parliamentary, and the responsibility ministerial. In our country the Government and responsibility are distributed between the Executive and the Legislature, and there is no such thing as a ministerial responsibility. The Executive is responsible to the people, on the expiration of his term of office, and no responsibility exists to the people or to the Congress which can, before that time, remove him. But enough is shown to conclude that if the Executive by its Cabinet were in contact with the Legislature, the people would lose, through the aggressions of power and the persuasions of corruption, their share of the Government, and the Legislature, representative of their interests, would become the pliant instrument of the Executive. The democratic element of our institutions would be expunged, and the power which in England reached Parliaments and people to corrupt and enslave would here be used for the same purpose.

The Executive here is not above the motives which have swayed men in high office in other times. There is a constant tendency in the Executive to enlarge his power. The princes of antiquity used to deify themselves. Even the English kings "surrounded their persons with the jus divinum." We find in democratic America a perpetual ascription of glory to power. Even in this House I have heard members say "Adopt this policy, because our rulers have ordained it." Indeed, the committee in this report have transfixed several members of this House on this point of passive obedience to the powers, (see page 15.) The gold bill and loan bill are the acts I refer to, and the gentlemen are from New York, [Mr. MORRIS,] from Massachusetts, [Mr. HOOPER,] and others. When the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] spoke he gave another voice. "I bow," he says, "to the opinion of the Secretary of the Treasury—if it is right." I might well believe that he would not fall into an unreasoning acquiescence with the judgment or wish of any Department. I read in the debates of the Pennsylvania constitutional convention in 1837, upon the dangers of Federal and Cabinet influences, that when Walter Forward sought to divorce his State from such dangerous and fatal connection and patronage, he gave his earnest support to Mr. Forward. I reckon upon his vote against this measure, which has similar tendencies.

The report dwells upon the practice of other countries besides that of England. I will not seek to draw my lessons in legislation from France, or even Italy or Spain. We know what degree of liberty is allowed in those lands. I doubt if France has made any progress in her assemblies since the middle ages. It is related of the minister De Marigny, that wishing to gratify the king, Philip le Bel, in a levy of taxes, he called the Assembly of States; a great scaffold was erected; the king lords, and bishops took their places on it; and the Commons attended at its foot. The minister proposed an excise. The king, says an old chronicle, rose from his throne and advanced to the extremity of the scaffold that he might second by his looks the harangue of his treasurer and see who refused and who consented. This is the idea of the committee. The Cabinet will be here, not to vote, but, by their looks, to second the demands of the President; and woe to him in all future who dares to vote against the Administration! The eyes of the Cabinet will be upon him. Bastilles, Towers, imprisonments, may be powerless now, to influence us; but who has not constituents of influence at home, anxious for the fat of contracts or the drippings of office!

Mr. Speaker, if I did not believe that this measure would tend to increase the power of the Executive at the expense of the Legislature, I would have remained silent. But, sir, in times like these I would be most careful of the purity of the Legislature. I believe that in these days of usurpation of power, when unheard-of claims and inexplicable conduct have marked the executive career; when the power of Congress in foreign affairs has been denied at a distant court; when the laws we pass here are set aside by the minions of power, and when the State is afflicted with a civil war and its incidents of expense, patronage, and increased authority, that we should guard our portals as sacred from the intrusion of the ministers of that power which debauches. I must enter my negative to the opportunity for corruption. I do not forget the prayer that we be "not led into temptation." I base my opposition to this measure in the depravity of our nature. I remember that nations have fallen when their rulers yielded to the lures of the mercenary. Rome reared her grandeur by centuries of virtue, wisdom, and blood. When she lost her virtue she lost her grandeur and her power. Luxury favored corruption, and venality gave to the tongue of her Juvenals the fiercest shafts of satire. When her magistrates were elected by bribes, the sentences of her judges were purchased and the decrees of her senate were sold, then her liberties fell, and the mistress of nations became the scorn and prey of the barbarian. Then she was ruled by a Claudius, a Nero, a Caligula, and a Narcissus; by ministers who were emancipated slaves, parasites to power, and panderers to rapacity. Shall such be the finale of these, our terrible trials? Let us beware that we do not open the door to this mask of death, this saturnalia of hell. Whether such would be the result of this junction of the Legislature and the Executive, it is not for me to allege; but I would not open the breach, even if I were careless of the attack.

It is thought that this union of the Cabinet and Congress will elevate the standard of eloquence and statesmanship. England is pointed at as an example. The greatest efforts of oratory have been made against ministerial corruption and executive aggrandizement even there; and now in England, where the system is in full operation, the forum cannot boast greater names than those who opposed these encroachments upon the popular assembly. Pym, Hampden, Wentworth, and Falkland in their great struggles with Charles; Pulteney, Wyndham, and Bolingbroke in their struggles against the corruptions of the time of Anne; Chatham, thundering against George III and his minister, and Fox echoing back his Demosthenic philippics against the son of the great Commoner; Burke with his splendid imagery; Erskine with his pure and earnest style; the finished precision of Wedderburn; the silver tongue of Murray; the gentle persuasiveness of Wilberforce; the splendor of Sheridan; the wisdom of Camden; the vigor of Lord Grenville; the epigram of Grattan; the brilliance of Canning; the substantial logic of Peel; the invective, pathos, and humor of O'Connell; the brilliant antithesis of Shiel; the masterly force of Lyndhurst, and the rushing vehemence of Brougham, all adorn the parliamentary oratory of England, and would have adorned it still more had not the seductions of power often led them to degrade their genius and forget their inspiration as the guardians of England's greatness and glory. It is, alas! too true, that their finest efforts were made either in the defense or prosecution of great crimes and wrongs. Need I show to this House how nobly our own Senate and this House have been graced by our own orators? Their like will never more be seen here, until the Executive with his millions shall here creep into our free Halls, and by his corrupting influences call for the deep thunders and fierce lightnings of a nation's wrath expressed in the noble fervor of the future tribunes of the people.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I place my warning voice, not so much against this measure, but using it as the occasion, against that truckling subserviency to the power of the Executive which will dethrone the people and make them fit tools for the corruption of an evil day. The exercise of arbitrary prerogatives may not be here enacted; no armed troops may enter here; no arrests may violate our privileges; but if they do not, the evil serpent of corruption may creep into our places and insinuate its cunning and thus corrupt the integrity of the Legislature. Members may here fall a victim to power, if not open and bold, secret and malevolent; and when that fall begins, where will it end except in the fall of our liberties? Recollect that in civil wars moral obligations are torn asunder, the peaceful habits of life and thought are disturbed and destroyed, and other virtues not so compatible with liberty, but always compatible with licentiousness, alone survive. When we have progressed so far on the path of military renown that the nation will begin to regard its best defenders as its foes, and the enemy of its corruptions as the enemy of its Constitution—then indeed will liberty have lost its last refuge, perhaps even here in this Hall of the people; and though, like its devotee, Algernon Sydney, it may move with serene eye, untroubled pulse, and unabated resolve, from this, its chosen forum, to the scaffold of its fate, we may yet mourn over its memory, or, disdainful of its executioner, soar away to some loftier code of justice and right, where equality and freedom can be realized in the splendor of a better vision.

Mr. GARFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I will not detain the House long on this subject. I know how difficult it is to get the attention of members, when they have just attended a place of amusement, to the consideration of a grave measure. I know how ungrateful a task it is to attempt to recall their attention after the exhibition to which the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Cox] has treated them. The gentleman's speech sufficiently proves that he has read his law on the subject from Sergeant Buzfuz, and his constitutional and legislative history from Tittlebat Titmouse, to whom he has just referred; for certainly the history of legislation, as reflected in the Journals of Congress, gives no support to his position.

I am glad, Mr. Speaker, that we can, for once, approach the discussion of a measure on its own merits, uninfluenced by any mere party considerations. I wish we might in the discussion of this subject be equally free from that international jealousy, that hereditary hatred, so frequently and unreasonably manifested against Great Britain. I have noticed on the faces of members of the House a smile of satisfaction when any speaker has denounced the proposal to copy any custom of, or borrow any experience from, the Government of England. No man on this floor is more desirous than myself to see this Republic stand erect among the nations, and grant and exact equal justice from Great Britain. I fully appreciate how little friendship she has shown us in our great national struggle, yet I will not allow my mind to be so prejudiced as not to see the greatness, the glory, and the excellence of the British constitution. I believe that, next to our own, and in some respects perhaps equal, if not superior, to our own, the constitution of Great Britain stands highest for its wisdom and its security to freedom of all the constitutions of the civilized world. It does not become us, therefore, to set it aside as unworthy of our study, of our careful observation. Gentlemen should not forget that, in the days of George III, England, as well as America, emancipated herself from the tyranny of kingly prerogative; and it may be well questioned whether the two streams that sprung from that great struggle have not been flowing in parallel channels of equal depth and greatness, one on this continent and the other in the British islands.

It may well be doubted whether there is not as much popular freedom and more parliamentary security in the Kingdom of Great Britain than in this Republic. A gentleman who has lately crossed the sea, a man of great ability, and a philosophical observer, has said that to-day the British ministry is nothing more nor less than "a committee of the House of Commons." And I believe he described it correctly. I believe that no nation has a ministry so susceptible to the breath of popular opinion, so readily influenced and so completely controlled by popular power, as is the ministry of Great Britain by the House of Commons. Let one vote be given against the plans of that ministry and it is at once dissolved. It exists by the will of the House of Commons. How does this come about? From the fact that at the very time we emancipated ourselves from the kingly prerogatives of George III, so by the parliamentary reforms in Great Britain did that nation also emancipate itself and establish parliamentary liberty in England. It does not, therefore, become gentlemen to appeal to our ancient prejudices, so that we may not learn anything from that great and wise system of government adopted by our neighbors across the sea.

In the consideration of this question I shall touch upon three leading points: first, precedents from our own history; second, the constitutionality of the proposed measure as exhibited in the early discussions and laws; and third, its policy.

The precedents cited by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. PENDLETON,] the chairman of the select committee, in his very able report, established beyond all question that in the early days of the Republic, under the Constitution, heads of Departments did come upon the floor of Congress and make communications. No man, I believe, has denied that; I think no gentleman can successfully deny it. My friend from Vermont, [Mr. MORRILL,] if I understand it, denies that they did more than to meet the Senate in executive session. I am glad to see that the gentleman assents to my statement of his position.

I will now cite two examples where the head of a Department came on the floor of the House and made statements. If the gentleman will turn to the first volume of the Annals of Congress, page 684, he will find the following entry under date of August 7, 1789:

"The following message was received from the President of the United States by General Knox, the Secretary of War, who delivered therewith sundry statements:"—

Some gentlemen may say those statements were in writing. I ask them to listen a little further: "who delivered therewith sundry statements and papers relating to the same."

So that the Secretary of War came to the House of Representatives and made statements.

Mr. MORRILL. I will say to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] that I take that to mean nothing more than what the Private Secretary of the President now does every day. At that time the President of the United States had no Private Secretary, but he used the members of the Cabinet for that purpose, and for that purpose here only.

Mr. GARFIELD. I would like to ask my friend from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] whether the Private Secretary of the President ever makes any statements except the mere announcement of the message which he delivers?

Mr. MORRILL. I take it that that was all that was contemplated then. We daily have communications from the President, containing more than one document, statement, or paper.

Mr. GARFIELD. My friend from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] has assisted me. He now makes the point that the expression "statements," here referred to, is merely the announcement of a message. I call his attention to the second case which I will cite, from the 689th page of the same volume. On the 10th of August, 1789, the President sent in a message by the hands of General Knox, who delivered the same, "together with a statement of the troops in the service of the United States." He made to the House of Representatives statements about troops in the service, so that the statements referred to are not merely statements of the fact that he delivered a message of the President.

Mr. MORRILL. I do not like to interrupt the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] but I must insist that his second instance does not prove the fact which he assumes. He will find, if he will proceed further on in the same volume, that when the question came up distinctly upon allowing the Secretary of the Treasury to come in here for once, and once only, it was then declared that it would be setting a new precedent, one which they could not tolerate, and which they did not tolerate, but voted down after discussion.

Mr. GARFIELD. The gentleman has helped to pioneer my way handsomely thus far. I am coming to the very example to which he refers, and which I have examined with some care. I come now to my second point, the discussions in the Congress of the United States touching the constitutionality of the proposed law. There were discussions at five different periods, and only five, so far as I have found, touching this general subject, in the history of Congress. The first occurred in the First Congress, when it was proposed to establish Executive Departments.

On the 19th of May, 1789, Mr. Boudinot, of New Jersey, moved that the House proceed, pursuant to the provisions of the Constitution, to establish Executive Departments of the Government, the chief officers thereof to be removable at the will of the President. Under that resolution arose a full discussion of the nature of the offices to be created, by whom the officers were to be appointed, and by whom removed. The discussion covers forty or fifty pages of the volume before me, and embraces some of the very ablest expositions of the Constitution to be found in the early annals of Congress. After this long discussion the following results were arrived at, which will answer some of the points just made by my colleague from Ohio:

First, that the Departments were to be established by Congress, and the duties and general scope of powers vested therein to be established by law; but the incumbents of these offices were to be appointed by the President, and removable at his pleasure.

It was clearly determined, in the second place, that these officers could be removed in two ways: first, by the President; second, by impeachment in the usual modes prescribed in the Constitution.

It was thus settled, in this great discussion, not, as is said by my colleague who has just taken his seat, that Cabinet ministers are the creatures of the President and responsible to him alone, but that their very Departments and the whole organization of them depend in every case upon the law of Congress, and they are subject to impeachment for neglect of their duties or violation of their obligations in those offices.

The second discussion occurred in the same year when the Treasury Department was established, and in that instance the discussion became more precise and critical, bearing more nearly upon the particular question now before us. A clause was introduced into the law establishing the Treasury Department, providing that the Secretary of the Treasury should be directed to prepare plans for the redemption of the public debt, and for all the different measures relating to his Department, and—

"That he shall make report and give information to either branch of the Legislature, either in person or in writing (as may be required) respecting all matters which may be referred to him, by the Senate or House of Representatives, or which shall appertain to his office."

The debate took a very wide range. It was objected by several members that the provision was unconstitutional, on the ground that the House was the only power authorized to originate money bills, and that such an enactment would put that power in the hands of the Secretary of the Treasury. A very long discussion ensued on what was meant by "originating a bill." Some contended that to draft a bill was to originate it. Others that no proposed measure was a bill until the House had passed it; while others again said that it was a bill whenever the House authorized it to be introduced. Finally, it was determined that there was nothing incompatible with the Constitution in allowing the Secretary of the Treasury to report plans and prepare drafts of bills. It was thus settled, and has been the policy of the Government till the present day, that the Secretary of the Treasury may properly draft bills and prepare plans, and present them to Congress. And it is still a part of our law—I have the provision before me—

"That the Secretary of the Treasury shall make report and give information to either branch of the Legislature, either in person or in writing, as he may be required."

Let it be understood that in the First Congress of the United States a law was passed—approved September 2, 1789, by George Washington—acted upon before in the House and in the Senate, by the men who framed the Constitution; which law provided that it should be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to report his plans in writing or in person, as either House might require.

Mr. MORRILL. I desire to ask the gentleman a question. When the Secretary had made out his plan in pursuance of the resolution by which he was authorized to make it, did not the House, on the very first occasion when it could take action on the subject, distinctly discuss the question and refuse him the privilege of reporting in person?

Mr. GARFIELD. I am coming, in a moment, to that precise point.

The whole question of the undue influence which it might give to the Executive Departments to allow Cabinet officers to make their reports was fully examined; and after the fullest and freest discussion, which, even in a condensed form, covers some twenty pages of the book before me, the measure was passed without even a division, and became the law of the land.

I now come to the point to which the gentleman from Vermont has referred, the third of the five discussions. On the 9th day of January, 1790, the House received a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, stating that, in obedience to their resolution of the 21st of September previous, he had prepared a draft of a plan for funding the public debt, and was ready at their pleasure to report—it being settled in the law, as I have already said, that he should report in person or in writing, as he might be directed. The question was discussed, as the gentleman from Vermont noticed in his examination of the case yesterday. Mr. Gerry moved that the report should be made in writing. The question was discussed whether it should be made in writing, or orally, and the chief argument used in the case was that it would be impossible for members of Congress to understand it unless it was reduced to writing, so that they could have it before them. It was also said that the scope and bearing of the whole report would be so extensive that the human mind could not comprehend the whole of it, unless they could have it before them in a permanent shape. It was conceded by several who spoke that the House could have the report made in writing or orally, or in writing with accompanying oral explanations. The constitutional doubt was not suggested in that discussion. It was decided, without a division, not that he should not be permitted to come into the House, but that his report should be in writing. The law still stood, as it now stands, that he shall report in person or in writing, as either House may direct.

The fourth discussion related to the defeat of General St. Clair. I will remind the House of the history of that case. In 1790 St. Clair was ordered to make an expedition against the Indians in the Northwestern Territory; his army was disgracefully defeated, and the case was referred to General Washington, who declined to order a court of inquiry, and the subject was taken up in the House of Representatives, and on the 27th of March, 1792, a committee was ordered to inquire into the causes of the failure of the expedition. On the 8th of May following, the committee made a report which reflected severely upon the Secretary of the Treasury and the Secretary of War. On the 13th of November, 1792, a resolution was introduced into the House, to notify the two Secretaries that on the following Wednesday the House would take the report into consideration and that they might attend. After a considerable discussion the resolution was negatived, and it was resolved to empower the Committee of the Whole House to send for persons and papers in the case. On the following day the Secretary of War, General Knox, addressed a letter to the Speaker of the House, asking an opportunity to vindicate himself before the House. It was said by the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] yesterday, that General Knox was not permitted to come in. A discussion of the subject followed the presentation of his request. The House had not been satisfied with the report and recommitment to the committee for further examination. After the recommitment of the report, the Secretaries were brought before the committee and examined, so that their testimony reached the House in that mode. The question was never put to the House whether they would or would not receive the Secretaries in the House, but whether they should adopt the report or recommit it and order the committee to take further testimony. They did the latter. The proposition to admit them to the House was not directly acted upon at all.

Before leaving this subject I must refer to the opinion of Mr. Madison as expressed in the debate of November 13, 1792, on the question of admitting the Secretaries to the House to take part in the investigation of General St. Clair. This was the only quotation, I believe, which the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] found to apply directly to the point at issue. It is true that Mr. Madison did say he objected to the House resolution on constitutional grounds. (See Annals, Second Congress, page 680.) But he did not state what those constitutional grounds were. It is a little remarkable that he who had in 1789 spoke and voted for the Treasury act authorizing the Secretary to report in person or in writing, as either House might direct, should declare only three years later that it was unconstitutional to let the Secretary come before the House to give information or testimony.

Perhaps, sir, a little light of history will help to explain Mr. Madison's singular position. My friend from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] will remember that within those three years Mr. Madison and Hamilton had become seriously alienated from each other, and the gifted authors of the Federalist were friends no longer. The great party strife had begun, and they had taken opposite sides, Mr. Jefferson leading one party, Mr. Madison following, and Mr. Hamilton leading another, and his friends, the Federalists, following him. It is not, therefore, very surprising that Mr. Madison should have been influenced, like others, by personal feeling, or at least by his political differences with the Secretary of the Treasury. It is well known that his political opinions were greatly changed by the influence of Mr. Jefferson.

The fifth and last discussion to which I shall refer occurred on the 19th of November, 1792, on a resolution of the House directing the Secretary of the Treasury to report a plan for the reduction of the public debt. The question of the constitutionality of his reporting a plan at all again arose. The whole ground was again gone over. Notwithstanding Madison's record in 1789, he opposed it; but the resolution was passed against him by the decisive vote of 31 to 25. So that even down to that day, after parties had taken their ground, after Madison and Hamilton had become antagonistic, after all the fierceness of personal feeling was awakened, still the House determined that the law should stand as it was enacted by the First Congress. As the result of all these discussions, the custom obtained to receive reports and information from the heads of Departments in writing rather than in person. That custom has now almost the force of law. But while the Treasury act of 1792 remains on our statute-book we have a clear right to change the custom. I claim that by a simple resolution of the House of Representatives alone, we can now call the Secretary of the Treasury here to explain in person any plan or measure of his, and he is bound to come. The Senate can do the same for itself. The very law which establishes his office and builds up his Department makes its obligatory upon him to come when thus ordered. This is true only of the Secretary of the Treasury.

I hold it, then, fairly established that the measure before us is clearly within the scope of our constitutional powers; that it is only a question how a thing shall be done, the thing to be done being already provided by law. The heads of Departments do now make known their plans and views; they do now communicate to the House all that this resolution contemplates that they shall communicate. It is only a question of mode. They now communicate with the pen. This resolution proposes to add the tongue to the pen, the voice to the document, the explanation to the text, and nothing more. It is simply a proposition to add to our facilities by having them here to explain orally what they have already transmitted in documentary form.

And this brings me to the third and last point I propose to examine in this discussion—the policy of the proposed change, on which, I admit, there is much room for difference of opinion. The committee have given a very exhaustive statement of its advantages in their report, and I will only enlarge upon a few points in their statement. And, first of all, the proposed change will increase our facilities for full and accurate information as the basis of legislative action. There are some gentlemen here who doubt whether we have a right to demand information from the heads of Departments. Do we get that information as readily, as quickly, and as fully as we need it? Let me read an extract illustrative of the present plan. The President of the United States, in his last annual message to Congress, says:

"The report of the Secretary of War, and the accompanying documents, will detail the campaigns of the armies in the field since the date of the last annual message, and also the operations of the several administrative bureaus of the War Department during the last year. It will also specify the measures deemed essential for the national defense, and to keep up and supply the requisite military force."

Has that report been received? This message was delivered to us at the commencement of the present session; we are now within five weeks of its close; but up to this hour we have had no report from the Secretary of War, no official advice from him in reference to the "measures deemed essential for the national defense and to keep up and supply the requisite military force." We have been working in the dark, and it is only as we have reconnoitered the War Department, and forced ourselves in sideways and edgewise, that we have been able to learn what is considered essential for the national defense.

Had this resolution been in force, we should long ago had his report in our hands, or his good and sufficient reason for withholding it.

I call the attention of the House to the fact that our table is groaning under the weight of resolutions asking information from the several Departments that have not been answered. Who does not remember that at a very early day of the session a resolution introduced by a member from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] was unanimously adopted asking for executive information, and after four or five weeks had elapsed another resolution was adopted asking why the order of the House had been neglected and we had not been furnished with the information? But this also has fallen a brutum fulmen; we have received no answer. Could these things be if the members of the legislative and executive departments were sitting in council together? Should we not long ago have had the information or known the reason why we did not have it?

On the subject of information I have a word more to say. We want information more in detail than we can get it by the present mode. For example, it would have aided many of us a few days since, when the loan bill was under consideration, if the Secretary of the Treasury had been here to tell us precisely what he intended in regard to an increase of the volume of the currency under the provisions of the bill. We want to understand each other thoroughly, and when this is done it will remove a large share of the burdens of legislation.

One other point on the policy of the measure, and I am done. I want this joint resolution passed to readjust the relations between the executive and legislative departments, and to readjust them so that there shall be greater responsibility to the legislative department than there now is, and that that responsibility shall be made to rest with greater weight upon the shoulders of executive authority.

I am surprised that both the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Cox] declare that this measure would aggrandize the executive authority. I must say that, to me, it is one objection to this plan that it may have exactly the opposite effect. I believe, Mr. Speaker, that the fame of Jefferson is waning, and the fame of Hamilton waxing, in the estimation of the American people, and that we are gravitating toward a stronger Government. I am glad we are, and I hope the effect of this measure will cause the heads of Departments to become so thoroughly acquainted with the details of their office as to compensate for the restrictions imposed upon them. Who does not know that the enactment of this law will tend to bring our ablest men into the Cabinet of the Republic? Who does not know that if a man is to be responsible for his executive acts, and also be able to tell why he proposes new measures, and to comprehend intelligently the whole scope of his duties, weak men will shrink from taking such places? Who does not know that it will call out the best talent of the land, both executive and parliamentary?

What is the fact now? I venture to assert that the mass of our executive information comes from the heads of bureaus, or perhaps from the chief clerks of bureaus, or other subordinates unknown to the legislative body. I would have it that when these men bring information before us, they shall themselves be possessed of the last items of that information, so that they can explain them as fully as the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means ever explains his measures when he offers them before us.

One word more, Mr. Speaker. Instead of seeing the picture which the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Cox] has painted to attract our minds from the subject-matter itself to the mere gaudiness of his farcical display, instead of seeing that unworthy and unmanly exhibition in this House which he has described, I would see in its place the executive heads of the Government giving information to and consulting with the Representatives of the people in an open and undisguised way. Sir, the danger to American liberty is not from open contact with Departments, but from that unseen, intangible influence which characterizes courts, crowns, and cabinets. Who does not know, and who does not feel, how completely the reasons of a member may be stupefied by some one getting up and reading a dictum of some head of Department that he thinks a measure good or bad, wise or unwise? I want that head of Department to tell me why; I want him to appeal to my reason, and not lecture me ex cathedra and desire me to follow his lead just because he leads. I do not believe in any prescriptive right to determine what legislation shall be. No, sir; it is the silent, secret influence that saps and undermines the fabric of republics, and not the open appeal, the collision between intellects, the array of facts.

I hope, Mr. Speaker, that this measure will be fairly considered. If it do not pass now, the day will come, I believe, when it will pass. When that day comes, I expect to see a higher type of American statesmanship, not only in the Cabinet, but in the legislative halls.

Mr. THAYER obtained the floor.

ENROLLED BILL.

Mr. COBB, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported as truly enrolled an act to amend an act entitled "An act to amend and extend the charter of the Franklin Insurance Company, approved March 2, 1838," when the Speaker signed the same.

DEFICIENCY BILL.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. Speaker, unless my colleague [Mr. THAYER] is very anxious to go on with his remarks to-day, I should be glad to have a short time allowed to me, in order to report from the Committee of Ways and Means a deficiency bill—the same as that which has been lost between the two Houses—and one or two other matters that are very pressing.

Mr. THAYER. I do not intend to detain the House for a long time, and as it is somewhat doubtful whether this subject in reference to the admission of Cabinet ministers to Congress will be resumed, I prefer, unless there is some very great pressure of business, to say now what I have to say. There will be ample time, after I close my remarks, for the gentleman from Pennsylvania to report his measures.

Mr. STEVENS. Very well.

CABINET MINISTERS IN CONGRESS—AGAIN.

Mr. THAYER. Mr. Speaker, I am surprised that any one can regard the measure now before the House as proposing anything less than a fundamental change of our present system of Government. The Constitution declares that the House of Representatives shall be composed of members chosen by the people. This bill provides that persons not elected by the people, but appointed by the President, shall occupy seats upon the floor of this House, and participate in the deliberations thereof. The Constitution declares that no person holding office under the United States shall be a member of either House during his continuance in office. This bill gives to such officers a qualified membership in this House. The Constitution makes it the imperative duty of the President to communicate directly with Congress, and to recommend to their consideration such measures as he shall judge necessary and expedient. The practical effect of this bill will be to substitute for this direct communication the agency of his subordinate officers, and for his recommendations the recommendations of those officers.

By the Constitution the heads of the Executive Departments are to be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and, except on impeachment for high crimes and misdemeanors, are removable at his pleasure alone. By the plan proposed in this bill these officers, by the moral forces to be applied to them in this House, will eventually hold their offices at the will of the House of Representatives alone. By the Constitution the President alone is charged with the duty of administering the executive department of the Government. "The executive power shall be vested in a President of the United States of America," and, for the purpose of aiding him in the discharge of that duty, "he may require the opinion in writing of the principal officer in each of the Executive Departments upon any subject relating to the duties of their respective offices." As the executive power is wholly his, so the whole responsibility for its exercise rests upon him. By this bill that responsibility will eventually be transferred to and divided among the heads of the Executive Departments, and they transformed from mere executive agents—the President's head clerks, as John Randolph called them—into ministers of State, in the sense in which those words are used in the British constitution. The result will be that while the President will still continue nominally to hold in his grasp the whole executive authority of the Government, the responsibility for its exercise will be transferred to a cabinet of ministers, assuming in this House (under the provisions of the bill) the direction of public affairs, and successfully resisting or succumbing to the tide of public opinion according to the number of votes which they can command in the national Legislature. This may be a very good form of government, but it is not the form prescribed by the Constitution of the United States.

I repeat, therefore, sir, that I cannot forbear the expression of some surprise that changes so fundamental as these should be thought not to involve a change of the Constitution, and that it should be supposed that it is competent to alter the organism of the political system of the United States so materially as is proposed by this bill by the simple instrumentality of an act of Congress. Nor is my surprise diminished when I trace the paternity of this measure to the honorable gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. PENDLETON,] whom my observation during my brief experience here has led me (perhaps erroneously) to regard as belonging to the school of constitutional interpreters known as strict constructionists. The distinguished gentleman from Ohio, with many other honorable gentlemen, his political associates, resisted the passage of the bill submitting to the people of the United States the proposed amendment of the Constitution abolishing slavery; and his objections, if I properly understood him, were based not upon the broad and elevated philanthropy of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. FERNANDO WOOD,] that slavery is the best possible condition of the black race, but upon the more technical ground that the action thus proposed was not within the constitutional power of amendment. The gentleman also, if I am not mistaken, opposed the passage of the act enrolling and calling out the national forces, upon the ground that it was an exercise of authority not conferred by the Constitution, although that instrument had given to Congress an express, unqualified, and unlimited power to raise and support armies. Yet the honorable gentleman from Ohio sees nothing in the Constitution opposed to the summary introduction into our political system, by means of an act of Congress, of the great and radical changes proposed by this bill.

I am aware, sir, that neither the gentleman from Ohio nor the other friends of the measure now before the House will concede that it possesses the importance which I attribute to it, or that it will change, in any fundamental respect, the character of the Government. Whether it will or will not is the precise question in debate. I believe that it will; but that is in itself but the declaration of an opinion of little value, unless it be founded upon correct views of human conduct and a just and true conception of all the conditions of the case. I shall trespass, therefore, upon the attention of the House for a few moments while I attempt to vindicate the opinion I have expressed by a statement of the reasons which have led me to its adoption; and I do this with the less reluctance, sir, because the views which I take of the effect of the proposed measure, and the line of argument by which I shall oppose it, differ materially from those which have been presented by honorable members who have addressed the House in opposition to it.

In order to form a correct judgment upon the probable results of the proposed measure it is necessary to consider its effect upon Congress, its effect upon the heads of the Executive Departments of the Government, and its effect upon the presidential office.

I am not among the number of those who believe that either the independence, the political freedom, or the constitutional powers of the House of Representatives would be abridged by the presence in that body of the heads of the Executive Departments, and their participation in the deliberations of Congress. In the House, the numbers which compose it, its varied and popular character, and the frequency with which it is reconstructed from the masses of the people, furnish a sufficient guarantee against any apprehension. It is quite possible that at times the partialities arising from personal intercourse, the conflict of personal opinion, the rivalries of debate, and the appeals to party discipline, might exercise influences now unfelt upon the legislation of Congress, and that coteries might thus be formed in both Houses favorable or unfavorable to the measures advocated by the executive agents. But these are influences which, from the changeable character of this body, its natural jealousy of executive interference, and the independence which, by its very constitution, belongs to it, would, in my opinion, be sure to end, not in any diminution of the power and independence of Congress, but in the destruction of that of the heads of Departments, and, by consequence, of that of the Executive himself. I am not alarmed, therefore, by the terrible and Homeric picture drawn by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. COX] of the advent of the Secretary of War, with his myrmidons in blue, to the House of Representatives. No, sir; the danger from the measure now proposed lies not in the abridgment of the power and importance of the legislative department of the Government, but in the disproportionate enlargement of that power and influence, the destruction of the legitimate influence of the executive office, the confusion and mingling of powers which are now wisely separated, and the destruction of that nicely adjusted balance which is now characteristic of our system, and constitutes one of its principal safeguards.

When the heads of the Executive Departments shall come into this House to participate in its debates, to be catechised by its members, to confront their votes, it requires no great amount of foresight to perceive that they must submit themselves to the judgment of this House and become subservient to its wishes and opinions, or relinquish the offices which they hold. When outvoted upon material issues they must retire. In the necessity of this their own self-respect and the popular expectation would coincide. If it be asked why this should follow any more than at present, I answer because their relations to this body would be entirely different from the relations which they at present hold to it. They are now but the agents of the President in the administration of the executive power. They are appointed by him; they are under his control; they report their proceedings to him; they are responsible to him for the discharge of their several duties. If they recommend measures it is to the President. If those measures are approved by the President he assumes the responsibility of them. If submitted to Congress and rejected, it is simply a rejection of so much of the policy of the President. No direct issue arises between Congress and the President's subordinates. In the new attitude which they would hold under the provisions of this bill the case would be entirely altered. They would stand here the personal representatives and advocates of measures advised and promoted by themselves. They must enter the lists and level their lances in defense of a policy of which they stand forth the personal exponents and champions. They must, in such a contest, abide the issue of the personal struggle into which they have entered, and if vanquished they must retire and give place to the advocates of different measures and the champions of a different policy. In our system the legislative is the strongest department of the Government. It preponderates vastly over the other two departments. No other department can successfully contend against it. In a battle between the Representatives of the people and the advisers of the Executive the victory may be declared before the contest is joined. If the advisers are beaten they must succumb.

Between the Legislature and men holding to it the personal relations which this bill contemplates there must exist accord. When that accord ceases they can no longer be useful and must depart. Thus, by the few words of this bill, are the President's clerks to be turned into a responsible ministry, charged with the conduct of public affairs in this House, originating, proposing, urging, defending measures; speaking to-day amid cheers from the ministerial benches, sitting down to-morrow amid groans and jeers from the opposition benches; now drumming up votes for a crisis, and exhausting for that purpose all the resources of promises and rewards; now rejoicing in a fresh lease of power obtained by a majority of two; again retiring in disgrace under the passage of a want-of-confidence resolution, and that, alas! without the consolatory recollections of a white-bait dinner, for I do not understand that the Potomac will supply that aristocratic delicacy. It is natural to suppose that officials, dependent as those will thus necessarily be upon Congress for the continuance of their power and importance, will look rather to that body than to the President for support, and that they will address themselves rather to the securing of votes and popularity there than to the independent discharge of the duties of the executive branch of the Government. A large part of the executive power and influence will thus be transferred to the House of Representatives. This leads me to consider what will probably be the effect of these changes upon the presidential office. When the official agents of the President shall represent him in Congress, and the amount of their influence and their duration in office shall both be measured by the extent of their following and by the majorities which they can command there, it would seem to be a natural and probable result of such an arrangement that the executive office itself must in the end become subject to the absolute control of Congress. By such an arrangement responsibility is transferred from the President to a recognized ministry, who become his brain, his voice, his hand; and they who have the responsibility, and who will reflect in the mutations of their political fortunes the fluctuating opinions of the Legislature, must have the power also, for responsibility and power go together. The executive responsibility is thus transferred primarily to the parliamentary representatives of the executive office, but ultimately and really to the Legislature, which controls their conduct. Thus, by a total subversion of the present system, the subordinates become the ostensible chiefs, the agents become the principals, and the executive office, which, by the plan of the Constitution, was made, within its proper sphere of duty, like the department of the judiciary, to a great extent independent of the legislative department of the Government, must, if it do not become wholly dependent upon it, lose much of the independence and power with which it is now invested. How long, for example, can it be supposed that the power of the veto would survive the consummation of the changes which have been indicated, or the supreme command of the Army and Navy?

Sir, I am no advocate of any extension of the powers of the national Executive beyond the limits which are at present prescribed for them in the Constitution; neither do I believe, on the other hand, that liberty is to be secured and perpetuated by a concentration of all the powers of the Government in the hands of the legislative department. I have been taught by history that of all tyrannies that is the most irresponsible and hopeless. That proposition was well stated by Montesquieu when he said, "There can be no liberty where the legislative and executive powers are united in the same person or body of magistrates." If we would maintain our free institutions we must maintain the partition of power among the several departments which is made in the Constitution, and the only way in which that can be done is, as Mr. Madison declared, "by so contriving the interior structure of the Government as that its several constituent parts may by their mutual relations be the means of keeping each other in their proper places." In order to accomplish this "each department should," as he also says, "have a will of its own; and consequently should be so constituted that the members of each should have as little agency as possible in the appointment of the members of the others." I believe in the soundness of this doctrine, and hence I do not believe in the plan proposed in the present bill. I do not believe in the wisdom of conferring authority upon the President to appoint members of this House; nor do I believe in concentrating in this House the power which by the Constitution belongs to the Executive. The measure proposed by the gentleman from Ohio is well adapted, in my opinion, to destroy those mutual relations which were established by the Constitution, and which have hitherto answered the purpose of keeping the constituent parts of the Government in their proper places. "To what purpose," it was well asked by Mr. Hamilton, "do you separate the executive or the judiciary from the legislative power, if both the executive and the judiciary are so constituted as to be at the absolute devotion of the legislative?" Such a separation must be merely nominal, and incapable of producing the ends for which it was established.

The feature of government embraced in the present bill is evidently borrowed from the constitutions of England and other monarchical countries. In those systems, in which the principle obtains that the king is irresponsible and can do no wrong, it is a wise invention to limit a power which would otherwise be absolute; for it substitutes for him, in the persons of the ministers of State, individuals who are responsible for the exercise of the executive power. The only question which would vex the mind of a republican philosopher in regard to the excellencies of those systems would perhaps be this: of what use, then, is the king? But, sir, no analogies can be traced between those systems and ours. We have no such fictions and stand in need of no such aids. By the Constitution the people have distributed the powers of the Government among several departments. They who exercise those powers are directly responsible to them for their acts. By making them responsible to each other, or by shifting the responsibility from one to another, or by mingling the powers which are severally delegated to each, we shall only introduce confusion into what is now a harmonious system, and unsettle at once the well-defined boundaries of authority and the foundations of the Government.

The argument, that a necessity exists for the introduction of this innovation upon the organic structure of the Government in order that Congress may avail itself of the best possible means of information in relation to the measures of legislation on which it may be called to act, is destitute of any solid foundation in fact. No such necessity exists. The means which have hitherto been resorted to on the part of Congress for obtaining such information have always been found adequate for the purpose. Indeed it must be obvious upon the slightest reflection that the information obtained by the deliberate and written response of the heads of Departments to the resolutions of this House must be superior in value to the information proposed to be obtained by the plan of this bill by as much as a deliberately prepared written statement of facts is superior in precision and accuracy of detail to an oral statement based upon the mere memory of the person who utters it.

The precedent for the proposed action, which is supposed to be found in the act of 1789, fails in this, that whereas that act made it the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury alone to make report and give information to either branch of the Legislature, in person or in writing, respecting matters referred to him by the Senate or House of Representatives, whenever he might be required so to do, this bill gives to the seven heads of the Executive Departments permanent seats in this body; and that, not for the single purpose of giving information, but for the purpose of participating in the debates of this House and influencing its action. I do not deny the power of the House of Representatives to seek information from any quarter to which it may see fit to apply for it. It is upon that principle it acts in allowing the claimant of a contested seat upon this floor to be heard, but the occasional exercise of that undoubted power is a totally different thing from adding permanent members to this House not elected by the people, and not possessing the qualifications demanded by the Constitution. Indeed, when the restrictive character of the act of 1789 is considered, together with the great caution which was taken to guard it against a construction which would authorize what is proposed in this bill, it furnishes the best possible evidence that the opinions of the statesmen of that day were adverse to the scheme which is now proposed. But the argument founded upon the alleged precedents for this action has been so completely answered and refuted by the gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. MORRILL,] that in my opinion no further argument upon that point is required.

It is well known that when the Constitution was formed several different plans were suggested in regard to the executive office and the executive power. One of them proposed a double Executive, consisting of two persons, between whom the power and responsibility of the office should be divided; another proposed a single Executive, hedged in by a council of State, whose assent should be necessary to render his acts valid. There was much public discussion before it was determined to give to the executive department of the Government the form and place which it now holds in the Constitution. But I am not aware that it was at any time proposed to mingle the executive with the legislative department of the Government after the manner of this bill. It was, on the contrary, a fundamental idea, agreed to by all and adhered to throughout, that the success of the plan adopted and the perpetuity of the system depended in no small degree upon keeping the different departments of power as separate as possible, and in rendering them no further dependent upon each other than was proper for the creation of such necessary checks as were indispensable to prevent the concentration of too much power in either. How perfectly the framers of the Constitution succeeded in this, let the harmonious working in all its departments of this unparalleled plan of government for a period of more than seventy years attest. There is nothing in the political history of the world which can be compared with it. There is no miracle of art, no triumph of mechanical ingenuity, which can, in the beauty of its proportions, the renovation of its strength, the regulation of its power, and the harmony of its operations, furnish us with any analogies to this great and wonderful framework of government, which, until our recent troubles began, performed its functions more like the silent influences of nature than a human invention; which guaranteed universal security and order, commanded everywhere authority and respect, filled a continent with peace, prosperity, and plenty, yet rested upon the shoulders of the people as lightly as the air they breathed.

It had, sir, but one wheel which in the roll of years could give way. That has broken, scattering ruin and destruction around; but the fragments are being removed, a new one, stronger and better, let us thank God, than the old one, is about to replace it, as much stronger as justice is stronger than injustice, as much better as liberty is better than oppression. But I deny that the organism needs any repair of the kind now proposed. I deny that any necessity exists for it. No such necessity has been shown to exist. The proposition is for an alteration purely experimental. It is not demanded by any exigency of public affairs. It is not justified by any public necessity. It is calculated to confuse the boundaries which should define the distribution of power and to unsettle the balance of the Constitution. The existing arrangements of the Constitution in this respect have not been proven to be either injurious or inconvenient. Why, then, should we tinker at them, or substitute for a plan which has stood the test of time and experience the imaginary improvements of the anarchists of Montgomery?

Mr. Speaker, I do not desire to occupy more of the time of this House upon this subject. I will yield the floor for the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. WILSON.]

Mr. WILSON obtained the floor.

The SPEAKER. There are twenty-five minutes of the time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. THAYER] unexpired.

Mr. STEVENS. I ask the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] to yield the floor at this time. If he will do so, then I will ask the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. PENDLETON] to consent to have this subject postponed until I can report a bill from the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. WILSON. I will yield the floor for that purpose.

Mr. PENDLETON. I shall be pleased to do as suggested by the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means [Mr. STEVENS] if it shall suit the convenience of the House. Therefore, in order to test the sense of the House, I will move that the further consideration of this subject be postponed until one week from to-morrow, which I believe is the first day upon the Calendar which will be unoccupied by any special order, and that it be made the special order for that day. There is no vacant day to which I can postpone this subject until Friday of next week, which is private bill day. I desire to suggest to gentlemen who are interested in the Private Calendar that to-morrow has been especially assigned for its consideration. I hope the convenience of the House will be consulted by postponing this subject till that time.

Mr. WEBSTER. I desire to say that there has been no day devoted to the consideration of private bills during this session.

Mr. HOLMAN. To-morrow has been set apart for that.

Mr. WEBSTER. Very well. I will make no objection to the postponement.

Mr. PENDLETON. I now move that the further consideration of this subject be postponed till Friday of next week, and made the special order for that day, and from day to day until disposed of.

The motion to postpone was agreed to.

DEFICIENCY BILL.

Mr. STEVENS. I now ask leave to report from the Committee of Ways and Means a deficiency bill, for the purpose of starting it here and have it go to the Senate.

The bill was read a first and second time.

Mr. STEVENS. I ask that this bill be considered in the House, and at this time.

Mr. HOLMAN. I shall not object, provided the bill is considered, subject to the same rules and the same points of order as in Committee of the Whole.

No objection being made, it was ordered accordingly.

Mr. STEVENS. I think the House will dispense with the reading of this bill at length after I have stated what it is. It is precisely the bill which the House agreed to, including the amendments of the Senate for the California and Denver mints, &c.; all that we agreed to, except the clause in relation to the House employes. I have put that matter in such shape that it will not, I think, offend the consciences of the Senate. I understand that it will most likely pass that body in the form in which it is now reported. All the rest of the bill is precisely what we agreed to before.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask for the reading of the section referred to by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS.]

It was read, as follows:

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the sum of $38,000 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, to be added to the contingent fund of the House, to enable the House of Representatives to fulfill its pledges and obligations heretofore made; and the same shall be audited and settled on such vouchers as shall be produced by the Clerk of the House.

Mr. STEVENS. That is the only alteration made in the bill. Some of the Senators said that when it was in the former shape they could not help seeing it, and therefore they objected to it. I now call the previous question.

Mr. HOLMAN. According to the order of the House this bill is subject now to the same rules as in the Committee of the Whole. It is therefore inconsistent with that understanding to call the previous question now. And I desire to move to strike out the feature of the bill which has just been read.

Mr. STEVENS. The gentleman can move to strike that out, and then I will call the previous question.

Mr. HOLMAN. That is not in accordance with the order of the House, that this bill shall be considered in the House subject to the rules in force in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. STEVENS. If the gentleman wants to debate the question for five minutes I have no objection, and will withdraw the call for the previous question for that purpose.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to strike out section two of this bill. What I especially object to in that section is the proposition that this House is pledged to the payment of this additional twenty per cent. to the employes of the House. The gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS,] in discussing this subject yesterday, referred to precedents which had heretofore occurred, by which the House, by its own act, had appropriated out of the contingent fund sums of money. There are probably such instances, but I think no case can be found where so large a sum as this has been appropriated on the one hand, or where, upon the other hand, it was so distinctly and fairly a proposition to increase salaries.

Here is an attempt on the part of one branch of Congress to appropriate $38,000, upon the idea that it has a right to act independently of the other branch of Congress in the appropriation of the public money. It is the most remarkable state of affairs that has ever presented itself in this House. I think the country owes something to the other branch of this Congress in resisting this assumption of power on the part of the House of Representatives. A pledge! Why the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS,] it seems to me, insults the intelligence of the country and of this House. A pledge on the part of this House to give a certain sum of money! If gentlemen have been induced to go into the public employment upon the assurance and belief that they were to receive this additional compensation, then it might all be well enough. But, in fact, such is not the case.

On the other hand it is not to be presumed—I do not care what precedents may be referred to, it cannot be presumed—that any intelligent citizen believes that this House, by its own act, can increase by twenty per cent., or any other per cent., the salaries and compensation of public officers. I regret that the subject of such an amendment as this, involving a principle like this, should be deemed of so much importance on the part of the House. Gentlemen do not seem to consider that the employes of this House, gentlemanly as they are and as I have always asserted them to be, who have performed their duties faithfully and well so far as my experience has extended, are extremely well paid, it seems to me, in comparison with other employes of the Government.

Let me mention a single case by way of illustration. One gentleman, connected with this House as a committee clerk, who during this session will perform service for the period of three months, who is not required to remain here an hour after the expiration of the three months, will receive for his three months' service the handsome compensation of $1,800; and yet the duties of a clerk to a committee are not, even during the session, of the most laborious character. Yet some gentlemen talk about the employes of this House being unable to support themselves on the pay which they now receive!

The compensation paid to the employes of this House is in wonderful contrast with the salaries paid in other departments of the Government. Many of the departmental clerks, with wives and children to support, receive but $1,200 or $1,600 per annum, and this, too, for service, not during only three months, but during the entire year. Yet as a mere matter of favoritism—a favoritism which is the more readily exercised because bestowed upon those with whom we are in daily intercourse—members of this House are willing to exhibit this remarkable spectacle of partiality as legislators. I do not think, sir, that it is becoming to this House to so entirely forget other employes of the Government in a favoritism toward the employes of this House, however much these gentlemen may be entitled to our respect and confidence for the faithful performance of their duties.

I trust, sir, that the House will strike out this item of $38,000, and that we shall not set the example of this partial system of legislation. I hope, especially, that gentlemen upon this side of the House, who have always, in their respective States, protested against partiality in legislation, will not be found giving their sanction to a proposition so abhorrent to every principle of Democracy.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I desire, Mr. Speaker, to say only a single word in connection with this matter, for the subject was very fully discussed yesterday, and the judgment of the House on the question was very decidedly expressed.

Sir, I do not, as the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] appears to do, regard this as a political question in any possible aspect. I have no appeal to make to this side of the House on political grounds. My appeal in favor of this appropriation is to justice and just men, irrespective of politics. These employes of the House are, I conceive, entitled to the money which we propose to appropriate. The faith of this House has been pledged to pay them this money, and I have no idea of allowing the other branch of Congress to dictate to us in relation to matters which pertain solely to this House, and which should be under our own control. I am not acquainted with any principle of Democracy that warrants me in doing injustice. On the contrary, the Democracy which I have learned has taught me to be just to all men.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. Speaker, I only wish to say that this is the same proposition which was yesterday sustained in this House by a vote of two to one, except that it is now put in such a shape as will enable the Senate, without inconsistency, to acquiesce in it.

Mr. SLOAN. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] consent to an amendment?

Mr. STEVENS. Let me first hear what it is.

Mr. SLOAN. It is to substitute for the section as it stands the following:

That a sufficient sum be appropriated to pay all the employes of the Government, in the civil and military service, twenty per cent., in addition to the pay they are now receiving.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield for the purpose of allowing the amendment to be offered?

Mr. STEVENS. I suppose the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. SLOAN] is in fun. [Laughter.]

Mr. SLOAN. I am not in fun. I think my proposition is no more than just.

Mr. STEVENS. I decline to yield, and I move that the debate now close.

Mr. HOLMAN. I submit that, if this bill is to be considered as in Committee of the Whole, as the House has ordered, the gentleman cannot call the previous question, or move to close debate while any gentleman has an amendment to offer. That is the principle universally applied in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is familiar with the rules, and knows that the committee rises and goes into the House to close debate.

Mr. HOLMAN. That cannot be done while an amendment is pending.

THE CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

THE OFFICIAL PROCEEDINGS OF CONGRESS, PUBLISHED BY F. & J. RIVES, WASHINGTON, D. C.

THIRTY-EIGHTH CONGRESS, 2D SESSION.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 28, 1865.

NEW SERIES....No. 29.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is mistaken. It is the practice every day for the committee to rise and to go into the House in order to close debate. It is true that a bill cannot be reported while amendments are pending.

Mr. SLOAN. I think I have a right to offer my amendment under the understanding of the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's amendment is not germane even if he had the right to submit it. The question recurred on Mr. STEVENS's motion.

Mr. HOLMAN demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and Messrs. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania, and SPALDING, were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 89, noes 6.

So the debate was closed.

The question then recurred on Mr. HOLMAN's amendment.

Mr. SPALDING demanded the yeas and nays.

Mr. HOLMAN demanded tellers on the yeas and nays.

Tellers were ordered, and Messrs. HOLMAN and STEVENS were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes twenty-five; more than one fifth of those present; so the yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 37, nays 76, not voting 69; as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Ames, Augustus C. Baldwin, John D. Baldwin, Baxter, Beaman, Blaine, Broomall, Ambrose W. Clark, Cobb, Farnsworth, Cooch, Grinnell, Harding, Higby, Holman, Asahel W. Hubbard, Ingersoll, Julian, Kasson, Francis W. Kellogg, Orlando Kellogg, Kerian, Morrill, Daniel Morris, Norton, Perlman, Price, John H. Rice, Edward H. Rollins, Sloan, Spaulding, Upson, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, and Wilson—37.

NAYS.—Messrs. William J. Allen, Ancona, Ashley, Bailly, Boyd, Chandler, Cole, Cox, Cravens, Henry Winter Davis, Thomas T. Davis, Dawson, Denison, Dixon, Donnelly, Driggs, Eckley, Eden, Edgerton, Eldridge, Eliot, Finck, Ganson, Gardfield, Grider, Herrick, Hotchkiss, John H. Hubbard, Jenckes, Kalbfleisch, Kelley, Knox, Law, Lazear, Littlejohn, Long, Long, Longyear, Mallory, Marvin, McAllister, McBride, Moorhead, James R. Morris, Amos Myers, Leonard Myers, Nelson, Odell, Charles O'Neill, John O'Neill, Pendleton, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, William H. Randall, Rogers, James S. Rollins, Ross, Shannon, Smithers, Starr, John D. Steele, Stevens, Stiles, Stuart, Thayer, Townsend, Wadsworth, Webster, Whaley, Wheeler, Chilton A. White, Joseph W. White, Williams, Windom, Winfield, and Woodbridge—76.

NOT VOTING.—Messrs. James C. Allen, Anderson, Arnold, Blair, Bliss, Blow, Boutwell, Brandegee, Brooks, James S. Brown, William C. Brown, Freeman Clarke, Clay, Coffroth, Creswell, Dawes, Deming, Dumont, English, Frank, Griswold, Hale, Hall, Harrington, Benjamin G. Harris, Charles M. Harris, Hooper, Hubbard, Hutchins, Philip Johnson, William Johnson, King, Knapp, Le Blond, Marey, McClurg, McDowell, Melrose, McKinney, Middleton, Samuel F. Miller, William H. Miller, Morrison, Noble, Orth, Patterson, Perry, Pike, Pomeroy, Pruyn, Alexander H. Rice, Robinson, Schenck, Seefeldt, Scott, Smith, William G. Steele, Strouse, Sweat, Thomas, Tracy, Van Valkenburgh, Voorhees, Ward, Wilder, Benjamin Wood, Fernando Wood, Worthington, and Yeaman—69.

So the amendment was disagreed to.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. STEVENS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

INSPECTORS OF STEAMBOATS—AGAIN.

Mr. MALLORY. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a privileged motion. I move to reconsider the vote by which the House laid on the table House bill No. 667, to provide for two assistant inspectors of steamboats in the city of New York, and for two local inspectors at Galena, Illinois, which was reported from the Committee on Commerce by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. WASHBURN.] The motion was made by me under a misapprehension of the character of the bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MALLORY moved that the bill be recommitted to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HOLMAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was recommitted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table. The latter motion was agreed to.

WAGON ROADS IN MICHIGAN.

Mr. DRIGGS, by unanimous consent, introduced a joint resolution to amend an act granting aid to the State of Michigan to construct wagon roads for military and postal purposes; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

GRANTS OF LAND FOR RAILROAD PURPOSES.

Mr. DRIGGS also, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to extend the time for the completion of certain railroads to which land grants have been made in the States of Michigan and Wisconsin; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. WILSON moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was referred; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

BURNING OF THE SMITHSONIAN INSTITUTION.

Mr. RICE, of Maine, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds be directed to inquire into the origin of the fire by which the Smithsonian Institute building and the valuable deposits therein were on Tuesday last, in whole or in part, destroyed, the approximate loss to the Government and private persons, the means necessary to preserve the remaining portions, and such other facts in connection therewith as may be of public interest; and to report by bill or otherwise.

CLAIMS FOR QUARTERMASTER'S STORES.

Mr. HOTCHKISS, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to restrict the jurisdiction of the Court of Claims to provide for the payment of certain demands for quartermaster's stores and subsistence supplies furnished to the Army of the United States, approved July 4, 1864; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

METROPOLITAN RAILROAD COMPANY.

Mr. DAVIS, of New York, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to amend an act entitled "An act to incorporate the Metropolitan Railroad Company of the District of Columbia;" which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

TAX ON STATE BANK CIRCULATION.

Mr. SPALDING, by unanimous consent, introduced a joint resolution to tax State bank circulation; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

NORTHERN PACIFIC RAILROAD.

Mr. SWEAT asked unanimous consent to introduce a bill to authorize the extension of the Northern Pacific railroad eastward to Ontonagon, State of Michigan, to provide for its connection eastward with the Ohio, Indiana, Michigan, and Canadian system of railroads at Port Huron, Detroit, Toledo, Fort Wayne, and Dayton.

Mr. ELDRIDGE objected.

ABOLITION OF SLAVERY.

Mr. LOAN, by unanimous consent, presented resolutions of the constitutional convention of the State of Missouri, instructing the Senators and Representatives of that State to vote for the constitutional amendment for the abolition of slavery; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

NAVAL REGISTER.

Mr. A. W. CLARK, from the Committee on Printing, introduced the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That there be printed for the use of the members of this House twenty-five hundred copies of the Navy Register.

Mr. A. W. CLARK moved that the vote by which the resolution was passed be reconsidered; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PAY DEPARTMENT OF THE NAVY.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table a Senate bill for reference only.

No objection being made, the bill of the Senate (No. 382) to provide for the better organization of the pay department of the Navy, was taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

ENROLLED BILL.

Mr. COBB, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled an act (H. R. No. 677) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide ways and means for the support of the Government, and for other purposes," approved June 30, 1864; when the Speaker signed the same.

Mr. STEVENS. I now insist that we proceed to the regular order of business; and therefore I move that the House adjourn. [Laughter.]

The motion was agreed to; and thereupon the House (at four o'clock and ten minutes, p. m.) adjourned.

IN SENATE.

FRIDAY, January 27, 1865.

Prayer by Rev. V. M. HURLBERT, of Yonkers, New York.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a report of the Secretary of the Treasury, in answer to a resolution of the Senate of the 23d instant calling for a statement showing the amount of collections in each internal revenue collection district, and the amount of moneys deposited in authorized depositories, as paid to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue by the collector of each district, stating that the information called for is contained in the tabular statements accompanying the annual report of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, which will be laid before Congress during the present week in printed form. The communication was ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

CREDENTIALS PRESENTED.

Mr. SUMNER presented the credentials of Hon. HENRY WILSON, chosen by the Legislature of the State of Massachusetts a Senator from that State for the term of six years, commencing March 4, 1865; which were read, and ordered to be filed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. WILSON presented the petition of Holtenbeck & Zeigler, of Savannah, Georgia, praying payment for property taken by the military force under the command of Major General Sherman; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. SHERMAN presented a petition of citizens of Ohio, clerks in the War, Treasury, and Interior Departments, praying for an increase of salary; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. SUMNER presented a petition of citizens of Massachusetts, clerks in the Interior, War, Treasury, and Navy Departments, praying for an increase of salary; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. DOOLITTLE presented the petition of medical officers in the several regiments comprising the third division fifth Army corps, praying for an increase of the pay of surgeons and assistant surgeons in the military service of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

Mr. HOWARD presented the memorial of Ernst Maurice Buerger, pastor of the German Evangelical Lutheran Church, Washington city, District of Columbia, and member of the German Evangelical Lutheran Synod of Missouri, Ohio, and other States, praying that ministers of the gospel may be exempt from military duty; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. SHERMAN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 413) to establish a certain post road; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. POMEROY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 104) for the return of Arkansas to the Union; which was read twice, and ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

Mr. HOWARD asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 414) to authorize the construction of the Northern Pacific railroad eastward to Ontonagon in the State of Michigan, and provide for its connection eastward with the Ohio, Indiana, Michigan, and Canadian systems of railroads at Port Huron, Detroit, Toledo, Fort Wayne, and Dayton; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HARRIS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 415) to amend an act entitled "An act to restrict the jurisdiction of the Court of Claims, and to provide for the payment of certain demands for quartermaster's stores and subsistence supplies furnished to the Army of the United States," approved July 4, 1864; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. CLARK, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the memorial of Frederick Bauer on behalf of the German Evangelical Church of Martinsburg, Virginia, paying compensation for the burning of their house of worship while being used by Union soldiers, reported adversely thereon, and moved that it be postponed indefinitely; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of George P. Ihrie, late colonel and additional aid-de-camp on the staff of General Grant, praying compensation for the loss of personal baggage and property captured and burned by rebel cavalry on or about the 11th of January, 1863, reported adversely thereon, there being no case stated, and no proof furnished, and moved that its consideration be indefinitely postponed; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Frederick Miller, praying indemnification for damages sustained by him in being ejected from his residence and place of business by a surgeon in the United States service, reported adversely, there being no sufficient proof of the justness of the claim, and moved its indefinite postponement; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of James M. Confer, late surgeon of the twenty-ninth regiment Indiana volunteers, praying compensation for property lost while in the service of the United States, reported adversely thereon, there being no sufficient proof of the justness of the claim, and moved that it be postponed indefinitely; which was agreed to.

Mr. ANTHONY, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the memorial of Peter Hays, G. F. Randall, and Peter Monser-voue, praying to be reimbursed for loss of clothing and other personal effects occasioned by the sinking of the United States steamer Sumter on the night of the 24th of June, 1863, reported adversely thereon, and moved its indefinite postponement; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the memorial of James N. Carpenter, paymaster United States Navy, praying compensation for horses and cattle pressed by the United States Army, and for property destroyed by the battles of Spotsylvania Court-House and the Wilderness, and for the confiscation of certain bank stock by the rebel government, reported adversely thereon, and moved its indefinite postponement; which was agreed to.

Mr. HOWE, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Charles De Arnaud, praying additional compensation for services rendered the Government in obtaining valuable information concerning the movements of rebels, at the request of General Rousseau and other general officers of the Army, reported adversely thereon, and moved that it be postponed indefinitely; which was agreed to.

Mr. HOWE, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the memorial of Henry Charles De Ahna, praying for the return of $2,000 deposited by him with Jay Cooke & Co., to the credit of C. V. Hogan, an employe in the secret service of the Treasury Department, and a joint resolution (S. R. No. 71) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to dispose of certain moneys therein mentioned, which relate to the same matter, reported adversely, and moved that they be indefinitely postponed; which was agreed to.

Mr. COLLAMER, from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 390) relating to the postal laws, reported it with amendments.

Mr. COWAN, from the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 387) amendatory of an act entitled "An act to promote the progress of the useful arts," approved March 3, 1863, reported it without amendment.

LOCAL IMPROVEMENTS IN WASHINGTON.

Mr. MORRILL. The Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was recommended the bill (S. No. 376) to amend an act entitled "An act to amend an act to incorporate the inhabitants of the city of Washington, passed May 15, 1820," approved May 5, 1864, have instructed me to report it back with an amendment, and to ask for its present consideration.

By unanimous consent, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The amendment was to strike out all after the enacting clause, and in lieu of the words stricken out to insert the following:

That the act approved May 5, 1864, entitled "An act to amend an act to incorporate the inhabitants of the city of Washington, passed May 15, 1820," be amended so as to read as follows: "That the said corporation shall have full power and authority to lay taxes on particular wards, parts, or sections of the city, for their particular local improvements, and to cause the curb-stones to be set, the foot and carriage ways, or so much thereof as they may deem best, to be graded and paved; to introduce the necessary sewerage and drainage facilities under and upon the whole or any portion of any avenue, street, or alley; to cause the same to be suitably paved and repaired, and at all times properly cleaned and watered; to cause lamps to be erected therein, and to light the same; and to pay the cost thereof, the corporation of Washington is hereby authorized to lay and collect a tax upon all property bordering upon each street or alley that may be paved, sewered, lighted, cleaned, or watered by said corporation in accordance with the provisions of this act. And also to lay, or cause to be laid, simultaneously with the grading or paving of any avenue, street, or alley in which a main water-pipe or main gas-pipe, or main sewer may have been laid, water or gas service pipes or lateral house drains, from such water or gas main or main sewer to one foot within the curb line in front of every lot or subdivisional part of a lot which may bound on such avenue, street, or alley, and to which a gas or water service pipe or house drain may not have been already laid; and to pay the cost thereof, shall have full power and authority to lay and collect a special tax on every such lot or subdivisional part of a lot."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in. The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLINTON LLOYD, Chief Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (H. R. No. 659) making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department during the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1866; which thereupon received the signature of the Vice President.

DEFICIENCY BILL.

The message further announced that the House of Representatives had passed a bill (H. R. No. 709) to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1865, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

Mr. SHERMAN. I desire to have that bill taken up now and read twice.

There being no objection, the bill was read twice by its title.

Mr. CLARK. I do not desire to have the bill referred. I think the Committee on Finance understand what it is. It can be laid on the table, and we will examine it and see if it is like the other, and then be prepared to act upon it without a reference to the committee.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That disposition will be made of it, if there be no objection.

MEXICAN AFFAIRS.

Mr. ANTHONY submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That five hundred additional copies of the correspondence on Mexican affairs, heretofore ordered, be printed for the use of the Senate.

COUNTING OF PRESIDENTIAL VOTES.

Mr. TRUMBULL submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That a committee consisting of three members be appointed by the President of the Senate, to join such committee as may be appointed by the House of Representatives, to ascertain and report a mode of examining the votes for President and Vice President of the United States, and of notifying the persons chosen of their election.

The VICE PRESIDENT appointed Messrs. TRUMBULL, CONNESS, and WRIGHT, as the committee on the part of the Senate.

CONDUCT OF GENERAL J. C. DAVIS TO NEGROES.

Mr. WILSON. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the committee on the conduct of the war be instructed to inquire into and report upon the action of Brevet Major General Jefferson C. Davis in preventing a number of negroes, who had joined the Army on the march through Georgia, from crossing a creek known as "Ebeneszer creek," near Savannah, by burning the bridge after the troops had crossed, on the night of the 8th of December last, many of these negroes having been killed by the rebel cavalry or drowned in attempting to cross the creek on rafts.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. I object; let it lie over.

Mr. WILSON. I do not desire to have the resolution considered this morning. I simply wish to send to the Chair a paper which I should like to have read, and then let the whole matter lie for investigation.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The paper will be read, if there be no objection.

Mr. GRIMES. I should like to know what the character of the paper is.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair cannot tell without its being read.

Mr. GRIMES. Let the whole thing lie over. If it is a paper attacking General Davis, and the officers and men under his command, it is not proper that it should be read in this connection.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection being made, the paper cannot be read, and the resolution will lie over.

PASSENGERS ON STEAMSHIPS.

Mr. CONNESS. I offer the following resolution, and desire its present consideration:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to instruct the collectors of customs to enforce the act entitled "An act to regulate the carriage of passengers in steamships and other vessels," approved March 3, 1855, and the act entitled "An act further to regulate the carriage of passengers in steam and other vessels," approved July 4, 1864, and all other existing acts of Congress relating to the carriage of passengers by steamships and other vessels.

Mr. CONNESS. I hold in my hand a paper addressed to the Senators and members of the House of Representatives in Congress from California and Oregon, signed by a very large number of the passengers on the late trip of the steamer Costa Rica from Aspinwall to New York, which I ask to have read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The paper will be read, if there be no objection.

The Secretary read, as follows:

ON BOARD THE STEAMER COSTA RICA,
AT SEA, January 3, 1865.

To the Senators and Members of the House of Representatives in Congress from California and Oregon:

We whose names are hereunto subscribed respectfully call your attention to the following statement:

We left San Francisco on the 13th of December last in the steamer Golden City.

We paid for tickets to New York in gold coin the sums charged for our passage. At Aspinwall we came on board this steamer, and have not been able, so great was the crowd, to obtain places to sleep. Some of us having no blankets have purchased them here. We have been compelled to sleep on deck, and been exposed to the severity of the weather, and to much suffering, at the risk of damaging health, and losing life. Few of us have the means or time to litigate for damages against rich men or rich corporations. We appeal to you and ask, if you cannot redress our grievances, that at least you will try to prevent the repetition of like outrage and cruelty to thousands of your constituents going by sea to California and Oregon. Not only sick men, but sick women and children, have been subjected to much suffering. We have other causes of complaint—such as have often been brought to public notice—but cannot dwell on them now.

We earnestly hope, by your efforts, to be able hereafter to boast that we have a Government whose laws are respected and obeyed by the most powerful and wealthiest men, while protection is afforded to the weakest and humblest American citizen.

Mr. CONNESS. Mr. President, I shall detain the Senate but a moment in reference to this subject. It will be observed that the petition of these passengers, detailing their sufferings by the trip referred to of the steamer Costa Rica, makes no charge of bad treatment or incapacity on the part of the ship upon which they traveled on the Pacific side; and I desire in what I shall say, which shall be very brief, to entirely exculpate and exonerate the Pacific Mail Steamship Company from any blame growing out of the management of their line and the carriage of passengers. On the contrary, I think they are entitled to commendation, which I am disposed to bear testimony to here. They furnish, in return for large prices charged for passage, the best mode of communication perhaps that is furnished out of any port of the United States of America to passengers. Their ships are large and commodious; they are built with all the modern conveniences, and with regard not only to comfort, but, to the extent that it can be secured, with regard to the perfect safety of the persons whom they take in charge.

The contrary, however, is the fact in regard to the ships composing what is known as the Atlantic Steamship Company, or, in other words, the company known as the Vanderbilt Company. It may be said with perfect truthfulness that there is not a ship going out of the port of New York and sailing for Aspinwall and back, of all the ships employed by that line, that is fit to get a clearance and go to sea. For perhaps more than two years past such steamships as the Ariel and the Champion, notoriously unfit and unseaworthy, have been employed by the company of which I have last spoken to transport passengers between these two ports, causing in the transit by sea the extremest sufferings as well as the greatest danger to the passengers intrusted to their charge. In many instances the voyages have been prolonged, and in every instance where passengers have offered in excess of the number allowed by law to go on board those ships and be carried by them, they have accepted them without any reference to whether they could accommodate them or not. I have myself made passages on their ships when the scene that was laid before my attention constantly was perfectly horrible to contemplate. Insufficient in regard to the quality of the ship, insufficient in regard to the amount of room proportioned to the number of passengers, insufficient in regard to the food furnished and its quality, insufficient in all respects, and scandalous to the American people that vessels in such a condition should be permitted to go out of such a port as the great commercial metropolis of America. But these things have gone on without cure or without remedy being applied.

It will be remembered that at the last session of Congress an act was passed which we now simply ask for the enforcement of. In conversation yesterday with the honorable Secretary of the Treasury on this subject, he said very promptly, "Introduce a resolution directing attention to the subject, and I will enforce the law." Our people will thank that officer for the readiness with which he is prepared to enter upon this important duty. There is no more crying abuse than that which exists at the present time upon this subject. The Oregon Senators, every citizen of the United States who travels by these lines, can bear testimony to the exact truthfulness of the statement made by these suffering passengers.

Not wishing to detain the Senate longer, I ask for action on the resolution.

Mr. NESMITH. I desire simply to concur in the statement by the Senator from California in relation to the treatment which passengers receive at the hands of those managing the company on this side, and I also concur in what he has stated in relation to the treatment which passengers receive at the hands of the company on the other side. Those who charge an exorbitant amount for passage should certainly treat passengers as men should be treated, and not as brutes. The transition from the ships on the other side to those on this side is like that from a palace to a pig-pen; and I understand that the responsibility rests upon a very wealthy gentleman of New York, Mr. Vanderbilt, who, by means of his great wealth, has been enabled to keep off all competition, while he has utterly refused to give the people such accommodations as they have paid for. Sir, the horrors of the passage on this side of the Isthmus—I have made it frequently and it has been so every occasion—have only been equalled by what we read of the terrible miseries suffered in the "middle passage" by the victims of the African slave trade. He has destroyed not only the comfort and the health but the lives of our people. He has grown rich by a monopoly which has caused the sacrifice of the lives of many of those who have attempted to make the trip from the Pacific to the Atlantic and from the Atlantic to the Pacific. I have understood that this company is not now in the hands of this man Vanderbilt; but at least he, or his son-in-law, Mr. Allen, at present has the control of it, and I believe that Mr. Allen is actuated by the same principle which governed Vanderbilt, and that is to grasp all the money he can, sacrifice the health, comfort, and lives of passengers, and render them no equivalent for what they pay.

I am very anxious to see the resolution adopted. I do not know that any beneficial result will grow out of it. I fear not; but as the Senator from California states that the Secretary of the Treasury has manifested every disposition to cooperate with or to enforce any resolution the Senate may adopt, I hope that we may effectuate something by the passage of this resolution. Let us try it at any rate, and test it. When we fail in that, we shall have to resort to some other measure to secure justice against a wealthy, unprincipled monopoly which cares nothing either for the life, the comfort, or the health of those committed to its charge for transportation.

The resolution was agreed to.

BILL RECOMMENDED.

On motion of Mr. HARLAN, the bill (H. R. No. 222) to extinguish the Indian title to lands in the Territory of Utah suitable for agricultural and mineral purposes, was recommended to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

QUOTAS OF THE STATES.

Mr. DAVIS. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War inform the Senate how many men in the aggregate, both for the military and naval service, have been recruited in each State, and how many negroes for such services have been recruited in each State, and how many negroes have been recruited in the State of Kentucky, and how many in each county in said State, giving under each head aggregate numbers.

Mr. SUMNER. I think that had better lie over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will lie over under the rules.

Mr. DAVIS. Allow me to make a single remark.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution is not open to remark, objection being made to its consideration.

Mr. DAVIS. I want the Senator from Massachusetts to withdraw his objection. I reckon he is at liberty to do that.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Certainly he is; and when he does so it will be time for the Senator from Kentucky to make his remarks.

Mr. DAVIS. The Chair interposed and would not give me an opportunity to ask the Senator to withdraw his objection. I hope he will withdraw it for a moment, and let the resolution be read again. I think he did not understand it.

Mr. SUMNER. I have no objection to its being read again, but I do not wish to lose the privilege of objecting.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there be no objection, the resolution will be again read.

Mr. SUMNER. For information.

The Secretary read the resolution.

Mr. WILSON. I desire simply to say that the Committee on Military Affairs—

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution is not open to any sort of discussion, the Senator's colleague having objected to its consideration.

Mr. DAVIS. Will the Senator from Massachusetts withdraw his objection, or will he insist upon it?

Mr. SUMNER. I would rather that the resolution lie over until to-morrow.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection being made, the resolution must lie over under the rules.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. LLOYD, Chief Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 94) for the relief of Isaac R. Diller, and to the amendment of the Senate to the joint resolution (H. R. No. 99) reserving mineral lands from the operation of all acts passed at the present session granting lands or extending the time of former grants; and had passed without amendment the bill (S. No. 363) to amend the charter of the Washington Gas-Light Company.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bill and joint resolutions, in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested:

A bill (H. R. No. 714) supplemental to the act entitled "An act to restrict the jurisdiction of the Court of Claims," &c., passed July 4, 1864;

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 150) to refer the claim of Selmar Seibert back to the Court of Claims;

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 151) to refer the claim of George Ashley, administrator de bonis non of Samuel Holgate, deceased, back to the Court of Claims; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 152) to refer the claim of Danford Mott back to the Court of Claims.

DEFICIENCY BILL.

Mr. CLARK. I ask the Senate now to take up the deficiency bill.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 709) to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the services of the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1865.

Mr. CLARK. I will state that, as I understand this bill, it is exactly like the deficiency bill which was before the Senate with the exception of the second section, which is substantially the same provision to which the Senate objected before, but in a little different form. I desire that that section of the bill be read to the Senate. It is a short section.

The section was read, as follows:

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That $38,000 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, to be added to the contingent fund of the House, to enable the House of Representatives to fulfill its pledges and obligations heretofore made, and the same shall be audited and settled on such vouchers as shall be produced by the Clerk of the House.

Mr. CLARK. This is in substance the same provision which the Senate twice struck out from the bill, but in a little different form. I move now that the bill be amended by striking out that second section; and on that question I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. JOHNSON. I ask the Senator from New Hampshire if the section which he proposes to strike out is identical with the one on which the Senate acted before?

Mr. CLARK. It is in substance the same, but it is in different form. The House of Representatives now propose that we shall allow them to add to their contingent fund such an amount as will enable them to pay their employes. Instead of a provision reporting it as a deficiency to pay their employes, they now ask to make it up to their contingent fund. It is only putting it in different form. The thing is the same under a different dress.

Mr. JOHNSON. Then it is not a provision for a deficiency?

Mr. CLARK. It is not a deficiency.

The yeas and nays being taken, resulted—yeas 33, nays 3; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Buckalew, Chandler, Clark-Conness, Davis, Dixon, Doolittle, Farwell, Foot, Foster, Grimes, Hale, Harlan, Harris, Henderson, Hendricks, Howe, Johnson, Lane of Indiana, Morgan, Morrill, Pomeroy, Powell, Ramsey, Sherman, Sprague, Sumner, Tea Eyck, Van Winkle, Wiley, Wilson, and Wright—33.

NAYS—Messrs. Richardson, Saulsbury, and Wade—3.

ABSENT—Messrs. Brown, Carlile, Collamer, Cowan, Harding, Hicks, Howard, Lane of Kansas, McDougall, Nesmith, Riddle, Trumbull, and Wilkinson—13.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in. It was ordered that the amendment be engrossed, and that the bill be read a third time. The bill was read the third time, and passed.

RETALIATION ON REBEL PRISONERS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (S. R. No. 97) advising retaliation for the cruel treatment of prisoners by the insurgents, the pending question being on Mr. Wilson's motion to recommit it to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, at the adjournment of the Senate yesterday I was referring to the fact that as far as I was then advised, or, indeed, as I am now advised, there is not before us any official evidence that the cruelties practiced upon our prisoners which are mentioned in the report of the 5th of May, 1864, have been continued since. I was told by the honorable member from Connecticut [Mr. Foster] that he had it from one who had belonged to the Army, and who was unfortunate enough to be captured and imprisoned in one of the prisons in South Carolina, that there was, to a certain extent, at least, cruelty as far as cruelty consists in failing to give the prisoners a sufficient ration. What I meant, however, was that we have no official evidence other than what is contained in the report of May 5, 1864, that the outrages which are hypothetically stated, though stated as facts in the resolution reported by the committee, have been perpetrated since that report.

The honorable member from Ohio, [Mr. Wade], who was one of the committee by whom the report of May 5, 1864, was made, interrupted me yesterday by saying that there had been an antecedent report in which evidence was presented to the Senate of other outrages of the same description. The purpose for which I referred to the report of May 5, 1864, is rather strengthened than weakened by that fact, because it appears that even prior to the 5th of May, 1864, the Senate, and of course the committee, whose business it had been to examine into the facts, were advised that these cruelties had been practiced; and yet from that time until a few days since, I am not aware that any measures have been recommended by the committee or any member of the Senate, looking to a resort to such a system as is proposed either by the resolution introduced by the honorable member himself, or by the report made by the committee to whom that resolution was referred. I suppose, Mr. President—and they had a right to rely upon it—that the members of the committee, including my friend from Ohio, were under the impression that the President of the United States would take all proper steps to arrest these barbarous acts as against our own men.

Now, assuming as I do, notwithstanding what has fallen from the Senator from Connecticut, that the barbarities spoken of in the resolution now before the Senate were practiced some time ago, that we have no evidence that they are now being repeated, I submit as a clear proposition of national law that whatever may be the extent of the right to retaliate in order to prevent continuing outrages, it does not apply to a case of antecedent outrages, because so to apply it is to punish what is past and not for the purpose of preventing the recurrence of the same things in the future. It is (if the honorable member will permit me so to say) revenge and not retaliation. Conceding for argument's sake, and I make the concession only for that purpose, that there exists a right under the laws of nations to starve the prisoners who are in our hands, to torture them short of starvation, to subject them to the inclemency of the weather and to kill them by force of the elements, or to use as against them every possible mode of human torture to which the ingenuity of man may resort, assuming that such power exists under the laws of nations, I think I am safe in saying that that power has never been exerted for the purpose merely of punishing prior outrages of the same description.

In a case of that kind the law assumes that the belligerent who has been guilty of such outrages has waked up to a sense of duty; he has dropped his character of savage and barbarian, and he has reassumed that of a Christian or of civilized men; he has since that, so far from promoting the purpose which he had in view by conduct of that description furthering the advance of his own cause, he has pursued a policy more fatal to him than anything that the enemy could do; and he must feel, or is supposed to feel, that in the judgment of the civilized world he stands condemned, and that of itself is, in the case in which the outrages have not been continued, supposed to be the cause, and a sufficient cause for their termination.

The honorable member says, and no one who knows him doubts him, that he is as far from entertaining any inhuman feeling, or seeking to accomplish any inhuman purpose as any member of the Senate or any man to be found anywhere. I certainly do not doubt it. He thinks, however, that a sense of duty in the case which he supposes to exist would compel him to do what is against his better nature, and to aid in the perpetration of horrors at which his original nature would stand shocked; but he would do it from a sense of duty. Then in order to enable himself, or any person who may be put to the discharge of a function of that description to do it at all, he must be satisfied that it is necessary to do it; and if in the particular case the outrages of which he complains are now no longer being perpetrated, and we have no evidence before us that it is the purpose of the enemy to perpetrate them in the future, how can it be that he will forget the humanity which God has written upon his heart?

Mr. WADE. I think, if the Senator will read the resolution that is now before the body, and the amendment pending, it will save him the necessity of making all that argument. There is nothing in it about punishing or retaliating for anything that has been done, and if there is nothing of this sort doing now, then there will be no retaliation. That is all there is about it.

Mr. JOHNSON. I will speak of that by and by. What the honorable Senator himself proposed was to commence the work of torture at once. What the committee proposed was to commence the work of torture at once. The effect of the amendment which he suggests is to leave it to the President to commence the work of torture at once. That is a power I would not give to any living man.

That I am right in the view I take of the original proposition of the honorable member, and of that of the committee, and of the proposition which he proposes in the amendment that he suggests, I will show the Senate in a moment; but I assume now that I am right; and the honorable member's interruption—kind interruption, I am sure—of me shows that even he could not bring himself to punish in this way for enormities in the past, not being repeated, and without any evidence that it is the purpose of the rebel enemy to repeat them.

You punish, by your penal laws in a case of murder, by hanging the culprit because he is the guilty party, and because it is necessary that he should be hung in order to guard against the repetition of like offenses by others. But if, in point of fact, it was possible to ascertain—a murder being once committed—that no murders would be committed in the future, and that the man might be permitted to live, the law of nature and of nature's God would say, and does say, let him live. If we could read his heart and see that it was entirely changed, that he never would repeat the offense, and we could be satisfied, by reading the hearts of the community, that such an offense would never be perpetrated by any member of the community, it would be cruelty in the extreme to take the life of him who had offended, and repented, under such circumstances.

Now, what is the resolution? My friend, saying, no doubt, what he believed he could do under such circumstances in the resolution which he proposed, felt, and well he might feel, that the duty which he was about to impose upon those to whose custody these prisoners were to be subjected was a duty hard, if not impossible, to perform; and he therefore provided that the officer who declined to carry out the punishment prescribed to the very letter should at once be stricken from the rolls of the Army.

Mr. WADE. I perceive the Senator is going upon a false hypothesis. I would stand now, if I could, for the original resolution, for I believe it to be exactly right, and I only yield on account of weak brethren. [Laughter.]

Mr. JOHNSON. The "weak brethren" will be able, I suppose, to take care of themselves, providing they will agree with the honorable member from Ohio that they are "weak brethren." I do not know what his idea of weakness is, but I should think that my friend from Michigan, [Mr. Howard,] in relation to this measure, was anything but a "weak brother." I think he has gone to the whole extent that any man born a Christian could go. I have not heard anything from the honorable member from Michigan, [Mr. Chandler,] and who, I believe, is a member of the same committee with the member from Ohio, that induces me to think that in this particular he can be considered a "weak brother." If they do not go as far as the farthest, they go as far as any other man living, except the honorable member from Ohio. He is farther than the farthest.

But I have referred to it, Mr. President, for the pose of showing what the original proposition was, and how my friend from Ohio, although satisfied, as he has told us, that he could discharge that duty, when he came to read his own heart in the solitude of his own room, and then that resolution, felt that there was something in the nature of the duty which he was calling upon an officer of the United States to discharge so revolting that he could not be made to discharge it, and he provided for the failure to discharge it by clothing the President not only with the power, but making it his duty to dismiss such an officer at once from the service.

Having said as much as I propose to say of the proposition first suggested by my friend from Ohio, I come to the proposition as reported from the committee, which is almost precisely the same in words, and is substantially identical with the original resolution offered by the member from Ohio, except that it omits the provision that the officer is to be dismissed if he does not perform his duty, and announces to the President that it is not the purpose of Congress in passing the resolution to make it obligatory upon him; but we are asked to say to him that it is his duty to resort to this measure. We are to tell him that a resort to this measure is absolutely necessary in order to put an end to the barbarities being practiced upon our own prisoners; and under some doubt—I do not stop to inquire whether it was well founded or not—of the authority of Congress by legislation to interfere with the President at all in relation to such duties as are stated in this resolution, it concludes with saying that it is to be understood merely as advising the President, and not as controlling him. Advising him to do what? The honorable member from Missouri, [Mr. Brown,] whom I do not now see in his seat, the other day said that it was not the purpose of the committee to suggest to the President the propriety of proceeding at once to the execution of this duty of retaliation; and he found, as he supposed, a reason for that construction in the latter clause of the resolution which declares that the resolution itself is designed to be merely advisory to the President. That is true; but what is the advice? What are we asked to do? What is every individual Senator asked to do? To advise the President that in our opinion he should proceed at once to starve, to torture, to assassinate, to freeze to death the prisoners who are in our own hands. The language of the resolution, not the preamble, is:

That in the judgment of Congress it has become justifiable and necessary that the President should, in order to prevent the continuance and recurrence of such barbarities, and to insure the observance by the insurgents of the laws of civilized war, resort at once to measures of retaliation; that in our opinion such retaliation ought to be inflicted upon the insurgent officers now in our hands, or hereafter to fall into our hands as prisoners; that such officers ought to be subjected to like treatment practiced toward our officers or soldiers in the hands of the insurgents, in respect to quantity and quality of food, clothing, fuel, medicine, medical attendance, personal exposure.

And every other mode of dealing such as our prisoners have been treated with in the hands of the insurgents. The President is advised to do that at once. My friend from Ohio, to assist his "weaker brethren," by the amendment which he sent up to the Chair the day before yesterday, and which is now before us, makes it not a matter of advice to the President, but the obligation of the President. He proposes that the President shall be not only advised, but directed to pursue the policy mentioned in the resolution, and we assume that it is in the power of Congress in a matter of this sort to control the President in the management of prisoners. He does not mean to leave to the President any discretion. I speak now of the original amendment. His present amendment bearing upon this subject I will recur to in a moment. He says the President shall at once starve, torture, poison, refuse medicine to the sick, and surgical attendance to the wounded prisoners of the enemy, and if all will not do, if we become tired of the slowness of the remedy, the President is directed to have the poor victim of the chances of war assassinated.

Now, Mr. President, what is the other amendment proposed by the member from Ohio?

Mr. WADE. I have offered but one.

Mr. JOHNSON. I mean the other part of the amendment. You have offered one; but that is made up of two provisions.

Mr. WADE. It is one amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON. It is one amendment, but there is always in every good thing, and the Senator intends this as a good thing, more than one proposition. He proposes to strike out all that part of the original resolution which directs the President to subject the prisoners taken from the enemy to precisely the same kind of treatment that our prisoners receive, and to substitute for it what I will read:

And that the executive and military authorities of the United States are hereby directed—to retaliate upon the prisoners of the enemy in such manner and kind as shall be effective in deterring him from the perpetration in future of cruel and barbarous treatment of our soldiers.

Not "as he shall judge to be effective," but "as shall be effective." He does not leave it to the President to decide whether any such measures of retaliation are necessary; he directs him to retaliate upon the prisoners of the enemy "in such manner and kind as shall be effective." What will the President have a right to say? The Senate of the United States have before them a proposition to retaliate in kind, starvation for starvation, torture for torture, assassination for assassination, exposure for exposure, and we are about to tell him that he must take the subject into his own hands, and measure out precisely the degree of punishment to prisoners in our hands as he shall deem necessary to prevent a recurrence of like enormities upon our prisoners in their hands. When is he to do it? The honorable member says it was not his purpose, nor will that be the effect of the resolution, to commence the work of retaliation at once, not to punish for past offenses. I certainly have no right and would be the last man in the Senate to question the sincerity of any purpose that the honorable Senator says he entertains; but I submit to him whether, if his amendment should be adopted as he proposes, the President is not to resort forthwith to retaliation. If his amendment striking out and inserting should be adopted, the resolution will read:

That in the judgment of Congress it has become justifiable and necessary that the President should, in order to prevent the continuance and recurrence of such barbarities, and to insure the observance by the insurgents of the laws of civilized war, resort at once to measures of retaliation.

Then comes in his amendment that the President shall adopt such measures as shall be effective. I have a right to assume that the President is as patriotic as the honorable member from Ohio; that he is as anxious to put an end to these barbarities as any member of the Senate; and that he may, therefore, do precisely what the honorable member tells us he will do. That, as I said just now, is a power I would not give to the President. I would not let him, if I could prevent it, resort to measures of retaliation of this description; and yet it is manifest that if we adopt a measure such as this will be after it shall have been amended as proposed by the honorable member from Ohio, the President will be directed at once to retaliate. Retaliate how? "In kind," and that is what the honorable Senator means. He is to retaliate in kind; so that at last we come up to the question; first, whether, if we had the power, it is expedient to exercise it; second, whether we have the power. By power I mean the right.

Now, is it expedient to exert it even if we have the legal power to exert it? The honorable member assumes that the starvation of the four or five thousand, or the twenty or thirty thousand, or whatever may be the number of prisoners now in our hands, will prevent the starvation of the thousands who are in the hands of the enemy or may hereafter come into the hands of the rebel enemy. Does he know it? Who can? If the rebel government was privy to the enormities practiced upon our prisoners, they are to be restrained by no moral restraint. Everybody will concede that. They are brutes in the form of man; they are savages worse than the wildest Indian that ever ran loose on the prairies; and nothing like moral restraint will prevent their continuing these barbarities. Suppose they do; are we to continue them? Then what will the world say? What would any man say if he had the power in his own hands? What will the voice of Christian civilization say? That such barbarities must be arrested. Other nations have an interest in it. They cannot stand by and see the people of the United States become a band of savages, not fighting in honorable warfare, meeting the foe face to face, but after he has succumbed and yielded to the power exerted against him by either side and gets into the hands of either party, the work of extermination is to begin in the most odious and disgusting form ever known to civilized man. Would not one man, if a Christian, having the power, arrest it? Who can doubt that? Will not the nations of Christendom be called upon to arrest it? Will the God of justice fail to proclaim that it is their duty to arrest it?

But then what is to become of the Union? Where is the struggle to end? From the first I never doubted how it would end if conducted upon high, elevated principle. I never for a moment questioned that the time would come, and as I think it should have come before, and would have come before if the armies of the United States had been properly used, but that the time was sure to come when the rebellion would be frustrated and the authority of the Government reinstated; and no matter what may happen, no matter what course from time to time the United States or the rebels may adopt, I shall continue to entertain the same expectation, and shall continue till the last ray of hope is extinguished in the darkness of perpetual night. But let us turn as against each other the arts of the savage; let us proclaim war to the knife, and, what is but little worse, a resort to such measures as are contemplated by this resolution, and the other side continue to meet us in the same way—I speak it with due respect to those who entertain a different opinion about this resolution—we shall no longer have the support of the God of justice; the war ought to cease; the destruction of the Union, the end of the freest constitutional Government that ever existed will have come, and ought to come if it is to be supported only by a resort to savage methods.

If we began this career, and if we should stop at the end of a year or two or three or ten years, what sort of a Union should we have? How long could we live together with a Union so restored? Years in the life of a Government are but as moments. How long would it be that the honorable member's descendants, and my descendants, if it were possible to suppose that we were on opposite sides of this rebellion, and he and I resorted to such a course as is recommended by these resolutions—how long would it be before our descendants, after a temporary arrest, should have occurred, would again be cutting each other's throats, trying to see which could starve the soonest, trying who was most expert in the arts of assassination, who could torture most, who could starve slowest, who could expose longest to the destructive influence of the elements, who could keep alive longest by refusing surgical and medical aid to the prisoner whom he may get into his hands? Success in such a contest—my friend will pardon me for saying it—is but infamy.

Then as a matter of policy, if I am right, assuming the power to exist, we ought not to adopt it. Have we the power? The honorable member from Ohio, my friend from Michigan, and the honorable member from Missouri [Mr. Brown] have told us, and told us properly, that the right to retaliate is recognized by the laws of war. We all know that.

Mr. WADE. Then what are you debating about?

Mr. JOHNSON. The question is as to the extent that you say the right goes. Like all other rights—

Mr. WADE. If you stop short of making it effectual, you had better not begin.

Mr. JOHNSON. Perhaps not. I will speak of that by and by. There are some things that should not be accomplished at all if they cannot be accomplished except by the perpetration of an enormous crime. The power of retaliation exists as a right of war, everybody admits; but has it no limitation in this age of the world? My friend from Michigan has told us that he has gone through all the authorities cited by Halleck in his system of international law, and he has looked everywhere else to find whether there was any authority that limits the exercise of this right of retaliation, and has found no authority which looks to such a limitation. The honorable member is clearly mistaken.

Mr. HOWARD. "Limited by necessity" was my language.

Mr. JOHNSON. Then necessity limits it?

Mr. HOWARD. That is what I said; and that is the only limit.

Mr. JOHNSON. So I understood you; and now, with due deference to the better judgment and greater research of the honorable member from Michigan, I say, and should say with perfect confidence, if he had not expressed a different opinion, that there is a very clear and defined limit. You can retaliate to accomplish a purpose in such cases, but there are cases in which you have no right to retaliate in kind; and just in proportion as the honorable member from Michigan described graphically, so as to excite the indignation of all, the enormities practiced upon our prisoners, just in that proportion did he go to prove that there was no authority to retaliate. The necessity in the contemplation of the law of nations terminates when retaliation becomes cruelty, and offensive to the laws of God and man. Let me imagine a case. I speak to humane men; I speak to Christian men. Suppose these rebels were to burn five hundred of our prisoners at the stake; would you burn five hundred? Can you find any book which will justify you in saying that you could retaliate in that way?

Mr. HOWARD. Does the Senator from Maryland desire an answer?

Mr. JOHNSON. Certainly.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. President, in such a distressing case as that to which the Senator has alluded, if I were a commander in the field I should certainly forbear as long as reason and my duty to my country and my countrymen would allow; but should I finally discover that it was the persistent purpose of the enemy to burn my prisoners who should fall into his hands, if he should repeat the process so many times as to make it perfectly obvious to me that that was his settled usage and rule of conduct, and if I should discover to my own satisfaction that the only effectual mode of arresting the outrage was to punish his prisoners in my hands in kind, horrible and revolting as the spectacle might be, I should feel it my duty to my country and to my army to burn his prisoners also. I should regard the necessity of the case as the only limit to the rule, because (if the Senator will allow me) there must be some way of restraining and punishing and preventing these terrible barbarities; and the only way, as I said before, it seems to me, would be to punish in kind, after having waited a reasonable length of time and resorted to all other reasonable modes of preventing the evil.

Mr. JOHNSON. I do not think after that that my friend from Ohio can say the honorable Senator from Michigan is a "weak brother."

Mr. HOWARD. No, sir; not a bit of it.

Mr. WADE. I did not say he was before. I said there were weak brothers. I did not designate them.

Mr. JOHNSON. He is not one of them, certainly. Then suppose the enemy were contenting with were savages, and they put their prisoners to the stake, subject to the slow fire, and, to make the punishment as they think more effectual, dance around the prisoner while he is burning to death. My friend from Michigan, I suppose, if he was directed to perform the duty, and the recurrence of the same outrages could not be prevented in any other way, would be found leading the dance! "Necessary," says the honorable member. The savage thinks it necessary, and the dance in the eyes of the barbarian is that which gives poignancy to the punishment. Nothing else will do it; he is to get his platoon or his regiment of soldiers around the funeral pile, and my friend will lead in the dance! How long would he be able to continue it without falling down in very shame and calling upon God to pardon him?

Mr. HOWARD. The dance is mere savagery of the process.

Mr. JOHNSON. There is nothing savage in the burning itself; the burning is a great deal more innocent than the dance! I should rather think that of the two the dance was much the more innocent.

But, Mr. President, I have said all that I proposed to say upon that, except to add that, highly as I esteem the authority of my friend from Michigan, who is fresh from the books, and in the daily habit of applying, and successfully applying, his knowledge on this particular branch of jurisprudence, I am rather inclined to lean with somewhat of more confidence upon the opinion of Professor Lieber. He is not only a jurist in the general acceptance of the term, but he is a publicist of the highest possible reputation. His thoughts have been turned to this subject from the commencement of the war; that is to say, have been turned to the subject of the manner in which the war was to be carried on; they have been specially directed of late to this particular measure; and he tells us that there is not only no such principle to be found in the doctrine of retaliation as known to international jurisprudence, but that it is abhorrent to that doctrine.

Mr. HOWARD. He expressly admits the doctrine of retaliation.

Mr. JOHNSON. Of course he does; so do I; and the only difference between us is how far are you to go. The honorable member from Michigan maintains that there is no limitation except such as you may think necessary to accomplish the purpose. The law says there is a limitation, and the power terminates at cruelty.

Mr. WADE. There is no necessity before cruelty begins.

Mr. JOHNSON. I mean savage and barbarous cruelty, such as has never been practiced, at least since the termination of the sixteenth century; but if I had any doubt whether I could rely with more confidence upon the opinion of Professor Lieber than upon the opinion of the honorable member from Michigan, that doubt would be removed if I could find that the opinion of Professor Lieber was supported by that of Chancellor Kent. I need not cite the passage referred to by my friend from Massachusetts, [Mr. SUMNER,] in which Chancellor Kent tells us that according to the modern laws of war the ancient doctrine no longer exists. At one time the indiscriminate slaughter of the prisoners was supposed to be the right of war. At another time, the first step in civilization, the captor might sell them as slaves. At another time, civilization still going on, he could discharge them upon ransom. Still progressing under the mild but powerful influence of the doctrines taught by the Saviour of men, the principle of exchange took its place. The world has become humanized. The cause of His advent upon earth was to humanize, to civilize, to change man's corrupt nature; to make man what God intended him to be, a brother and not a savage. And since the termination of the sixteenth century I defy the honorable member from Michigan to point out a single instance in which retaliation anything like that which is proposed in this resolution has ever been resorted to.

He quoted the act of 1813, passed under the Administration of Mr. Madison during the war of 1812. I do not know that the honorable member read it; but the retaliation authorized there was a retaliation—I use nearly the words of the act—that should be consistent with the rules of civilized war. Let me be sure that I am correct as to the phraseology of that act. It is the first section:

"The President is hereby authorized to cause full and ample retaliation to be made"—

How? To what extent? To the extent that may be necessary to accomplish the purpose? No—

"full and ample retaliation to be made, according to the laws and usages of war"—

Among savages? No—
"among civilized nations."

So at last that act brings us back to the question, what, according to the laws of civilized nations, can be done under the system of retaliation? If I am right, it cannot be carried to the extent proposed by this resolution.

Now a word, before I close, as to the particular question before the Senate. The honorable member from Massachusetts [Mr. WILSON] suggests a recommitment of the whole subject to a committee. To that I have no individual objection. I think it very likely it would result in bringing before us a proposition in which we could all unite; but his colleague [Mr. SUMNER] a few days ago introduced a series of resolutions by way of amendment, and for those I could vote with great pleasure; they state, as I think, very correctly the true doctrine. My friend from New Hampshire [Mr. CLARK] has an amendment to which I object, because, as I think, it is so couched as to give the President the right to retaliate precisely in the same way in which we say retaliation shall be carried on by the original resolution. The honorable member from Missouri [Mr. HENDERSON] proposes the appointment of a commission. Why should we not have it? My friend from Ohio [Mr. WADE] tells us he is not for sending any commission to that rebel and political apostate, Jeff. Davis. Why not? It is too late now to debate whether we should consider this war as a war to be conducted on principles applicable to an international war, so far as relates to the manner in which prisoners are to be treated. Exchanges have been carried on, and if the object of the commission as proposed by the honorable Senator from Missouri is to effect a remedy for the wrongs of which we have been complaining, through the instrumentality of a commission, what possible objection can there be? Whether we are to enter into a negotiation which is to lead to peace is quite another question.

Before the late political campaign, if I may be permitted to go out of the subject immediately under debate, one of the political parties of the day suggested as a part of their platform the commencement of a negotiation to terminate the struggle; and that was very violently opposed and denounced by those who supported the reelection of the then incumbent and now incumbent of the presidential chair. It was considered almost evidence of treason. And yet if my friend from Ohio is right in his conjecture, and I take it for granted he is right, a minister almost plenipotentiary has gone down there for the purpose of some negotiation which is to look to a termination of the war. If the President of the United States has the power to send down a commissioner to negotiate with these rebel authorities in order to terminate the war, what possible objection can we have (falling short of him in that particular) to constitute a commission for the purpose of ascertaining whether the barbarities to our prisoners, of which we complain, may not be arrested and the condition of the prisoners on each side very much ameliorated? I can see none.

Now, let it not be for a moment understood, either by the members of the committee or by those who differ from me and differ from those with whom I concur, that we are not anxious to put an end to the cruelty to these prisoners. I have heard of cruelty practiced by some of our own subordinates on prisoners in our hands. I have heard of some being shot here within sight of the Capitol for looking out of a window. I have heard of thousands dying by improper treatment. To a certain extent, I fear, these things are true. In a war like this it is impossible to have always fit men in office; there will be brutes found on both sides; and would to God that I could believe we have not had a few on our own side. We denounce them when we discover them; but the enormities which they perpetrate are perpetrated before there is any discovery. What I want, therefore, is such a system of exchange as may put an end to these cruelties in the future, leaving the past where it is, leaving the rebel government, if they have resorted to the enormities stated in this resolution, as I have no doubt they have, to the judgment of the civilized world, which will pronounce a judgment of infamy against all who are concerned in them. Leave it to stand where it is. Take care of the future, and let the past take care of itself, or, if possible, be forgotten.

Mr. President, I think that there is very great cause of censure somewhere for the failure to exchange prisoners. The honorable member from Iowa [Mr. HARLAN] says, and no doubt he is right in point of law, that there is no obligation under the laws of nations to exchange at all. That I admit. It is a question for each of the belligerents to decide for himself, whether it will be advantageous to him, looking to a successful termination of the war, to exchange. He is right in saying that there are cases in which, if a belligerent thinks it is better for him to keep the prisoners he has, than to get back those of his own army that the other belligerent has, he may pursue that course. That is the strict right; but my friend from Iowa will find, if he looks at the books upon the subject, that there is connected with it this principle, that there exists in such cases the highest moral obligation to take care of your own men when they shall be captured, and to rescue them from the captivity to which they have been subjected. Going upon the field, risking their lives in your defense, and by the chances of battle becoming the prisoners of the enemy, the books say that it is the highest duty (not as between one belligerent and the other, but the highest duty as between the belligerent whose prisoners have been captured and the prisoners) to resort to every possible step to rescue them from their sufferings.

I am not here to censure the President of the United States; I do not know that he has not done everything that he could do; but I mean to say this, (pronouncing the opinion hypothetically,) that if he has purposely refused to exchange upon any ground that the exchange would inure more to the benefit of the enemy than of ourselves, he has perpetrated a high crime as against the soldiers of the United States; and if the difficulty attending the exchange is of another description, if he refused upon the ground that the enemy would not deliver the Africans whom they have taken in battle, while they were willing to exchange man for man of white soldiers, he has committed almost as great a crime. It by no means follows, because he cannot relieve the sufferings of a black soldier, that if he has the power to relieve the sufferings of the white soldier he should not exert it. The black is in no worse condition by rescuing the white. He is in a better condition, for when the white is rescued the armies of the United States are replenished. Now, whatever may have been the cause of the failure to exchange I do not know with anything like certainty. My opinion is that there is nothing which should have prevented an exchange; and if the President of the United States was advised that these enormities were being practiced, our men being starved and tortured and assassinated, and he had reason to believe that that system of barbarity was to be continued, then he committed if possible a still higher crime in not resorting to a system of exchange if he could resort to it. But, as I have said, I have no purpose of finding fault with the President of the United States.

I do not entirely agree with the honorable Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. COWAN,] who supposes that we have no authority to legislate on this subject. I think over the exchange of prisoners and the treatment of prisoners Congress has authority. The executive duty is to carry out the laws of the United States passed in pursuance of the authority conferred upon the Congress of the United States by the Constitution; and, as I think, among the laws which Congress are authorized to pass, is a law to provide for the manner in which prisoners shall be treated, and if Congress shall so legislate, it will be the duty of the President to carry out its provisions.

I conclude then, Mr. President, with saying that I shall vote for the reference suggested, and when the subject shall be before the Senate again, if the proposition shall come in a form which is to apply the doctrine of retaliation prospectively, without empowering the President to go beyond the limits to which I think the doctrine is subject, I shall vote for the proposition.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, I have listened to this debate with a good deal of interest. I purposed in the outset of it to give my vote for this resolution; and seeing the resistance which it met, and the sources from which that resistance came, I felt under obligation to listen with a view of informing myself, if it were possible to do so from the debate, how and wherein I was wrong, if I was wrong. I certainly would not support this resolution if I believed with the Senator from Maryland that the effect of it would be to muster out of our service the God of justice. I am very grateful for the favor He has shown us so far during this controversy, and I certainly do not wish to disband Him. But I do not believe it. I think the mistake that arises, both in our own contemplation of the subject and in what is supposed to be His contemplation of it, arises from the fact that we do not rightly consider what the evil is which we wish to relieve.

This resolution has been debated from the beginning on the part of those who have opposed it as if it were a bill for starving human beings. Now, I do not so regard it. I look upon it as a bill to prevent the starving of human beings; and the two questions to be considered, therefore, are, first, whether starving human beings is right? and second, whether this measure is calculated to put an end to it? I believe there is a very general agreement on the part of the Senators who have engaged in this debate that starvation is not quite a proper thing. It is almost the only subject on which I have ever known the Senate to be unanimous, and I think I need not spend any time to elucidate that point.

Will this measure proposed here have a tendency to put an end to it? If it will, it is no use to call it barbarous, for it is not. If it will put an end to starvation, it is no use to call it cruel, for it is not. If it will put an end to starvation, it is no use to characterize it as inhuman, for it is not inhuman; it is the very height of humanity. What is the evil before which we are placed, and which we must eradicate? It is not that our soldiers have been exposed; it is not that they have been starved; it is not that they have been assassinated. That is evil enough, God knows; but that is an evil which we cannot redress; it is an evil which I am profoundly grateful to know that He can redress, and I am profoundly happy to believe that in His own good time He will redress it; and I agree with the Senator from Maryland that to that redress we should leave these crimes. But this is the evil with which we have to do: that to-day—not yesterday nor last year, but to-day—men who have fought and bled for this Union and its flag are exposed to suns and to rains, to heats and to frosts, without shelter; that to-day they are without clothing and without food; that to-day they are fed with food which poisons and which does not nourish. This is the evil with which we have to do; and how will you deal with it? That is the question which the Senate is to determine.

The propositions are various. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SUMNER] proposes to pass a resolution, a joint resolution of the two Houses of Congress, calling it naughty—"barbarous," I think, is his language—and to stop there. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WILSON] proposes negotiation with the men who perpetrate these enormities. The resolution before us proposes a different remedy. It proposes to say to the authors of these iniquities, to those who continue them to-day, "Put our exposed soldiers under cover, or the men who have fought your battles shall be turned out to the storm." It proposes to say to them, "Give our starving men food and drink, or we will take from the lips of the men who have fought your battles food and drink; do what humanity demands at your hands, or we will do to yours what will compel you to be human." This is all there is of it. There is not a word that is retrospective. There is not an idea that is punitive. It lets the past alone; it deals only with the future.

Now, sir, what is the objection to saying this? The Senator from Maryland who has just taken his seat has argued that it is inhuman to say these things, to propose these measures; and why? Because the enormities practiced upon our soldiery are so great, the cruelties are so monstrous, that it would shock ourselves, it would shock civilization, for us to assume to retaliate. He paints the horrors which all admit are every day witnessed in these pens and open fields where our soldiers are confined. He holds them up to shock us. He anticipates our Government practicing like enormities toward prisoners in our hands, and he demands to know what the world would say of such conduct in us; nay, he asks what would any man say who held the powers of the world. Well, Mr. President, I should like to know. The Senator did not himself tell us what the world would say, nor what a man would say under such circumstances. I wish he were here now to tell us himself.

But what is the fact? If this resolution be passed, we do not mete out rations to these prisoners. Why? Because our prisoners in their hands are starving. We say to them, "Give our prisoners meat and give them bread, and here is meat and here is bread for your men; we do not mete out these rations because our men in your hands are not fed." What will the world say? Will the civilized world tell us under those circumstances, "No matter what the rebels do, feed the men in your hands; no matter that your men are dying daily of starvation, deliver your rations regularly to the prisoners in your hands?" Will the civilized world say that to us?

First, I do not believe it, and secondly, if they did say it, it is a proposition upon which I would fight the civilized world as quick as any proposition I ever heard stated. Tell us to turn indifferently from the fact that starvation and death from every form of exposure is the daily event among our men—command us to that measure of indifference! No, sir, I could not be commanded that far, and I rescue civilization from the suspicion that such would be its decision. They would say to these brutes, as they were forcibly called by the Senator from Maryland, these brutes in human form, "Cease to be brutes, which your form does not permit, and begin to be men, which your form demands at your hands; stop these cruelties which have been your practice for years; feed the men in your hands, and then the men you care for will be fed; be human yourself, and inhumanity ceases." That I think would be the decree of the civilized world, and I am sure that any human being who held in himself the powers of the world would pronounce such a judgment.

I did not mean to occupy any time in elaborating this matter, and I shall not now. It seems to me plain and simple. It is urged, not as an inhuman measure, but it is urged in the name of humanity.

One other remedy is suggested for this evil, and that is that exchanges should be made of the prisoners in our hands for the prisoners in the hands of the enemy. Unquestionably, Mr. President, exchanges should be made as fast as they can be made; but exchanges cannot be made without the consent of the enemy, and when the enemy consents, exchanges cannot be made in a moment; and if to-day all the prisoners who now languish in dens were returned to us, while the war lasts the enemy is liable to take prisoners. Throughout this debate those who have insisted upon the necessity of making exchanges have held up the present Administration as the cause why exchanges have not been made. I do not hold them guilty of that, Mr. President, and it was more for the purpose of calling the attention of the Senate to a few facts in reference to the question of exchanges that I consented to speak at all on this occasion.

It is now assumed, not merely that the Administration is the party which refuses to make exchanges, but that it refuses to make exchanges for no other reason than that the rebel authorities will not consent to the surrender of the colored soldiers in their hands. In answer to that, I say that up to the 27th of December, 1863, exchanges were being made with considerable regularity; that on that day the agent of exchanges, as I believe he is styled, on the part of the confederate States addressed this letter to Major John E. Mulford, the assistant agent of exchange on the part of the United States:

CONFEDERATE STATES OF AMERICA,
WAR DEPARTMENT, RICHMOND, VIRGINIA,
December 27, 1863.

SIR: I have received your letter announcing your arrival with confederate prisoners. I have this day forwarded to you an equal or greater number of Federal prisoners.

I received with your letter several communications from Major General Butler. In no one of them is it stated that the United States Government is willing to resume the cartel and deliver all of our prisoners now in captivity, the excess on either side to be on parole. I have more than once expressed the entire willingness of the confederate government to deliver the Federal prisoners now in our hands, provided the United States authorities will deliver the confederate prisoners in their hands. This is the provision of the cartel, and we can accept nothing less. Unless this is the distinct understanding, no equivalent will be delivered to you for any confederate officers and soldiers whom you may hereafter bring to City Point. In the hope that such is the understanding, I have directed that a number greater than the total of your delivery shall be sent to you.

Respectfully, your obedient servant,

ROBERT OULD,
Agent of Exchange.

Major JOHN E. MULFORD, Assistant Agent of Exchange.

Upon the authority of this letter, then, I say that there was no difficulty with the rebel authorities about the exchange of colored soldiers; they were willing to deliver all the prisoners they had in their hands, if we would deliver all we had in our hands. The simple difficulty was that our Government, believing that the rebel authorities had violated most grossly the paroles taken of the prisoners captured at Vicksburg, refused any longer to take the paroles of prisoners. It was upon that point that the authorities divided, and it was for that reason that exchanges stopped. "Unless you will deliver them all," said the rebel agent, "all in your hands, it will be useless for you to send more to City Point, for no equivalent will be returned for them."

Mr. DAVIS. Will my honorable friend allow me a moment to give him information?

Mr. HOWE. Certainly.

Mr. DAVIS. In my remarks yesterday I assumed that our authorities had had opportunities to exchange white prisoners for white prisoners, and that they had refused to do so because the rebel authorities declined to exchange negro prisoners and their officers. I will now read some authority on that point. The honorable Senator from Wisconsin, I suppose, holds in his hands the same document from which I am about to read, Senate Executive Document No. 17, Thirty-Eighth Congress, first session, being the correspondence between the authorities of the two Governments in relation to the matter of exchange. I find in this document an extract from a message of President Davis furnished by our own authorities in these terms:

"So far as regards the action of this government on such criminals as may attempt its execution, I confine myself to informing you that I shall, unless in your wisdom you deem some other course more expedient, deliver to the several State authorities all commissioned officers of the United States that may hereafter be captured by our forces in any of the States embraced in the proclamation that they may be dealt with in accordance with the laws of those States providing for the punishment of criminals engaged in exciting servile insurrection."

That has reference to officers who were endeavoring to recruit in the rebel States, and to induce the slaves to abandon their homes and to join the American Army. He adds this other sentence:

"The enlisted soldiers I shall continue to treat as unwilling instruments in the commission of these crimes, and shall direct their discharge and return to their homes on the proper and usual parole."

That communication of President Davis is dated January 15, 1863. I will next read an extract from a letter of Robert Ould, the agent of exchange for the rebel authorities, to Colonel William H. Ludlow, the agent on the part of our Government, dated War Department, Richmond, Virginia, July 26, 1863:

"If, at this time, you have any officers of the rank I have declared exchanged, or of any other rank, or if you have any particular organization of privates or non-commissioned officers whom you wish exchanged, you have only to state such fact and your selection will be approved."

Colonel Ludlow was superseded and General Meredith took his place, and here is a very short letter from General Meredith to General Hitchcock on the subject of exchanges:

OFFICE OF COMMISSION FOR EXCHANGE,
FORTRESS MONROE, VIRGINIA, August 7, 1863.

GENERAL: I have the honor to inform you that by to-day's boat I have received a most earnest and pressing request from Mr. Ould to grant him a meeting as early as possible. I have not yet sought an interview with him, for the reason that Colonel Ludlow has been quite reticent in regard to matters connected with his late business; nor did I wish to see Mr. Ould until I had some specific instructions from the War Department.

From what I can gather in Colonel Ludlow's letter-books, I suppose the following are points to be insisted upon:

1. The immediate exchange of Colonel Straight and his command.
2. An agreement that Dr. Green shall be held by the United States Government as a hostage for Dr. Rucker, other surgeons to be exchanged.
3. That all officers commanding negro troops, and negro troops themselves, shall be treated as other prisoners of war, and exchanged in the same way.

I feel constrained, however, for reasons stated above, to ask for full instructions as soon as possible. You may rest assured that I shall enter into no unauthorized agreement with Mr. Ould, nor shall I discuss with him any point on which I am not fully instructed. I have the honor also to forward you the inclosed from Mr. Ould, upon which I should like to hear your views before seeing him.

I am, general, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
S. A. MEREDITH,
Brigadier General and Commissioner for Exchange.
Major General E. A. HITCHCOCK, Washington, D. C.

General Halleck, on the 12th of August, 1863, from his headquarters in Washington, directed a letter to General Meredith, in reply to the note from which I have just read, in which there is this paragraph, speaking of a demand of the rebel commissioners:

"This is certainly a most extraordinary demand, and cannot be acceded to. In order, however, to avoid any difficulty on this point, General Meredith will be authorized to agree with Mr. Ould, that all paroles given by officers and men on either side, between the 3d of May and the 3d of July, not in conformity with the stipulations of the cartel, be regarded as null and void, a declaration to that effect being published to the armies of both belligerents."

"The other three points mentioned in General Meredith's letter of the 7th instant seem to be fully understood by him. The Government of the United States will, under no circumstances, yield either of these points."

It was to this third point that General Butler's letter from which I read yesterday referred, and that point was "that all officers commanding negro troops, and negro troops themselves, shall be treated as other prisoners of war, and exchanged in the same way." The rebel authorities refused to make exchanges upon that proposition, and General Halleck, in his letter of instructions to General Meredith, says, "The other three points," including the one I last read, "mentioned in General Meredith's letter of the 7th instant seem to be fully understood by him. The Government of the United States will, under no circumstances, yield either of these points," and the point which I have just read was the great point that prevented the exchange of private soldiers on the part of the United States for private soldiers held by the rebel authorities.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, I do not intend to print my speech in pamphlet form, and therefore there is no great damage done by the amount that my friend from Kentucky has interjected into it. If such had been my purpose, I should certainly expect him to bear some portion of the cost of printing. [Laughter.]

Mr. DAVIS. I think I should have a reciprocal claim on the honorable Senator; for I never made a speech that he did not interrupt me repeatedly. [Laughter.]

Mr. HOWE. I do not know but that we are about even. [Laughter.] I shall certainly be willing to allow any just offset. A single word will dispose of the information the Senator from Kentucky has imparted to me. All the questions to which he has referred have been questions under discussion between our authorities and the rebel authorities. The points referred to in the letter of General Meredith are points which our Government have made, and which I am happy and proud to say they have not yet abandoned, and I have faith in them that they will never abandon them. The fact is that notwithstanding there were these difficulties and disputes about what ought to be done, between the two authorities, they did not interrupt exchanges. Exchanges went on; exchanges continued to go on; exchanges never stopped until December, 1863, months after all this correspondence took place, when the rebel agent at Richmond informed our agent, "It will be useless for you to send any more prisoners to City Point, unless you accompany them with the explicit declaration that the excess of prisoners in your hands you parole." That was the end of exchanges.

There was another point made on the same day by the same agent. Having several times received letters from Major General Butler and replied to them prior to the 27th day of December, 1863, on that day he seemed to have discovered that under a proclamation of Jefferson Davis, Benjamin F. Butler, a major general in the Army of the United States was an outlaw. Recollect it was a discovery that he did not make until the 27th of December, 1863. I do not wonder at all that he was so late in discovering it, for I have not discovered it yet, but he having thought that he made the discovery on that day he directs a letter to General Hitchcock and tells him:

"You are doubtless aware that by proclamation of the president of the Confederate States Major General B. F. Butler is under the law of outlawry."

It is a queer law to be under. It was a queer origin for a law to spring from, it was queerly discovered, at a very queer point of time, and announced by a very queer person.

"Although we do not pretend to prescribe the agents your Government shall employ in connection with the cartel" modestly says Mr. Robert Ould, "yet when one who has been proclaimed to be so obnoxious as General Butler is selected, self-respect requires that the confederate authorities should refuse to treat with him or establish such relations with him as properly pertain to an agent of exchange. The proclamation of President Davis forbids that General Butler should be admitted to the protection of the confederate government, and he cannot therefore be received under a flag of truce."

This letter, as I said before, comes from Robert Ould, dated December 27, 1863, and after he himself had been in correspondence with Major General Butler. He was late in discovering that self-respect required that he should hold General Butler under "the law of outlawry." There, as I say, was the end of exchanges as I understand the case. Upon that point stood the rebel authorities; and they never intimated a departure to my knowledge to anybody in the world until the 10th of August, 1864. On the 10th of August, 1864, this same Mr. Ould directs this letter to Major Mulford:

"SIR: You have several times proposed to me to exchange the prisoners respectively held by the two belligerents, officer for officer, and man for man."

Ould says that Major Mulford, acting for our Government, has several times proposed to exchange the prisoners respectively held by the two belligerents, officer for officer, and man for man.

"The same offer has also been made by other officials having charge of the matters connected with the exchange of prisoners. The proposal has heretofore been declined by the confederate authorities, they insisting upon the terms of the cartel which required the delivery of the excess of either side upon parole."

That is the testimony of Mr. Ould, given on the 10th of August last, as to the state of the negotiations up to that time. He then says, speaking to Major Mulford on that day, as I understand the letter, that they have concluded to assent to the terms our Government had proposed. That letter was not directed to General Butler, but to Major Mulford. When it reached General Butler I do not know. On the 20th of August, supposing that it might not have reached our authorities, Mr. Ould addressed a letter to General Hitchcock repeating the proposition. When that letter reached General Butler I do not know, but according to my recollection it was about the 5th of September that the reply to the propositions contained in these two letters was published in the New York Times, in the city of New York. That letter I have not with me. I have looked for it this morning, but have not been able to find it. As I recollect it, however, General Butler does not refuse to make exchanges upon the very terms agreed to here by Mr. Ould, does not recede from the offer that our Government had before made, but he hesitates upon the point whether he understands the proposition of Mr. Ould, and he submits to him two direct interrogatories. Do you mean—this is the substance of what he asks—to make these exchanges without setting up a claim that we shall parole the excess in our hands; and do you mean to include colored soldiers in your exchanges? He directs these two interrogatories to the rebel agent preparatory to answering the direct proposition himself. To those two interrogatories I do not know that any answer was ever made. If any ever was made I never heard of it.

I am bound to say here that I think now, as I thought at the time, and as I took occasion to say at the time, that General Butler instead of hesitating upon any such doubt as that, or taking time to submit any interrogatories to the rebel agent, ought to have taken him at his word, and gone on making exchanges, and what he actually meant by his proposition would have developed itself soon enough, and then would have been the time to divide upon it. That is what I think was the proper policy to have been pursued. He seemed to think it better to have the matter clearly understood before he assented to the proposition, to know exactly what Ould meant by his own proposition before he assented. Nevertheless, it is a part of the public history of the country known to us all that since that time the work of exchanges has been resumed, and thousands upon thousands of prisoners have been exchanged since then, and it is still going on.

In view of this little history that I have recited here, I hold that it is unjust to say that this Administration is guilty of preventing exchanges. When I tell you that we made exchanges as long as the rebels would exchange with us; when I tell you, and tell you from the record, that exchanges only stopped when they said it was useless to send prisoners to them unless accompanied by the stipulation that we would parole the excess, and when I show this upon the testimony of their own agents, and especially in the absence of any testimony or of any assertion from any quarter that ever this Government was offered the privilege of exchanging a single human being and refused to make the exchange, I do not think it just to assert that the responsibility for withholding these exchanges rests upon the skirts of this Administration.

Since I am upon this point, I will not leave it without alluding to one other very extraordinary fact in the political history of the last year. I have shown you that on the 27th day of December, 1863, they refused to make these exchanges any longer with us. I have shown you that they never intimated a contrary purpose or disposition until the 10th day of August, 1864. I want you to mark the time.

Mr. DAVIS. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him for a moment?

Mr. HOWE. Presently.

Mr. DAVIS. Very well.

Mr. HOWE. I will not refuse the Senator the privilege of an interruption now.

Mr. DAVIS. I avail myself of the very generous courtesy of the honorable Senator, and I ask him to answer me if the confederate authorities ever insisted upon anything except an execution of the cartel of exchange by both parties to it.

Mr. HOWE. No, sir; so far as I know they never did. I do understand that to have been a part of the cartel, and I understand that our Government refused to observe it; but I understand that they did so refuse upon the allegation that ten thousand men, rebel soldiers, captured at Vicksburg and paroled, were put back into the rebel ranks, and that our armies met them again and fought them at Chattanooga. That is a good cause or a bad one for not observing the cartel. To my own apprehension it is a remarkably good one. If my friend from Kentucky thinks otherwise, that is only one more point upon which we differ.

Mr. DAVIS. Will the honorable Senator allow me to put another question?

Mr. HOWE. Yes, sir.

Mr. DAVIS. I ask him if both parties to that cartel had not the right by its terms to declare the prisoners paroled mutually, to be exchanged; and whether the rebel authorities did not insist that they had declared exchanges to the full number of the paroled prisoners that had been taken at the capture of Vicksburg and then paroled.

Mr. HOWE. I really believe the Senator from Kentucky is right in point of fact, that they did make just such declarations. It happened, however, that our Government did not believe them, that our Government did not choose to indorse for them, knowing the contrary. If the Senator from Kentucky sees fit to indorse these rebel declarations, I cannot help that; I do not become his coindorser; and that is another point upon which we differ.

Mr. DAVIS. I have not indorsed them myself.

Mr. HOWE. I understand not, and I trust the Senator will not. I was about to say that from the 27th day of December, 1863, when we were officially notified that we need send no more prisoners to City Point, until the 10th day of August last, we never were advised of any change of purpose on the part of the rebel authorities. On the 10th of August this notice was sent to Major Mulford by letter. It was repeated on the 20th of August. I have already said that just when it came to the knowledge of General Butler I do not know. But the curious fact to which I wish to call attention is that on the 29th of August, nine days after this letter was directed to General Hitchcock from Richmond, Virginia, a convention assembled in the city of Chicago to nominate a candidate, not for the Presidency, but who would like to be President, and I was surprised to find in the indictment which that distinguished convention preferred against this Administration this count:

"Resolved, That the shameful disregard of the Administration to its duty in respect to our fellow-citizens who now and long have been prisoners of war in a suffering condition, deserves the severest reprobation on the score alike of public interest and common humanity."

I say I was surprised to find that count in the indictment. Laboring under the belief as I did up to that day that it was this Government which had urged exchanges and it was the rebel authorities who refused them, I was surprised to see a deliberative body, as I understand that was which assembled in convention at Chicago—deliberative part of the time—assert that this Administration had been guilty of shameful disregard of its duty in respect to our fellow-citizens in these prisons. Recollect this emanated from that convention just nine days after that letter was addressed from Mr. Ould to General Hitchcock, in which for the first time he notified General Hitchcock of their readiness to exchange at all. I think it was not only peculiar that that convention should have considered this evidence of "shameful disregard," but that it was very peculiar, indeed, that that convention should have been so early informed of that change of purpose itself. It did look to me—I trust I am not uncharitable; it seems to me a man has no excuse for being uncharitable toward those gentlemen who assembled at Chicago—but I cannot help saying that it did seem to me as if this willingness to exchange prisoners originated in the purpose of furnishing a little capital to the very low stock with which those gentlemen assembled at Chicago, and that it was actually communicated to them before it was communicated to the Government of the United States. If I have done those gentlemen injustice in this suspicion, or in the expression of it, I shall be very glad to apologize to them if they ever get together again; and if I can be excused from making apologies until such a convention does reassemble on this continent, I shall not have to apologize for a great while.

Mr. WADE. As in the course of this debate there has been a question raised as to whether the barbarities narrated in the preamble to the resolution have been continued since the report made on that subject in May last, I desire to present to the Senate a deposition taken to-day by the committee on the conduct of the war. It is the deposition of a man who has just escaped from the dungeon at Salisbury, North Carolina; he escaped with those editors of whom we have recently read. The deposition is here, and if gentlemen would like to hear it, it can be read.

Mr. WILKINSON. I should like to hear it. The VICE PRESIDENT. If there be no objection, the paper will be read.

The Secretary read, as follows:

WASHINGTON, January 27, 1865.

Sergeant C. W. Thurston sworn, and examined by Mr. LOAN.

Question. Will you state to what company and regiment you belong?

Answer. I am a sergeant of company K, sixth New Hampshire volunteers.

Question. At what time and where were you taken prisoner by the rebels?

Answer. I was captured on the 30th of September last, at what I think is known by the name of Jones's farm. It was the time the attempt was made to cut the South Side railroad near Petersburg.

Question. To what place were you taken, and confined?

Answer. I was first taken, with others, to Petersburg, and kept over-night; then to Richmond, and put into what is called the Pemberton building, and then to Salisbury, North Carolina.

Question. How long were you kept in Richmond?

Answer. Only over one night.

Question. How long were you at Salisbury?

Answer. Until the 18th of last month, when I made my escape.

Question. What number of prisoners were at Salisbury, and how were they treated?

Answer. When I was first taken there, there were comparatively few prisoners there; but within three or four days there were upward of ten thousand. I know that when I had charge of the bakery for the prisoners I made out requisitions for more than ten thousand six hundred men.

Question. What kind of a place were you kept in?

Answer. At the time I went there there was a building that was made to hold probably two thousand men. The rest had no cover or shelter at all. The enemy had taken away from us our blankets and knapsacks and a great deal of our clothing. About the 6th of November the quartermaster gave us some tents, in the proportion of one Sibley tent and one small wall tent to each one hundred men. But not more than fifty of the one hundred could get in and lie down in the tents. The rest had no covering, and used to dig holes in the ground with their pocket knives and plates, because they could get no shovels or picks, and they would crawl in those holes and lie down.

In regard to the rations for the men, what was called the regular ration was a pound of bread, made of corn and cobs ground together, to each man for twenty-four hours. They usually got only about twelve ounces even of that bread. Then for meat the men usually received twenty-two pounds of beef's heads, tripe, and gullets to each hundred men; but that was not received every day, only about once in four days on an average. And then there was usually given about half a pint of soup to each man a day. The soup was made of rice and water; that is, a large bucketful of rice would be put into a large kettle of water, holding, say, twenty gallons; sometimes a little salt, sometimes no salt at all. They would dip out the water, and but little of the rice, and then fill up again and again, until a thousand men had been served from the one bucketful of rice. Upon the slightest provocation the rations would be cut off entirely for a day or two. I have lost the principal diary I kept while there; but I find in a memorandum book which I have here, that on Friday, the 23d of October, the men received no rations; on Saturday they received nothing but soup; on Sunday they received bread and meat; so that there were two days when they received nothing but a little soup.

In regard to the treatment of our men in other respects, I can illustrate it by an incident I saw myself. I was standing one day by the hospital; I had been to see Mr. Davis, one of the prisoners, who had been appointed superintendent of the hospital. One of our negro soldiers, captured at the time of the explosion of the mine near Petersburg, was standing near by engaged in "skrimshing," as we prisoners call it, examining his clothes for vermin. A sentinel there, at whom I happened to be looking at the time, drew up his musket, took deliberate aim and fired, killing the negro on the spot. One of our boys asked him what he did that for, and he replied that he did it "to see the damned black son of a bitch drop." That I saw done myself.

Question. What notice was taken of that by the rebel authorities there?

Answer. None that I know. The report is that they get thirty days' furlough for shooting a Yankee; that it is encouraged. Mr. Davis, the superintendent of the hospital, assured me that he has at the present time the names of eighteen hundred of our men who died there between the 1st day of October and the 15th day of December, 1864.

Question. Who is this Mr. Davis?

Answer. He was the chief clerk of the Ohio Senate, so I understand, and a correspondent of the Cincinnati Gazette. He escaped when I did, and I understand he is now in this city.

Question. He was a prisoner at Salisbury?

Answer. Yes, sir; and Mr. Richardson, of the New York Times, and Mr. Brown, of the New York Tribune.

Question. What means had Mr. Davis to know the number of deaths?

Answer. He was the superintendent of the hospital, and Mr. Richardson was clerk of the hospital.

Question. Appointed by the rebel authorities?

Answer. Yes, sir. We made an attempt to break out of the prison one day, in which we killed four of the guards and wounded quite a number of them. They killed fifteen of our men and wounded fifty-seven. They fired upon the boys for twenty-two minutes after they had given up and gone into their tents. They fired right through the tents—they could see no one—killing them completely. And they discharged cannon several times loaded with canister, or rather with little plugs of iron punched out of boilers when they made them. We have kept account of upward of nine hundred Federal soldiers who have enlisted in the rebel service merely to avoid starvation. Generally for a day or two before they were enlisted they would be deprived of everything to eat but a little soup.

Question. What rations do the rebels furnish their own soldiers?

Answer. They told me that they got a pound of flour and a half a pound of bacon or other meat to a man. They were put on short rations there, or "half rations," as they call it.

Question. What else was furnished them?

Answer. Very little of anything else than a little tobacco; at least that is what they told me. They said they had to have provisions sent them from home, for they could not live on their rations there.

Question. What became of the beehives, the heads, and tripe which you say were given the prisoners?

Answer. I cannot tell. Sometimes we would get a little of the beef, but very seldom. We got very little beef in proportion to the heads and tripe. I had twelve men of my own regiment who enlisted in the rebel service.

Question. Did much sickness result from this diet?

Answer. The diarrhea was the prevalent sickness, caused principally by the water, I think. The boys did not have what water they wanted. They had to go a quarter of a mile to a little creek, twenty at a time, with a guard; but they did not get all they wanted. There was water in the yard, but so thick with mud that they could not drink it. The only well that had good water in it was closely guarded and kept for the hospital. The morning I escaped there were seven thousand six hundred and three prisoners there.

We never received any of the clothing or supplies of the Sanitary Commission, which we understood had been sent to us. Before our soldiers got nothing to eat for two or three days. Then an officer would come in with a guard, and when the prisoners were collected around him, he would tell them that they would not be exchanged before the end of the war; but if they would enlist in their service they would have plenty of food and clothing, and be placed on garrison duty, and not be called upon to fight. I have seen men brought up for that purpose who were so weak that they could not walk without staggering.

Question. Were any threats made as to what would be the consequences if they did not enlist?

Answer. No, sir; there was no need of threats; the boys knew they would die if they staid there. The rations kept growing poorer and poorer all the time; God only knows what they are by this time, or how the poor fellows get along.

Question. State more fully about your being deprived of clothing, &c., when you were captured.

Answer. When we are first taken they generally take from us all our money, watches, and other valuables. When we were taken to Petersburg an officer came in within a guard where we were and took a great many of our rubber and woolen blankets. The guard kept coming in and stealing our clothing, the men resisting, but of course resistance was useless. They took our shelter tents and overcoats from us while we were in Petersburg. When we got to Richmond and put in the Pemberton building, we were formed into line on each side of the building and made to take off our knapsacks, haversacks, and canteens, and pile them up in the middle of the room, and then carried off by them. They said they were going to search us for money, and we were invited to give up what money we had voluntarily, and told that if we did so we should have a receipt for it, and it would be given back to us when we were exchanged. But we were told that if we did not do that, and any money was afterward found on us, it would be confiscated. Then they took us on to Salisbury, many of our boys having nothing but what they had on. When their clothes wore out they had to do without. When I left not one half of them had more than a blouse and pair of pantaloons, some nothing but a shirt and pantaloons, still others nothing but pantaloons and a piece of old cloth about their shoulders. Hundreds were bare-footed and without hats or caps; without clothing to keep them any way comfortable.

Question. Then they must have suffered much from the inclemency of the weather?

Answer. Yes, sir. I understood that some of them froze to death. I have no doubt that many perished in that way. I have had men come to the bakery where I was, shivering and shivering with cold as if they had the ague, and beg to be allowed to come in and warm themselves. I would let a few in at a time, and then, after a short time, make them go out and let others come in. When prisoners died, they used to strip them of their clothing, which they would sometimes give to the most needy of the living. The dead were put in a dead-horse, and then pitched into a cart any way, just as many as it would hold, and, as I understood, carried off and tumbled into a ditch and covered up. This I was told by some of our men who were detailed as grave diggers, and given double rations for that duty.

Question. You have no personal knowledge that any of the prisoners froze to death?

Answer. No, sir; I saw none when they were freezing, but I was told so; and I have no doubt of it. The men would get very weak, and would crawl into these holes, and I have no doubt they froze to death there. One man was taken out from under the hospital who had been there so long that he had begun to decay, and was all covered with vermin. We supposed he had crawled under there to get out of the cold, and there died. I was told by a rebel doctor there, I forget his name, that not one in ten of the men who died there would have died if they had had proper food and shelter.

Question. From all that you have seen, are you satisfied in your own mind that our soldiers have died there in consequence of not having proper food and clothing?

Answer. I know so, as well as I can know anything of that nature. There was a snow-storm there, which changed to a cold rain and lasted for two days, and the morning after I saw six men taken out of one hole, into which they had crawled and had there died.

Question. How long were you in effecting your escape?

Answer. We left on the 18th of December, and reached Knoxville on the 13th of January. From there I went to Chattanooga, and was ordered by General Thomas to report here in Washington, and I came right on here.

Question. You are here for the purpose of joining your regiment?

Answer. Yes, sir; I want to join it immediately.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion to recommit the resolution to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. MORRILL. I should like to inquire whether the question before the Senate is or not on the motion of the Senator from Ohio to amend the resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That will be the motion before the Senate if the motion to recommit fails. That is the pending amendment. The motion to commit takes precedence of it.

Mr. MORRILL. I should like to make one further inquiry: whether the amendment submitted by the Senator from Ohio is open to further amendment?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is.

Mr. SUMNER. Is not the question now on the reference to the committee?

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is the question now before the Senate.

Mr. SUMNER. Then I take it that no amendment can be made and no other motion can be put until that is disposed of.

Mr. MORRILL. I did not submit a motion.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I suggest to the Senator from Maine that the motion to recommit be modified so as to send to the committee the resolution and all the amendments and proposed amendments.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That was the motion made.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Then I submit to the Presiding Officer whether that will not carry the proposed amendment of the Senator from Maine.
